34. Mr. Isbister said he realized that complete attainment of the goals of FTA could strengthen Europe. He wondered whether the realization of part of these goals would increase Europe's strength proportionately. He thought it was important in appraising the FTA proposals to consider the effects of the realization of only a fraction of its goals. The adoption of the FTA proposals would mean that the economies of Europe would be diverted into particular channels for a period of some ten years.

35. Mr. Hockin recalled that Sir Edgar Cohen had said that if the FTA bogged down half way, the situation would be intolerable and the U.K. would have to return to its previous position, if that were possible.

36. Mr. Rasminsky said that it was his guess that the U.S. would welcome the FTA. Some U.S. officials might consider this a way of making Europe more self-reliant and of "getting out" of Europe. In any event, the implications of the U.S. attitude were important and might not be happy ones for Canada.

37. Mr. Ritchie said that U.S. approval of the FTA would not necessarily result in its abandonment of Europe. The outcome of the U.S. approval of the FTA would depend largely on what relations FTA maintained with such organizations as GATT.

38. Mr. Sharp asked whether a free trade area in Europe would lead to the creation of other regional groups in South America, Asia or in the Arab world, for example.

39. Mr. Plumptre said that there was a serious possibility of these regional groups being formed. South American countries had always shown interest in regional commissions proposed in the United Nations. The formation of new regional groups could also lead to more active Russian interference.

40. Mr. Rasminsky said that if the U.K. went ahead with its plans for the FTA, Canada might have to review its principles of international trade. Canada should point out to the U.K. what repercussions the FTA would have on all its trade.

41. Mr. Taylor said that Canada should give serious study to the possibility of joining the FTA to offset the danger of being completely driven into the U.S. orbit.

42. Mr. Ritchie wondered whether it would be possible to resolve, item by item, problems arising out of the adoption of the FTA. Perhaps the U.K. should be told that Canada would expect to be consulted on any changes which would affect Canada.

43. Mr. Isbister said that, taking the U.K. proposals at their face value, the Department of Trade and Commerce was preparing for circulation a set of memoranda setting out the economic effects of the FTA for Canada in its trade relations with countries of the FTA. From the point of view of total trade and having in mind that agricultural products were excluded the loss of U.K. preferences would cause negligible damage to Canada. However, in the field of highly manufactured products, some damage to exports would result and there was no promise by the U.K. to alleviate this damage. Nevertheless, Mr. Thorneycroft had given assurances that the U.K. was prepared to consider particular cases where adverse preferences might be introduced.

44. Mr. Sharp said that Canada should keep in mind the impact of these proposals on our interests outside of Europe and the U.S. The creation of new preferences could damage our immediate trading prospects in countries like Japan.

45. Mr. Léger stressed the fact that political pressures would impose a timetable on Canada's official pronouncement about the FTA. Canada should decide on its policy as soon as possible and be prepared to send specialists to discuss the details of the proposals.

46. Mr. Isbister agreed that there was some urgency for Canada to formulate its policy. Canada's bargaining power was better now than it would be later on. If a decision was taken early, possibly before January 1st, the maximum benefit could be derived from it.

47. Mr. Léger said that in view of the importance of the issue it was desirable to adopt a common policy as soon as possible. The danger of an indiscreet statement being made should not be overlooked.

48. Mr. Bryce said that it was clear that a decision would be needed soon. He saw no fundamental disagreement between the committee members as to what statement the Government should make. It would not be possible to prepare a holding statement until Cabinet could consider the position which it would want to take publicly. The government's statement should not, at this stage, say that Canada seeks a special position in the FTA. The government should say that Canada will consider its position vis-à-vis all participants of the FTA and all other countries concerned.

49. The Committee agreed that a statement be prepared concerning the suggestion that the U.K. join a free trade area embracing most of Western Europe for consideration at a meeting of the committee the following week.

Draft Statement

CONFIDENTIAL

DRAFT FOR A STATEMENT TO BE ISSUED AFTER SHOWING IT TO THE U.K. AUTHORITIES
(AS REVISED BY EXTERNAL TRADE COMMITTEE, OCTOBER 9TH)

The Right Honourable Louis S. St-Laurent, Prime Minister, today issued the following statement on behalf of the government in response to questions that have recently been addressed to Ministers concerning the suggestion that the United Kingdom would join a free trade area embracing most of Western Europe:

The Canadian Government has been informed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade of the proposal under consideration by the Government of the United Kingdom which would involve the United Kingdom entering a Free Trade Area in Western Europe along with France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Germany and Italy (who are considering the establishment of a Customs Union among the six of them), and possibly other countries of Western Europe. The entry by the United Kingdom into such a free trade arrangement with European countries would involve the removal by defined stages of its customs duties on the products of such countries in return for reciprocal action on their part toward United Kingdom products. The United Kingdom proposes that this Free Trade arrangement would not apply to foodstuffs, feeds, beverages or tobacco.

The Canadian Government appreciates the opportunity given it for advance consultation on this bold and important proposal. Should such a plan be adopted and successfully carried through by Britain and nations of Western Europe it should increase the economic strength and prosperity of the peoples of that whole great area and also their sense of solidarity and common purpose even beyond the economic field. Such results would benefit Canadians as well as others outside Europe.

The effects of such a programme upon Canadian trade and the special trade arrangements within the Commonwealth will require detailed study by the government. The radical change in British and European trade relations which the proposal involves would present a number of problems for Canadian trade with the countries concerned and require some re-negotiation of our trade agreements. If the proposal is carried through with determination, and at the same time the countries concerned proceed forthrightly with the removal of other trade barriers between themselves, and also against other countries as they are already pledged to do, it should be possible to surmount the difficulties which this plan will create and to increase the flow of trade, and maintain the ties, between this large European area and the rest of the world. On the other hand, a partial development that resulted only in the creation of a new system of inter-European tariff preferences would interfere with trade between Europe and other countries, including Canada, without achieving the constructive results which are expected from a full implementing of the plan. Similarly, it would be a matter of concern to us if the pursuit of this European objective, worthy as it is, were to result in less effort or willingness to reduce the other barriers to the development of competitive multilateral trade, which is the over-riding objective of the Canadian Government and of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

The Canadian Government will study carefully the details of this proposal as it develops, and its potential effects upon our trade relations with the countries involved, in order to be ready to negotiate such revised arrangements with the countries concerned as may be appropriate.

FREE TRADE AREA IN EUROPE; U.K. PROPOSALS; CANADIAN VIEWS

10. The Prime Minister submitted a draft announcement to be issued on behalf of the Canadian government concerning the suggestion that the United Kingdom would join a free trade area embracing most of Western Europe. It stated that the proposal would present a number of problems for Canadian trade with the countries concerned but that those difficulties could be surmounted if the plan were carried through with determination and if at the same time western Europe proceeded to remove other trade barriers. On the other hand, a partial development would interfere with trade between Europe and other countries, including Canada. The statement added that the government would study carefully the details of the proposal, as it developed, and its potential effects upon Canadian trade relations in order to be ready to negotiate such revised arrangements with the countries concerned as might be appropriate.

11. During the discussion a number of changes were suggested in the draft statement.

12. The Cabinet noted the report of the Prime Minister on a statement concerning the Canadian views on U.K. proposals for joining a free trade area in Europe, and agreed that a statement along the lines suggested and as amended in the course of discussion be issued after consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

CANADIAN REACTION TO PROPOSED UK PARTICIPATION IN A EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA

I believe UK ministers are hoping to receive preliminary comments of other Commonwealth governments which they could take into account before they definitely commit themselves to the proposed policy. The draft in your telegram might, therefore, be looked at first as a possible message to the UK government and then, after the UK government have publicly announced what they hope to accomplish, as a basis for a public statement of the Canadian attitude toward these developments.

2. I am concerned about the possible effects of our referring, either in our message to the UK government or in a subsequent statement to the press, to the possibility that we may have to take another look at our existing trade agreements with a view to their renegotiation. I take it that the reference is primarily aimed at UK preferences in the Canadian market. Our right to modify these preferences and the parallel British right to modify preferences accorded to us have been established since 1947 and are fully recognized here. At the same time we are, in fact, in a better position than the British to avail ourselves of the freedom secured under the 1947 exchange. This is because the UK, though now free to vary or remove preferences which once were bound in favour of Canada, are still bound by treaty commitments with other Commonwealth countries to preserve many margins of preference against foreign goods. In these circumstances, in which our freedom of action is real and theirs is severely limited by the fact that they would not wish to discriminate in their tariff treatment of imports from Commonwealth countries, it seems to me that we might be creating considerable difficulties for the government here if we were to put them on public notice that their entry into a free trade area was likely to entail the loss of some of their trading advantages in the Canadian market.

3. If you think that this point has to be made, it might suffice to amend the second sentence of the third paragraph to read:

"The changes in British and European trading relations which the realization of these proposals is likely to bring about would undoubtedly present problems for Canadian trade with the countries concerned and might require adjustments in our trading relations with these countries so as to enable Canada to benefit from the new trading opportunities that an expanding European market should offer".

Even without this amendment the final paragraph of the statement seems to me to be redundant.

4. Both in order to clarify the UK's position and to amplify the considerations on which it is based, I would suggest deleting the last sentence of the first paragraph of the statement and substituting the following:

"The UK have made it clear that they could not contemplate entering into a free trade area arrangement of this kind unless food, including manufactured foods, feeding stuffs, beverages and tobacco were excluded from its scope. One of the effects of excluding this range of commodities would be to protect the bulk of the preferences that are at present accorded to Commonwealth trade in the UK market".

5. I also think that it might be useful to alter the language of the final sentence in the third paragraph of the statement to read as follows:

"Similarly, it would be a matter of concern to us if the implementation of these European proposals to free the flow of trade and rationalize economic resources over a limited geographical area were to delay progress in the removal of other barriers to the development of competitive multilateral trade, which is the overriding objective of the Canadian government and of the general agreement on tariffs and trade".

This wording would have the advantage of spelling out the professed aims of the free trade area scheme and, at the same time, restating against this background the broader objectives of multilateralism which remain a cardinal element of Canadian policy.[26]

CANADIAN REACTION TO PROPOSED UK PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA

Following to Léger from Hébert.

I have just now had an opportunity to read the text of the proposed statement for Mr. St. Laurent as drafted by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy since your telegram did not reach this mission until today. While I appreciate that this message was sent to me only for my information, I felt that it might be helpful if the statement has not already been made to give you my impressions of how it may be viewed in Brussels.

2. Because of the tremendous interest everywhere in the common market proposals and their possible relationship with the UK and the Commonwealth, I assume that the Prime Minister's statement is being considered both in the terms of its effect in Canada and in other interested countries. Coming as it does, however, as the first public statement by the Prime Minister on European integration, it is bound to be given particular attention in the capitals of the Messina powers.

3. From the latter point of view I cannot help but feel that the statement will be viewed in Brussels as going beyond an understandable caution at this stage towards possible UK association with a free trade area, and because of the wording will almost certainly be construed as defining our position towards the whole concept of European economic integration. If the latter is the intention, the statement will be regarded here as pretty negative. Our recognition of the substantial benefits which may arise from an effective strengthening of the economy of Western Europe is limited to a rather vague and general reference in paragraph 3 of the draft statement. The statement does not appear to reflect an awareness of the events which have taken place over the past few weeks which suggest at least from this capital that the six are now making a more genuine attempt than ever before to find agreement on the Common Market and on Euratom. While it is still too early to be certain that this impetus can be maintained in the face of serious problems still to be resolved, it is generally agreed that the Paris meeting (now tentatively scheduled for October 20) will be a crucial one. An overly-guarded Canadian statement appearing probably quite unintentionally on the eve or during this conference would certainly not be without effect in the deliberations of the Six at St. Cloud.

4. The draft statement lays great emphasis on the economic consequences for Canada but touches only incidentally on the broader political issues at stake. I am aware of the need for caution on this score, but I wonder if Mr. Spaak will find it possible to reconcile the tone of the statement with some parts of the personal letter which our Minister sent to him on January 9. In that letter Mr. Pearson stated "I have the impression we may not have given sufficient weight from the broad political point of view to the reasons which are prompting the Messina countries to attempt further economic integration ... I do not want to take a narrow view of such undertakings as the establishment of a European atomic agency or of a common market for a large part of Western Europe". The statement as now drafted might also suggest to Mr. Spaak that the Canadian Government was not repeat not taking account of the assurances in his reply to Mr. Pearson of January 27 when he said — "Among the advocates of this integration there is no repeat no one who thinks that this new community, if it is to be organized, should be protectionist and self-sufficient". Similarly it does not repeat not appear to us to record the spirit of the Minister's speech to the English-Speaking Union urging a more enlightened attitude by the UK towards European integration.

5. In summary, while the statement is concerned with Canadian reaction to UK proposals, it is bound to be viewed here as an indication of Canadian policy towards European integration proposals generally. Its timing in terms of the Paris conference adds to the significance of its reception in the Messina capitals. Finally, the absence of any recognition of recent political developments, which are considered at least from here as significant for the future of Western Europe, may be considered by Mr. Spaak as somewhat inconsistent with the Minister's desire to give full weight to the political aspects of the Messina endeavours.

6. When the final text of Mr. St. Laurent's statement is approved, it would be most helpful if I could be authorized [to give] it to Spaak or the Belgian Foreign Office at the same time as it is being given to the UK Foreign Office.

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION — CANADIAN STATEMENT ON THE U.K. FREE TRADE AREA PROPOSAL

I think Mr. Hébert's point is well taken, that if the Canadian Government issues a statement on the U.K. Government's proposal for a free trade area, and this statement appears just before or during the St. Cloud meeting of Messina foreign ministers, it is bound to have a dampening effect.[27] I think this is so more because of what the statement leaves out on the political side than because of what is said about how the Canadian economic position might be affected.

2. I do not know how you wish this matter to be handled. One difficulty is that Mr. Pearson has not allowed us to circulate his correspondence with Mr. Spaak outside the Department. For your information I am enclosing copies of this correspondence between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Spaak. Would you like us to try and use some of this material from the Minister's letter of January 9 in attempting to add a paragraph to the proposed Canadian statement[28] which might be broadened into a statement on the Canadian attitude towards European integration generally, although it would still be devoted for the most part to giving our reactions to the United Kingdom free trade area proposal? Presumably this might only be useful if the statement can be held until the Minister's return.

3. If the Canadian statement as approved by Ministers last week is to be given to the United Kingdom Government without much change, then at least I would suggest it should not be made public until after the St. Cloud meeting[29] and that if a copy is to be given to Mr. Spaak it should be explained in a brief covering message from the Minister.

4. Incidentally, I see from this morning's papers that the Parliamentary Assembly of the Western European Union ended its annual session on Saturday with a plea to the United Kingdom to link itself as closely as possible with Euratom. We do not know if the common market link was also discussed.

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION — CANADIAN STATEMENT ON THE U.K. FREE TRADE AREA PROPOSAL

As you agreed yesterday, we have drafted an additional paragraph — or rather a revision of the present final paragraph — for the proposed Canadian statement on the Western European free trade area proposal of the United Kingdom. The addition would, I think, help broaden the statement so as to take into account the Messina Customs Union to which the free trade area would be related, and indicate a little more clearly than in the original draft that the Canadian Government might be open to some form of association with the free trade area.[30]

2. In view of the "re-negotiation" of the whole statement, I do not know whether our suggested paragraph will be of any use but I think that if the text is to be made public or even if it is to be given to Mr. Spaak privately, it should go beyond technical comments on the free trade area proposal. If this is not possible, I wonder if we should not aim at:

(a) An official confidential reply by the Minister of Finance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's message, stating the position of the Canadian Government on the U.K. free trade area proposal in its present form, and,

SUGGESTED FINAL PARAGRAPH FOR THE PROPOSED CANADIAN STATEMENT ON THE WESTERN EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA PROPOSAL OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

The Canadian Government appreciates the opportunity for advance consultation on this bold and important proposal. It would greatly encourage the six countries of the proposed Continental Customs Union if the United Kingdom and perhaps some other countries of Western Europe were to associate themselves by means of a free trade area arrangement with this Customs Union. Indeed the whole scheme would be more likely to be adopted and carried through in such a way as to increase the strength and prosperity of this important part of the North Atlantic Community, as well as their sense of solidarity and common purpose beyond the economic field. For the Canadian Government, and for the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, as they have already made clear, any further progress on the Continent towards unity both politically and economically should be supported.

The Canadian Government will therefore study carefully the details of the United Kingdom Government's proposal as it develops, and its potential effects upon our relations with the area or with the countries involved.

Comment by Economic Division:

It would seem to me undesirable to say very much, particularly in a public statement about our attitude being influenced by our desire to promote the political unity of Europe.

Some groups and industries in Canada are undoubtedly going to be hurt — at least in the short run — by the creation of a free-trade area which includes the U.K. If our statement has a very large European-political slant, those who are likely to be affected will be able to say that the Government has determined its position not on the basis of a sober appraisal of the project in relation to Canada's national interest but rather on the basis of a prior attachment to the idea of European union. They will claim that they are being sacrificed for this illusion or illusory political objective. This will not help to ensure continuing Canadian support for the project.

Moreover, conspicuous references to European unity are not likely to help the United Kingdom. Those in the U.K. who fear deep involvement in Europe and who would like to represent this project as entailing subordination to some European authority would be given considerable aid and comfort by such a statement from Canada.

I would feel, therefore, that it would be best to aim at a matter-of-fact, pedestrian statement which did not lean very heavily on any connection between this trade project and the development of European unity. A.E. Ritchie Oct 17.

UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS TO PARTICIPATE IN EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA

1. The High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom said that the U.K. proposals represented a very important initiative and had to be examined both in the existing political framework and with regard to their economic incidence. The move made political sense in view of the future of Western Europe and its relationship to the rest of the world. It was uncertain whether the Messina group could produce a viable scheme and therefore the question of the U.K's relationship to it was crucial. In the past, the U.K's negative attitude towards European integration proposals had been held accountable for their failures and this history had been in U.K. ministers' minds. The change in their present attitude could only be regarded as a wise one. If the Messina initiative failed and failure could be attributed to the United Kingdom the situation would be unfortunate. The fact remained that present proposals by the Messina group to create a Customs Union did not seem at all sure of success. In particular, the problems created by France would not be easy to surmount and were likely to multiply. The general feeling in the U.K. was that, in the long run, the FTA was a desirable objective. The formula for a progressive FTA proposed by the U.K. ministers was one which should give needed external encouragement to the Messina group while encouraging the participation of Scandinavia and other West European countries in a broader customs union.

Mr. Robertson thought that the political importance of the FTA could not be overemphasized but there was a danger of exaggerating its effects on Canadian trade. The type of scheme envisaged by the U.K. was much broader than Messina. By providing for the participation of the Scandinavian countries, the FTA would likely result in lower tariffs than in the Customs Union. Moreover, the industrial competition which would result from the U.K. entering into a free trade arrangement would tend to create pressures for the removal of tariffs which raise the costs of production. Although it was difficult to forecast what would happen within the next ten years, it was Mr. Robertson's opinion that under a FTA the overall European requirements for what Canada wanted to export would increase.

In appraising the FTA, Canada should take into consideration the important implications of this scheme on the U.K. itself. By joining the FTA the British were putting much of their economy in jeopardy. The risks and sacrifices involved in the FTA were not welcomed by all sectors of the British economy and required a determined political policy to reconcile the existing polls of opinion. The U.K. Board of Trade had, he thought, brought pressure to bear on the Government to take this step as a means of keeping British exports competitive. The press had given the proposals a friendlier reaction than might have been expected. On the other hand, there were fears that the FTA would weaken the Commonwealth and objections to the plan had been raised by some protected industries in the U.K. Because of these objections, any discouraging words from Canada might decisively weigh the balance against the plan. For this reason, Canada could look at the proposals from a position of strength, conscious of the importance of its attitude towards them.

Mr. Robertson went on to say that he thought a free trade area arrangement consisting of the United Kingdom, the Messina group and other Western European countries appeared to stand a better chance of success than the Messina plan itself. The Messina Powers were encountering an increasing number of problems over such matters as the participation of France's colonies, the question of harmonization of social charges and France's special request for transitional measures. The major difficulty in France's position, of course, was financial and, in particular, the value of the franc. If, as a result of increasing problems, the Messina initiative failed and there was no broader arrangement in sight, the plan of the Messina Powers might be replaced by a truncated customs union with a higher tariff structure than presently contemplated.

A wider free trade area plan would give added support for lower tariffs. Also, it would result in self-generating pressures not now present in the United Kingdom for liberalization of commercial and trade policies.

France's position was confused. She would like to see supranational attributes attached to whatever organization emerged. She wanted Germany integrated closely with Europe and she would like the U.K's association to offset Germany. France would appear, in fact, to want to have things arranged to provide her with "cover" to devalue the franc. And, if this eventuality occurred, less would be heard of the other questions, such as the harmonization of social charges, which she was raising.

2. During the discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) On the question of colonies it would be easier, from the Canadian point of view, to have them excluded.

(b) As regards the forms of relationship, the U.K. wanted these defined in simple, explicit terms in a way that would require as little international machinery as possible. The U.K. was afraid of a series of escape clauses. Of course a real worry was that if there were not a series of rigid steps prescribed for reaching the objectives of the free trade area, countries would drop out half-way and an impossible situation would result.

(c) There was a feeling in the U.K. and in Europe that the Messina proposals in their original form would not be successful. In some German quarters it was felt that nothing could happen without U.K. participation. As far as Germany itself was concerned, there was a feeling by responsible German elements that the more German industry was integrated with the rest of Europe the less chance there would be of drifting away from Europe.

(d) If the U.K. had proceeded with the collective approach a few years ago and taken Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium along with her, the Messina idea might never have developed. She did not because it was felt that the necessary domestic policies could not be implemented at that time. Such strenuous domestic policies would, however, be required for the new plans. Perhaps the U.K. would feel better able to withstand domestic political pressures against these required steps if she were associated with other countries in the Free Trade Area.

(e) The present statement which had been prepared on the U.K. proposals should be further revised. Once it was approved it should be transmitted to the U.K. before publication. It was important to ensure that this document would be consistent with any communication which might be made privately to the U.K. authorities on this subject. As it stood, most of those who had reviewed the statement since the matter was last discussed felt it was too negative.

(f) As regards the draft statement itself, too much stress should not be placed on the question of negotiations in which Canada would participate. It was assumed by some that the U.K. would have to propose negotiations on the preference problem in any event, but for Canada emphatically to serve notice in the statement did not appear to be wise in the broader context under consideration. On the other hand, there was the domestic reaction to a possible loss of U.K. markets to keep in mind and, in addition, a possibility that we might wish to make some special arrangements with the Free Trade Area. This had a bearing on our relations with the U.S.

(g) Some doubt was expressed as to the desirability of seeking a special interest in the Free Trade Area over the United States. Should not both countries work together as regards the shape and height of the common tariff in Europe? Perhaps North America should be thinking in terms of offering tariff reductions in exchange for reductions offered by the new Free Trade Area. The final objective should be the goal of convertibility.

(h) No duties on coal and steel were levied by members of the Coal and Steel Community on imports from each other. The U.K., it was understood, had suspended the application of its tariff on these products from all sources. As an earnest of the U.K's intention vis-à-vis the FTA, it might be desirable if this arrangement were made permanent at least with respect to the six countries and other possible participants in the FTA.

3. The Committee

(a) noted with appreciation Mr. Robertson's comments on the United Kingdom proposals to participate in a European Free Trade Area, and

(b) noted that the Department of External Affairs would re-draft for subsequent consideration the statement on these proposals.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 26, 1956

My dear Prime Minister:

I understand that when the proposed statement about possible United Kingdom participation in a European Free-Trade Area was discussed in Cabinet on October 11, it was suggested that, as I was unfortunately absent, I might have an opportunity to comment before the text was finally settled.

Since my return I have gone over the proposed statement very carefully. As you will realize I have been particularly anxious to ensure that our position on these proposals, and any statement which we might make about them, would be consistent with our general relations with the various countries involved. At the same time, I have recognized fully the desirability of reminding our friends in the United Kingdom and Europe of the discipline which they will have to show in their economic affairs if this venture is to succeed. I have also appreciated the need to avoid saying anything which might weaken our own negotiating position for the numerous discussions which will be required with the participants on matters affecting our economic interests directly.

Most of these considerations appear to me to be adequately reflected in the draft which resulted from the Cabinet discussion on October 11. In some respects, however, I would very much hope that the language might be altered in such a way that there would be less risk of frightening off those United Kingdom supporters who may be somewhat uneasy about the prospects for their preferences and also of avoiding undue alarm on the part of some of our own people who may have an exaggerated impression of the extent to which they might be adversely affected by the scheme. I feel that it would be particularly desirable to say at least a little more about the beneficial political effects which the successful implementation of these proposals could have for Europe and for ourselves. Accordingly I have attempted a redraft of the proposed statement which I am enclosing for your consideration.

I am also sending a copy of this letter and enclosure to our colleague, Mr. Harris. I would hope that the three of us might discuss it at your convenience in the near future.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Draft Statement

PROPOSED STATEMENT WHICH MIGHT BE ISSUED AFTER IT HAS BEEN SHOWN TO THE U.K. AUTHORITIES

The Right Honourable Louis S. St-Laurent, Prime Minister, today issued the following statement on behalf of the government in response to questions that have recently been addressed to Ministers concerning the suggestion that the United Kingdom might join a free trade area embracing most of Western Europe:

The Canadian Government has been informed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade of the proposals under consideration by the Government of the United Kingdom which would involve the United Kingdom entering a Free Trade Area in Western Europe along with France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Germany and Italy (who are considering the establishment of a full Customs Union among the six of them), and other countries of Western Europe. The entry by the United Kingdom into such a free trade arrangement with European countries would entail the removal by defined stages of its customs duties on the products of such countries in return for reciprocal action on their part toward United Kingdom products. The United Kingdom proposes that this arrangement would not apply to foodstuffs, foods, beverages or tobacco. In that event such advantages as are now accorded by the United Kingdom to imports of these particular products from other Commonwealth countries would not be affected.

Even with the exclusion of these products, the changes in United Kingdom and European trading relations involved in the carrying out of those proposals would present a number of problems for Canadian trade with the countries concerned. The various possible effects upon Canada's trade and upon our existing trade arrangements will require detailed study by the government and thorough discussions with the other Governments concerned. The Canadian Government will, of course, participate on a constructive basis in any such discussions.

It will be important that the carrying out of these proposals proceed according to a definite programme and on a firm time-table and be accompanied by appropriate internal economic policies. The proposed new arrangement will have the most widespread beneficial effects if it is brought into being with a minimum of discrimination against the trade of other countries and if the expansion of mutually advantageous trading relations with other countries is encouraged.

If the proposals are carried through with determination, and at the same time the countries concerned proceed forthrightly with the removal of other trade barriers between themselves, and also against other countries as they are already pledged to do, it should be possible to surmount any difficulties which may be created and to increase the flow of trade, and maintain the ties, between this large European area and the rest of the world. On the other hand, a partial development that resulted only in the creation of a new system of intra-European tariff preferences would interfere with trade between Europe and other countries, including Canada, without achieving the positive results which are expected from a full implementing of the plan. Similarly, it would be a matter of concern to us if the pursuit of this European objective, worthy as it is, were to result in an increase in tariffs against non-European countries or in less effort or willingness to reduce the other barriers to the development of competitive multilateral trade, which is the over-riding objective of the Canadian Government and of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Should the proposals be adopted and successfully carried through by Britain and nations of Western Europe they should increase the economic strength and prosperity of the peoples of that whole great area and also their sense of solidarity and common purpose even beyond the economic field. Such a result could not fail to be welcomed by Canadians whose cultural, political and security interests as well as economic welfare have been, and are, so closely linked with that part of the world.

FREE TRADE AREA IN EUROPE; STATEMENT OF U.K. PROPOSALS
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE OCT. 11)

12. The Prime Minister submitted a revision of the announcement to be issued concerning the proposals that the United Kingdom join a free trade area embracing most of western Europe.

A revised draft statement had been circulated.

13. During the discussion a number of minor changes were made. It was also suggested that the present was not the appropriate moment to make this announcement. However, the Minister of Finance should, in the next few days, send an official reply along the lines of the contents of the statement to be made public subsequently to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's original message communicating the U.K. proposals to the government.

14. The Cabinet approved the statement, as amended during the discussion, concerning the Canadian views on United Kingdom proposals for joining a free trade area in Europe and agreed,

(a) that the timing of the release of the statement be considered at a subsequent meeting,[32] and,

(b) that the Minister of Finance send an official reply† along the lines of the proposed public announcement to the original message on this subject from the U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer.[33]

IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADA OF THE FORMATION OF A EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET AND FREE TRADE AREA

Attached is a revision of the paper on this subject originally prepared in D.L.(1). It would probably be desirable to have a discussion of this within our own Department at an early date. If you agree perhaps you would care to set the time for a meeting.

IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADA OF THE FORMATION OF A EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET AND FREE TRADE AREA

Now that the United Kingdom has decided to negotiate with the European Common Market countries on a Free Trade Area customs arrangement with the Common Market, it is necessary for the Canadian Government to consider what commercial policy it should follow in the new situation that will result. Canadian trade policy since 1947 has been based upon the non-discriminatory principles of the GATT and upon the benefits to be obtained from the series of multilateral tariff negotiations which have taken place in the GATT. We have benefited particularly from reductions in the U.S. tariff due to U.S. negotiations with Canada and with other GATT members.

The value of tariff reductions by most other GATT members had, however, been inhibited by their retention, in varying degrees, of quantitative restrictions sometimes applied because of balance of payments disequilibrium and sometimes for other less justifiable reasons. The prospect of further worthwhile negotiations under GATT (which would depend on the possibility of substantial U.S. tariff reductions) seems very slight in the foreseeable future. The European common market initiative is in part a response to the inability of the U.S. Government to hold out any immediate prospect of substantial tariff reductions and the alleged persistence of what is termed by European governments a "structural" European balance of payments deficit on current account. Although some countries such as Germany, Benelux and Switzerland are really in very strong balance of payments positions, they allow their progress towards freer trade and convertibility to be held back to suit the convenience of their weaker trading partners in the EPU.

The Common Market

There are three fundamental ideas, often repeated by Spaak, behind the Common Market initiative:

1. The political necessity of uniting Western Europe. The schemes for purely political and defence integration having failed, the initiative is now being directed through the economic and nuclear fields.

2. The general economic necessity of forming a large market in Europe so that this area will be able to compete in broad terms with the USSR and the United States. This necessity is in response to the apparent greater rates of economic growth in the USSR and North America and the fear that Europe will progressively lose ground and become a relatively "under-developed area" unless steps are taken to remove inhibiting trade and financial restrictions.

3. The necessity to unify and strengthen Western Europe's voice and bargaining power in international political and economic negotiations. In the trade field increased European bargaining power would be directed toward lowering the U.S. tariff and perhaps the Canadian tariff (with the possible alternative of increasing Western Europe's contacts with the Soviet bloc).

The Common Market countries (Germany, France, Italy and Benelux) have in mind the removal of tariffs within the common market area by stages automatically over a period of 12-15 years and the progressive formation of a common external tariff wall vis-à-vis non-participating countries.

European Free Trade Area

The United Kingdom proposal is the formation of a European Free Trade Area in association with the European Common Market. They envisage tariff reductions within the Free Market Area pari passu with Common Market reductions while permitting EFTA countries to maintain individual tariffs vis-à-vis non-participating countries. The U.K. insist that foodstuffs, feeds, beverages and tobacco should be excluded from the Free Trade Area but it should be anticipated that, if the Free Trade Area scheme is successful there will be pressure to include these groups of products at a later stage. The pressure would come particularly from the European agricultural exporters.

The fundamental reason for the U.K. switch of policy lay in the dilemma which faced them. On the one hand, if the Common Market were to succeed discriminatory tariffs would be raised against U.K. exports to important markets on the continent (one-quarter of their total exports go to Europe). On the other hand, if the Common Market failed, U.K. opposition would be blamed and a vacuum would be left in Europe in which it would be difficult to stimulate unity or even cooperation. The willingness of the U.K. to associate in this fashion will of course make it more likely that the Common Market itself will at least be initiated.

Canadian Position and Alternative Courses of Action

Canada is now faced with a somewhat similar dilemma to that faced by the U.K. earlier this year though her trading picture is different. The first question to answer is whether we are convinced that the free market area will materialize. There are of course tremendous difficulties to be overcome, but it would be dangerous at this stage not to assume (in view of the U.K. initiative) that some form of preferential area will be initiated.

It is well to bear in mind, however, that the formation of a Common Market or EFTA is not an alternative to the adoption by the European countries of proper internal fiscal monetary and general economic policies. Indeed it would seem that more stringent internal policies would be necessary. These fields of readjustment will remain as difficult as in the past and it is by no means sure or even likely that an area market free of tariffs will be realized in 10 to 15 years. The period required for the complete elimination of tariffs may be a good deal longer, if indeed the initiative maintains its momentum. This prospect would raise the possibility that Europe might be only partially unified by the CM and EFTA initiatives but would raise permanent discrimination against non-participating countries including Canada.

If the judgment is accepted that the CM and EFTA are likely to result in the initiation of some form of preferential area, a variety of Canadian reactions are possible. A few of the principal ones are discussed below.

A. NO BASIC CHANGE IN CANADIAN POLICY

One reaction would be to allow the formation of a European Free Trade Area and Common Market to take its course without any fundamental change in Canadian commercial policy. We could continue to base our trade policy on full compliance with our obligations in the GATT, agree to a GATT waiver (or a favourable Decision under Article XXIV) for the European countries and continue to extend MFN treatment to them. We would probably renegotiate some of our British preferences in the light of the UK/Canada exchange of Notes in 1947. We would probably also consider raising certain tariffs negotiated with EFTA countries.

i. Economic Repercussions

Even if agricultural products were excluded, progressively increasing European discrimination against other Canadian exports would develop. Studies made by the Department of Trade & Commerce have indicated that something like 10% of our current exports to the UK would be affected; but this figure does not take account of the potentially larger amount of trade which would take place if QRs were removed. The percentage would also be larger if all of Europe were included. The short-term effect of this discrimination would be to reduce Canadian exports without any compensation except to the extent that we were prepared to make some consequential adjustments in our tariff. Although it is the present intention of the UK to ensure that our main exports would not initially be subject to discrimination, we must not rule out the possibility that discrimination might at a later stage develop for some or all of these as well.

In the longer run the European market for Canadian products should increase if the formation of a Free Trade area stimulates economic growth and higher European standards of living. Such encouragement as the Canadian Government has given the United Kingdom has been conditional upon the scheme resulting in lower rather than higher barriers to trade. At the same time there can be no categorical assurance that this will be the case.

ii. Political Repercussions

If the Canadian Government were prepared to refrain from substantial retaliation in the face of discrimination from a Free Trade Area in view of our desire to promote greater European unity, our policy would be most welcome to the Europeans and would be a significant contribution to the success of the scheme. The U.S. would also presumably appreciate our taking on some of the burden of the scheme. We should however expect some complaints from that part of the Canadian export industry which would be affected.

The fact that a large united Free Market in Europe would be in a position to bargain on an equal basis with the U.S. and USSR raises the possibility that it might find concessions more easily available from the latter than the former. Closer European economic relations with the USSR at a time when tariff discrimination against North America was being established, could raise political issues for North Atlantic unity. The possible effect on the NATO defence structure is also to be borne in mind.

B. CANADIAN ASSOCIATION WITH THE EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA

The first point to be made here is that there are a wide variety of proposals for Canadian association which could be put forward. These range from full membership — which would involve us in automatic tariff reductions vis-à-vis Europe and consequent discrimination vis-à-vis the United States at the same rate as the European countries — to relatively mild forms of association in which Canada would make only limited tariff changes.

There is no certainty that the European countries would wish Canadian participation or association. It is probable that most of them would not wish to see the United States with its powerful competitive capacity join the area; this would negate one of the principal reasons some of them have for forming the area. It is probable, too, that they have not given much consideration to the possibility of Canada entering into an association with the area without the United States. While there would be some reluctance to extend the arrangement to a non-European country, it is by no means certain that the European countries would be opposed to Canadian association. If there were any desire, on the part of the Canadian Government to avoid some of the risks of non-participation by taking on some of the risks of participation, a wide field of negotiation might be available.

In order to secure non-discriminatory treatment for Canadian exports in a Free Trade Area — or at least some more preferential treatment than that accorded under the mfn tariff — the Canadian Government would have to be agreeable to some degree of preference for Free Trade Area products: (1) We might consider offering to extend British Preferential rates to the European Free Trade Area in return for equivalent Canadian participation in the Area markets. (2) We might extent an equitable share (either by product or by percentage) of our British Preferential rates to the European Free Trade Area in return for more limited benefits in the Area. (3) We might prefer to disregard the British Preferential schedules in considering an offer to the Free Trade Area and merely make known our willingness to negotiate equitable preferences on receipt of Area request lists in return for Canadian participation in the EFTA. Such negotiations might take place prior to the implementation of each stage of EFTA reductions. (4) We might as an extreme course of action, offer to join the Free Trade Area as a full member. The consequence of this would be that we would be obliged automatically to reduce the Canadian tariff vis-à-vis the area by stages to zero — subject to the same escape clauses as are provided for all other members.

(i) Economic Repercussions

The economic repercussions of various forms and degrees of Canadian participation in EFTA would depend in degree on the extent to which we became involved, but the general tendencies would be similar.

(a) Internal Repercussions

To the extent that we were able to ensure Area Preferential treatment for Canadian exports, the Government could expect a favourable reaction from interested Canadian industries. United States-owned branch plants in Canada might expect a substantial increase in their trade with Europe and purely Canadian competitors who would have to enter the EFTA at higher tariff rates.

To the extent that our participation in EFTA obliged us to give lower tariff rates to the U.K. and Europe, Canadian industry could be expected to offer objections. If we proceeded far enough, there might be some necessity to adjust our pattern of industrial development so as to take advantage of the more efficient division of labour over the wider Free Trade Area. The political difficulties of progressing too far in this direction are obvious.

(b) Repercussions from the United States

Owing to the very important level of U.S. exports to Canada, any move by the Canadian Government to discriminate to any degree against these imports through participation in an FTA would be bound to give rise to serious thought in Washington and an outcry from U.S. exporters. While it is true that the U.S. Government has given strong support to the CM and EFTA initiatives this has been done in the name of European integration and would hardly extend to support for special Canadian association with the area. (It is relevant to recall how strongly and emotionally the U.S. disliked the British Preferential tariff arrangements: their objections went a good deal further than would have been justified by any rational calculation of the trade effects on the U.S.).

(c) Repercussions from Other Countries

The possibility of Japanese objections would have to be borne in mind in view of our exports of wheat and other products to that country. Retaliation from other countries with interests in the Canadian market would also have to be expected. The reaction of other non-European areas of the world to the CM and EFTA initiatives could conceivably be to form their own preferential areas. Such a reaction would be the result of those initiatives and not primarily a result of Canadian association.

(d) Repercussions in the GATT

Canadian participation in EFTA in any degree less than full participation would raise difficulties in GATT, as partial association would not be consistent with the provisions of Article 24 (the Article which provides for Customs Unions and Free Trade Areas). A lesser degree of Canadian participation would therefore require a waiver, which might not be very easy to obtain.

(ii) Political Repercussions

Mention has been made above of the objections the United States could be expected to register if Canada decided upon association with the EFTA. In addition, the United States would be that much more isolated economically. This could have political effects in terms of United States attitudes towards the NATO countries and NATO itself. If Canada and the United States could be associated with an EFTA upon somewhat similar terms the North Atlantic economic community (and therefore the political community) would become more closely knit. But it seems evident that for a good many years the Europeans will not be willing to reduce their tariff protection against United States competition and will therefore not admit the U.S. into any very meaningful association with the EFTA. If such association was denied the U.S. but conceded to Canada the political effects might be rather unfortunate.

C. FORMATION OF A CANADA/U.S. BLOC

Another possible course that has been suggested is that Canada might take steps to form an economic trading area with the United States. It is not inconceivable that the United States might suggest this. This type of arrangement would presumably envisage reciprocal Canada/U.S. tariff reductions on the Free Trade Area principle or possibly on the Common Market principle.

It is very questionable whether our bargaining position would be very strong vis-à-vis the United States. We should also be encouraging increased U.S. influence in the Canadian market and, depending on the extent to which we lowered our tariffs vis-à-vis the U.S., we would become even more dependent on their internal fiscal and monetary policy and on U.S. economic fluctuations.

Politically our dependence on the U.S. would be increased and we would be alone and weak in any opposition which we might wish to offer to American policies. The formation of a U.S./Canada bloc would provide some additional strength to the U.S., but it would have the effect of widening the economic isolation of North America from Europe.

Conclusions

It is not the purpose of this paper to arrive at conclusions but merely to sketch some of the possible courses facing the Canadian Government on the assumption that the European countries are successful in initiating a Common Market and Free Trade Area. The technical study of what tariff arrangements Canada could attempt to negotiate is primarily a matter for the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce. It is not too early, however, to begin thinking about some of the implications and repercussions of the various arrangements that might be possible.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Although the six countries hope to sign the treaty on the common market on January 15 it is still far from clear to us (and we believe to other "outside" countries) what its terms will be. We understand it is now possible there may be a special session of GATT in March to consider the treaty prior to ratification. This makes it a matter of some urgency for us to formulate our views of the specific arrangements that may be envisaged.

2. We would be grateful if you would point out to the government to which you are accredited that from the beginning we have been taking it for granted

(a) that while the terms of the treaty may not be entirely consistent with the letter of Article 24 of the GATT they will faithfully reflect the general intent of that article;

(b) that in respect of matters not dealt with in Article 24 for example Quantitative Restrictions there will be no provisions inconsistent with the other provisions of GATT.

We should be grateful to have confirmation that these assumptions on our part have been correct.

3. A senior official of Trade and Commerce, Mr. M. Schwarzmann, is to attend the meeting of the OEEC working party on the free trade area in Paris on January 8 and 9. Following that meeting it is our hope that he may have talks with officials of the French Government about the Common Market Treaty and then visit some or all of the other four "Messina" capitals for similar discussions. Although we cannot yet give you his precise time table, we would be glad if you would inform appropriate officials of our hope that Schwarzmann will be able to visit your capital for this purpose. We would hope you could arrange for him to see responsible officials directly concerned with the negotiations so that these talks may be as useful and meaningful as possible. We would not however wish the reply to our enquiry in paragraph 2 above to be held up until Schwarzmann arrives.

4. Very tentatively Schwarzmann would expect to be in Paris from January 8-11, Brussels January 14 and 15, The Hague January 17 and 18, and Bonn about January 21. He may not go to Rome if he finds he can see Italian officials in Paris or Brussels. He will confirm dates from Paris.

FREE TRADE AREA

We have been informed by Earnscliffe (see CRO telegram December 22 which you have been given) of the accelerated time table for negotiation of the Customs Union and the Free Trade Area. This corroborates information we have received from OEEC circles in Paris. It appears possible that the Customs Union Treaty may be referred for approval to a special session in March of the Contracting Parties to GATT.

2. On important aspects of the Customs Union not much information has as yet been made available. In view of the short time until we may be faced with decisions on our own position in GATT, we are sending a representative from Ottawa (Schwarzmann of Trade and Commerce) to attend OEEC working party 17 on January 8 and then to visit each of the Messina capitals in succession to find out what he can. We are hoping that he will visit London about January 24 for discussions there. In this connection please refer to our telegram EE-499 of December 28. We would like you to inform interested United Kingdom officials of the plans being made for Schwarzmann's trip.

3. In addition we would like you to register with UK officials as soon as possible some observations and questions regarding the Free Trade Area which are set forth in paragraphs 4 and 5 below. These arise out of the statements made by the President of the Board of Trade and by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the ministerial meetings on the free trade area in Ottawa and Washington last September, on the basis of which our Prime Minister made his public statement on November 13. Since then Earnscliffe has provided us with progress reports from time to time, which we have appreciated, and these have of course been supplemented by reports from Paris and elsewhere. From all of this information it would appear that a quite considerable process of erosion may have been taking place in the United Kingdom's position which was initially put to us in categorical terms. While our questions are not exhaustive nor necessarily indicative of any changes in views here, they do reflect our desire and concern to ascertain whether such a process has been at work and if so to what extent.

4. With respect to Quantitative Restrictions and discrimination we were informed that there will be full and unqualified compliance with the GATT rules. This would mean that the balance of payments provisions of GATT would continue to define the circumstances in which restrictions (and discrimination) could be applied and that there would be no impairment of the obligation of a country applying restrictions to dismantle them as soon as possible. Although we were of course told that the Free Trade Area would provide by stages for the reduction of tariffs we were not told of any programme for the reduction of Quantitative Restrictions other than by reference to the rules of GATT. In contrast to this position we have been quite disturbed to find responsible Europeans who take it for granted that the Common Market will include arrangements for the discriminatory application of Quantitative Restrictions by the participants in favour of each other. At the October session of the Contracting Parties to GATT we were impelled to state our concern that any plans for removal of restrictions in the Messina group should be consistent with the GATT rules. We cannot of course hold the UK responsible for views held in Europe but we have been surprised at the apparent absence of efforts by the UK to reach clear cut understandings on the use of Quantitative Restrictions with the other countries concerned to implement the intentions which UK ministers expressed to us. We would be interested in knowing whether UK views on the use of Quantitative Restrictions and discrimination have changed since September.

5. The UK intended to insist that definite and irrevocable arrangements should be made applicable to individual tariff items so that businessmen would know where they stand, and it was intended in addition that the part played by tariff escape clauses would be negligible. We would gather particularly from attitude taken by the UK in the OEEC working party on escape clauses relating to general depression and problems of particular industries that both of these objectives had been considerably modified. We would be interested to know the present position.

6. In the message referred to in paragraph 1 above our views were requested on the problem of associating Greece, Turkey, Portugal, Republic of Ireland and Iceland with the Free Trade Area and also on the inclusion of dependent overseas territories in the Free Trade Area and the Customs Union. At this stage we are not in a position to express our views on either of these subjects. In our opinion however the matters referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 above are of more basic importance to the success of the Customs Union and of the Free Trade Area. With respect to the "under-developed" European countries the considerations we have in mind at this stage are that while we fully recognize the motives impelling the inclusion of other OEEC and NATO countries the health of the whole movement requires integrity at the centre. Consequently we would hope that any arrangements devised for their association would not be such as to dilute the rules governing the plan as a whole. We wish however to reserve our views both on this question and on the complex question of the position of the colonies. We would however draw your attention to the several references in the CRO telegram to the use of quotas; this is relevant to our enquiry in paragraph 4 above.

7. We shall explain to Earsncliffe that we would normally have replied through them to the two questions they put to us. Since these replies are related to these other matters however we are including them in this message.

FREE TRADE AREA

We discussed the points raised in your message with France (Treasury) Bretherton (Board of Trade) and Crawley (CRO) at a meeting convened for this purpose yesterday.

2. UK officials thought that, before replying on specific issues, they ought to underline a general point which it was important to bear in mind. Mandate of working party had been restricted to examination of practical feasibility of creating Free Trade Area in Europe around Customs Union nucleus. This meant that prospective members were not at this stage committed to particular procedures for setting up Free Trade Area. It also accounted for omission from scope of report of some of the broader issues you had raised and to which careful consideration would, no doubt, have to be given at a later stage.

3. It is assumed here that your apprehensions are due in part at least to discussions taking place in Customs Union context and timetable to which Messina countries are now working. While it now looked as if Common Market Treaty was unlikely to be signed before early February, tight schedule which had been adopted at Brussels was matter of equal concern to UK. They were concerned, in particular, lest irrevocable decisions be taken at Brussels which might make it more difficult to formulate an acceptable Free Trade Area scheme. This is likely to be main burden of UK representations to Spaak when he visits London later this month and memorandum in this sense has already been presented to him.

4. UK officials assured us that their position had not changed to any significant extent since Thorneycroft and Macmillan outlined Free Trade Area proposals to their Commonwealth colleagues in Washington. In general terms UK position remains that commitments on tariffs and quotas should be as rigid as is practicable in existing circumstances while some of the other problems involved in creation of Free Trade Area should be left to work themselves out on basis of actual experience in operating scheme. This is because dismantling of tariffs and quotas is core of Free Trade Area scheme while attempt to deal with their problems before they materialize is more likely than not to introduce element of inflexibility which UK regard as undesirable and unnecessary.

5. UK views on tariff reductions have admittedly moved somewhat from original position which had been to press for strictly linear approach to reductions. (It has however been pretty clear all along that they might have to be satisfied with something less). On the other hand, they had been able to move Messina powers to adopt at least semi-linear scheme. In their view there may be something to be said for additional flexibility this provides if only because use of escape clauses could be held to strict minimum in this way.

6. As far as escape clauses were concerned, working party's report did not provide for their use in any form in event of general crisis or economic depression. Decision that emergencies of this kind should be dealt with on ad hoc basis in light of existing circumstances reflects UK point of view. In case of balance of payments difficulties report makes it clear that derogations from commitments to reduce tariffs are regarded as unsuitable and prejudicial to effective operation of Free Trade Area scheme. Even where difficulties are encountered in specific economic sectors, raising of tariffs or reimposition of tariffs already reduced is not contemplated. Europeans continue to feel, however, that there is case for postponement in further reduction of tariffs unless greater reliance were to be placed on recourse to quotas. UK officials gave us to understand that this was a point on which their minds were not yet firmly made up.

7. In matter of Quantitative Restrictions and conformity of their application with GATT rules, UK officials suggested that it would be a mistake at this stage to look for anything positive in working party report. It was more important to see whether there was anything in it that contravened GATT provisions. In UK view report insofar as it carried any external implications contained no challenge to GATT. It was in fact conceivable that as time went on a régime more stringent than GATT rules governing use of Quantitative Restrictions might develop in Free Trade Area context. This is implied in annex to working party report dealing with escape clauses which states that provisions of GATT have been "considered as a minimum basis".

8. While we conceded that working party report did not by and large concern itself with relationship between Free Trade Area and third countries we drew attention of UK officials to tentative provisions which had been worked out for use of Quantitative Restrictions in case of difficulties in specific sectors of production. This would amount in fact to using Quantitative Restrictions for protective purposes and it did not seem to us that even liberal interpretation of emergency provision of Article XIX(1) of GATT would justify their use in these circumstances. Nor was hard-core waiver designed to meet this kind of problem. UK officials undertook to look into this point which we understand is due in any case to be discussed again in working party.

9. On association of "underdeveloped" European countries and overseas territories with Free Trade Area we informed UK officials that this was problem to which you would wish to give further thought although general considerations you had asked us to convey to them were bound equally to affect Canadian attitude on this matter. UK officials are in entire agreement with your view that "health of whole movement required integrity at centre". This was in fact essence of problem. Problem of association of overseas territories was not one of urgency but this was not true of association of underdeveloped European countries on which UK felt they had to formulate views even in advance of OEEC ministerial meeting scheduled for February. Countries concerned were pressing their claim to participate in Free Trade Area with considerable insistence and with little ostensible concern about whether or not "integrity" of scheme would be impaired. UK are afraid that they might well be disposed to block progress in OEEC unless account was taken of their position. In view of UK concern and need for early decision on their part as to how problem is to be handled you might consider briefing Schwarzmann for working party meeting of January 8.

10. UK officials will be glad to discuss further with Scharzmann general points raised in your message and any others which may have given rise to Canadian concern. It was also suggested that, before coming to London he might establish contact with Bretherton who will be representing UK at meeting of OEEC working party next week.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

1. Following for Schwarzmann. Your questions and discussions on the Messina plan will of course be affected according to your own judgment by the portion of the draft treaty which we received and which you were able to peruse very hastily before leaving. A summary is contained in our telegram E-35 of January 8. The following comments on the draft may helpfully supplement your own impression of it.

2. There are provisions for the reduction of tariffs by 60% on the average and for the reduction of each item by 50% over a period of eight years. This means that participants must take substantial bites out of their hard core of sensitive items during the first two stages. However, there are apparently no plans whatsoever for the third stage, either for its duration or for the progress to be made in eliminating tariffs and the lack of such plans would seem to be in conflict with GATT Article XXIV.

3. There is a provision for the modification by unanimous decision of the Council of the rules applicable to tariff reductions. We take it that the GATT would not be asked for advance approval of this provision and that such unanimous decisions of the Council would be referred to the GATT for approval before being put into force.

4. The tariff escape clause has not been included in the draft we have although we understand there will be such a clause.

5. There is no indication of how the arithmetical average of existing tariff rates is to be calculated in establishing the new rates. We are unable at short notice to form a judgment on how much difference it will make to eliminate temporary suspensions and rates of duty below 3 percent from the calculation of arithmetical average duties on certain products. While the ceilings appear reasonable, (3 percent for raw materials and 10 percent for semi-finished products) we shall defer judgment on this until we are able to appraise the force of the exceptions which are stated and the methods of calculation which are adopted. There is no indication of the level of the common tariff applicable to finished products.

6. With regard to Quantitative Restrictions, we are of course favourably impressed by the two general provisions which are designed to eliminate conflict with the GATT. We are quite seriously disturbed, however, by the definite commitments set forth to eliminate Quantitative Restrictions within the Common Market whether or not the balance of payments of each country is in order, and whether or not QR's against outside countries are treated similarly. This is of course in conflict with GATT. Furthermore, we think the acceptance of the obligations to eliminate quotas among the participants might impair their ability to eliminate quotas against the outside world. Similar objections would apply to the undertaking never to reimpose QR's against any member country.

7. We also note that one of the objectives of the common commercial policy of the Six is to achieve uniformity in their liberalization measures and they will encourage the setting up of a common list of liberalization vis-à-vis third countries. You are aware that we have consistently opposed such a list because participants would be inclined to follow the pace of the slowest members.

FREE TRADE AREA

1. We have been told by Earnscliffe that the UK government are now at work on a memorandum to be tabled in OEEC within the next two or three weeks setting out their basic principles for negotiation of a Free Trade Area. This information gives us a good opportunity to revert to some of the points in our telegram EE-506 December 28 on which we found the UK replies which you conveyed in your telegram 7 January 3 rather unsatisfactory.

2. We had not overlooked the terms of reference of the working party. It would be unrealistic however to suppose that its report would not form the starting point of the negotiations that will follow, or to expect that many important elements of the approach so carefully devised by the working party could be renegotiated.

3. It is true that a good deal of our concern stems from what we believe to have been worked out in Brussels, having in mind as we must the fact that there will be strong pressure (as the working party report recognizes) to make the provisions in a Free Trade Area treaty with respect the elimination of tariffs and quotas identical or very similar to the provisions in the Brussels treaty.

4. In your paragraph 4 you quoted the UK view that the dismantling of tariffs and quotas is the heart of the scheme; and this is of course fully consistent with the approaches that have been followed in Brussels and Paris. In Ottawa and Washington however the elimination of tariffs was the core of the Free Trade Area scheme adumbrated by the UK, and such mention as there was of Quantitative Restrictions was accompanied by the assurance that the GATT rules would prevail. It is true enough that nothing in the working party's report explicitly denies that the GATT rules will prevail, but it seems to us much more likely than not that a firm commitment to reduce QR's within the group by a certain percentage in each phase will result in situations inconsistent with the GATT rules. In this connection see our telegram E-36 January 8. We are not simply being purists or "high priests of GATT" in expressing this concern. The principles in Article 24 were designed (a) to give a reasonable degree of protection to the interests of outside countries (b) to ensure that the economic health of the participating countries would not be jeopardized by excessive protection against the rest of the world; and (c) so as not to prevent a country in balance of payments difficulties from imposing QR's against its partners in a customs union to protect its balance of payments. These safeguards could be completely nullified if a discriminatory system of quantitative restrictions became a central part of the treaties. If the UK is leaving this aspect of the Free Trade Area to be settled at a later stage as the first sentence of your paragraph 7 seems to imply we are pretty apprehensive about the outcome. (We think it more likely that they have already decided upon their attitude but are reluctant to enlighten us at this stage).

5. On the question of tariffs from what we have heard about the draft Brussels treaty reasonably clear provision is made for the reduction of tariffs by 60% but there is no programme for the elimination of the other 40%. Surely as time goes on it will become more and more difficult to agree on the plan for this last and most difficult phase. If the Six cannot agree on such programme now is it likely to be easier for them to do so as the time draws nearer and their most sensitive industries rally to defend themselves? In view of the UK concern to have certainty and fore knowledge of future tariff changes we would expect UK officials to be quite worried about this aspect of the Customs Union plan.

FREE TRADE AREA

Schwarzmann and Goldschlag had a meeting with Arnold France (Treasury) on January 11. The meeting was also attended by Figgures (Treasury) Bretherton (Board of Trade) and a representative of the CRO.

2. We told the UK side that the time was close at hand when Canada would have to take a formal position and formulate future policy on the plans at present under discussion for closer economic integration in Europe. We explained the general Canadian position on these plans in the terms of the Prime Minister's statement. In particular, we suggested that in our view the countries concerned should, as a matter of urgency, define more clearly the implications of their proposed arrangements for third countries. It was our feeling that this had not so far been done apart from vague general references that the arrangements would conform with commitments under GATT and IMF.

3. On the basis of the assurances given to us by UK ministers last September, we hoped that we could count on the UK to exert their influence in this direction at their forthcoming talks with Spaak. While we realized that we could not hold the UK responsible for the Customs Union arrangements, we felt that as partners in a joint programme under GATT and IMF we and they had a right to exert our influence on these arrangements and that both the Customs Union and the Free Trade Area would be directly affected by the nature of their relations with the outside world. The possibility of repercussions on the commercial policy of third countries, including Canada, was a case in point. The UK side did not demur. France pointed out, however, that the assurances given to us reflected UK views but that, to the extent that others were involved, these views were necessarily subject to the exigencies of negotiation.

4. We questioned the UK side closely on the subject of Quantitative Restrictions and discrimination. It was clear that UK views in this matter were at considerable variance with ours and we left them in no doubt that this was the case. The following are the principal points which emerged from our discussion.

(a) We derived the clear impression that the UK regard the dispensation given by Article XXIV of GATT to discriminate as covering not only tariffs but also "other regulations of commerce" including Quantitative Restrictions; in other words, they would seem to maintain that a discriminatory elimination of Quantitative Restriction is inherent in the concept of a Customs Union or a Free Trade Area.

(b) At the same time, the UK continue to regard themselves as bound by GATT and IMF and by their own commitment under the collective approach to press forward with the removal of all Quantitative Restrictions as rapidly as the situation permits. This did not mean, however, that the reduction of Quantitative Restrictions against third countries would necessarily follow the same pace or cover the same products as the programme of internal reductions within the Free Trade Area. But they foresaw that strong internal pressures to remove Quantitative Restrictions against third countries were bound to develop as the Free Trade Area arrangements went forward.

(c) We suggested that this approach would also raise serious issues of principle for us since it appeared to establish new and different criteria from those now governing our relations under which discriminatory restrictions can be justified only on balance of payments grounds. In reply the UK side expressed some surprise that we should now raise this issue in relation to the 6 percent of their trade which was still subject to quota when we had not raised it in relation to the 94 percent which had already been liberalized on the same basis. They added that the whole process of OEEC liberalization appeared to have been accepted and claimed that the principle underlying it had also been accepted by implication in the Benelux Customs Union and in the granting of the Belgian waiver.

(d) The UK agreed with us that the Customs Union would not justify a common approach by member countries to the removal of Quantitative Restrictions against third countries unless there was a common balance of payments. Moreover, if the UK ran into balance of payments difficulties as a member of the Free Trade Area, they would impose Quantitative Restrictions applicable both within and outside the area.

(e) With respect to the possibility of the UK seeking a GATT hardcore waiver after the removal of balance of payments restrictions, we said we assumed that they would seek such a waiver without modification. The UK side replied that the Free Trade Area commitments meant that they might, in practice, have to seek a waiver from the hardcore waiver so as to enable them to discriminate in favour of their Free Trade Area partners. They added that this would probably have been necessary in any event and that they thought this had been explained to us at Geneva. We expressed serious concern about the concept of a discriminatory waiver and stressed that we had accepted the GATT hardcore waiver reluctantly and only on condition that it would be on a nondiscriminatory basis. Any further widening of the agreed rules was likely to make it increasingly difficult for Canada to maintain the kind of trade policy which we had been following.

5. As far as the use of escape clauses in the Free Trade Area was concerned the UK said that Quantitative Restrictions could be imposed in case of balance of payments difficulties and these, as we had been told, would in their own case be of general application. Where the difficulty was encountered in a specific industry, the UK had not yet been able to formulate any clear view as to the measures that might be required. Part of the problem was that an industry might be faced with difficulties which did not stem from the establishment of the Free Trade Area, in which case the GATT procedure under Article XIX could be used. If the difficulties did, however, relate directly to the establishment of the Free Trade Area, the best means of coping with them might be a delay in the internal programme of tariff reductions. We thought it important however, to remind the UK of the danger that any new criteria for an escape clause action might well serve as a lever for protectionist groups in the USA to press for a general broadening of the escape clause procedures in GATT.

6. On agriculture, the UK feel that they are in not too strong a position to register their concern about the restrictive arrangements being considered at Brussels. They also feel that the USA is in a similarly weak position to intervene affectively. They suggested, therefore, that it might be useful if we were to raise this issue in our discussions with the Messina powers. The UK do not believe that the agricultural arrangements of the Customs Union will be such as to conform with Article XXIV of the GATT and we have the impression that they are concerned to have this point emerge clearly so as to be able to show that the treatment of agriculture which they advocate represents, on balance, a less objectionable alternative.

7. It was agreed that we would have another meeting with the UK side when Schwarzmann returns to London later this month.

EUROPAN CUSTOMS UNION

We followed up by phone yesterday with Isaiah Frank the meeting of Canadian and American officials which was held at the State Department the day before (Tuesday) on this subject. Frank informed us that they were in the process of drafting a telegram in which would be set out the USA position and views on the latest information available (largely the Brussels reports) about the provisions of the proposed Customs Union. We must emphasize that these views, which Frank outlined to us and which are set out below, have not yet been cleared in the State Department and with other departments and agencies concerned. Nonetheless, Frank explained, they were anxious to keep us fully and currently informed of what they were doing and proposed to do.

2. Frank said that they had given a good deal of thought as to how these views might be communicated so that they would have the maximum impact on the discussions now going on in Europe. He explained that hitherto USA views had been expressed rather sporadically, in general terms and usually at the working level. On this occasion, however, it is their intention to communicate their views directly to Mr. Spaak as Chairman of the Heads of Delegations of the Messina countries. Frank thought that they would also be registered in each of the six capitals concerned.

3. The summary of the USA views as they stand at present is as follows:

Agriculture. USA officials think it advisable not to be too specific at this stage and consider that it would be unwise to make concrete suggestions as to what the Customs Union Treaty should provide with respect to the agricultural sector. The USA will therefore express misgivings about some of the proposed provisions of the treaty and will state its opposition to provisions which would be along certain lines. The USA will make clear that in its view the treaty should be designed (1) so as to lead to a common market in agricultural products and (2) to ensure for the exports of non-members treatment no less favourable than they now enjoy, account being taken of course of the inherent tariff "discrimination" involved in a common market arrangement. Frank explained that the language which they would use in commenting on a treaty which would not contain these two basic provisions is still to be negotiated within the administration.

Tariffs. The USA will seek clarification on a number of points: the 7 per cent provision (where any member can require that the common tariff be negotiated with its fellow-members); the apparent exclusion in the "arithmetic average" (to arrive at the common tariff) of duty-free items; the level of the common tariff on agricultural commodities. The USA will also enquire about the Customs Union provisions envisaged for the removal of the remaining 40 per cent of tariff after the end of the second period (8th year); Frank explained that they would probably be satisfied if the treaty contained a firm commitment that all tariffs between the members will have been removed at the end of the transitional period — but they are not sure, he said, that such was in fact envisaged.

Q.R.'s. Frank confirmed that their interpretation of Article XXIV and Articles XI-XIV is the same as ours and this is the view which they will now make known in Europe. He referred briefly to the comments which had been made at the meeting on Tuesday about the possible exception to this interpretation which might have to be made "eventually" with respect to the dismantling of existing Q.R.'s as between the members of the Customs Union in a way which would discriminate against non-members. He said that he had in mind writing to Wyndham White in Geneva to enquire about these points of interpretation. We informed him on a personal basis of the interpretation which was contrary to the interpretation on which both Canadian and American officials agreed.

I. RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE CUSTOMS UNION AND FREE TRADE AREA PROPOSALS

1. Mr. Isbister reviewed summarily recent events relating to the Customs Union and the Free Trade Area. A draft had recently been obtained of important portions of the Customs Union Treaty relating to tariffs and quotas. After receiving this information, a meeting had been arranged in Washington with representatives of the economic side of the United States State Department and other interested departments. Worthwhile information was exchanged with the United States officials whose approach to the common market proposals appeared to be in harmony with that of Canada. On the basis of the information at hand he recommended that representations should be made urgently at a high level to the Messina Governments to indicate Canada's concern about certain of the conclusions they appeared to be reaching in their negotiations. Although it was possible that the Messina powers might disregard such comments, it was thought important nevertheless to register our views at this stage. Some objectionable principles established in the Messina Treaty might well be extended to the Free Trade Area and to the overseas dependent territories. Ultimately the Sterling area might also become involved. He recognized the danger of such a trading bloc being based on principles which would tend to discourage trade and financial relations with dollar countries and other outside countries.

Although the participants in a Customs Union are supposed to abolish tariffs within their group over a reasonable period of time, the Messina countries had evidently found great difficulties in agreeing on this. Their plans for the removal of tariffs appeared to be vague in some respects and incomplete; their timetables appeared to be indefinite and there would evidently be escape clauses.

The provisions for quantitative restrictions did not appear to be consistent with the ideas set forth in the balance of payments provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and their effect would be to encourage excessive discrimination against trade with the outside world.

Information concerning plans for agricultural trade was still quite incomplete but very disturbing. The Messina Governments were evidently discussing special arrangements, for example, by which European surpluses would be guaranteed markets, even at premium prices, at the expense of imports from abroad. Other types of special arrangements were also being considered. There was a great danger that the Customs Union might be used as a facade to establish high levels of protection against the outside world and uneconomic production in Europe. Although the United Kingdom was insisting that the Free Trade Area should exclude agricultural trade, it was quite possible that means might be found to include Free Trade Area countries in some of the special agricultural arrangements being considered by the Messina Governments.

Article XXIV of GATT which provides for Customs Unions and Free Trade Areas is so loosely drafted as to open to varying interpretations. Mr. Isbister suggested, therefore, that our representations should be based on policy considerations rather than upon a legalistic interpretation of GATT.

Mr. Isbister tabled a draft message (Annex "A")[34] containing an Aide Mémoire which Mr. Grandy had prepared in consultation with others as a basis for representations to the Messina Governments.

2. Mr. Taylor said that there were three ways of communicating Canada's views to the Messina Powers: either

(a) by sending an Aide Mémoire to Canadian ambassadors and having them register Canada's views in the usual manner; or

(b) by sending a roving ambassador to each of the Messina Powers; or

(c) by sending a personal message from one of Canada's Ministers to Mr. Spaak and to the leading Messina representatives.

3. Mr. Léger suggested that Canada adopt a joint approach with the United States. Canada could send the necessary instructions to its ambassadors while similar instructions were being sent by the U.S. State Department to its ambassadors.

4. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Although there was a danger that adverse comments from Canada might weaken the Customs Union, they would not necessarily discourage Europeans from supporting the common market proposals;

(b) Canada's comments would not necessarily influence the Messina Powers but it was felt that they should be recorded;

(c) Efforts should be made to obtain U.S. support to strengthen Canada's statement;

(d) It was most important that Canada's views should be expressed as soon as possible because the OEEC would soon be meeting to study the draft Brussels Treaty and because the U.K. intended to present a memorandum on the Treaty within the next few days;

(e) Canada and the United Kingdom hold similar views on tariffs but apparently conflicting views with regard to the use of discriminatory quantitative restrictions;

[34] Une version légèrement modifiée de ce projet se trouve dans le document 375.
A slightly amended version of this draft is printed as Document 375.

(f) It was felt that besides the U.S. there were possibly other countries such as Australia, Cuba and Japan which held views similar to Canada.

5. The meeting agreed:

(a) that Cabinet, or at least the three ministers concerned, should receive a report on recent developments in the Customs Union;

(b) that Canada should register her views on the recent Common Market developments as soon as possible;

(c) that Canada should try to get U.S. support;

(d) that the departments concerned would draft the necessary message and agree as to the best method of making Canada's views known to the Messina Powers.

6. Mr. Léger said that if this matter was not made public, he thought that the form of the message under consideration was generally acceptable. However, if this statement was made public the Department of External Affairs wanted it to be like the last paragraph of the statement issued recently by the Prime Minister (ICETP-182).

7. Mr. Sharp stated that the Department of Trade and Commerce did not want the statement under consideration watered down.

8. Mr. Hockin said that the Department of Finance agreed with this view. He thought the form of the present message was appropriate because it stated that Canada's concern was founded on information which was not verifiable but which, if true, would have serious consequences.

9. The Chairman summed up by saying that the statement should express Canada's continuing support of the integration movement in Europe while expressing Canada's fear of the Customs Union becoming a closed economic unit.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

We may decide very soon to make representations to the Six Governments involved in the Brussels negotiations for a European Customs Union in order to point out the aspects of their present plans as we understand them which could give rise to concern on our part.

My telegram E-137 January 25 contains the draft text of a note we may wish you to present at an early date. Please hold this pending further instructions.

For your own information we understand USA is making somewhat similar although more detailed representations this weekend.

Permis New York only. Draft text being cleared with Mr. Harris and probably Mr. Howe tomorrow. Please bring it to Mr. Pearson's attention.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

1. In a statement on November 13 (which was conveyed to you) the Prime Minister of Canada outlined the basis upon which the Canadian Government welcomed the successful development of a European Customs Union and Free Trade Area. In this statement Mr. St. Laurent said, among other things, "The proposed new arrangement will have its most beneficial effect if it is brought into being with a minimum of discrimination against the trade of other countries and if the expansion of mutually advantageous trading relations with other countries is encouraged"; and, "It would be a matter of concern to us if this European objective, worthy as it is, were to result in an increase in tariffs against non-European countries or in less effort or willingness to reduce the other barriers to the development of competitive multilateral trade ...".

2. We recently sought and received assurance that the provisions of the proposed treaty would be consistent with the basic principles of multilateral trade to which we have all attempted to give expression in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We welcomed this assurance; but as we have learned more about the terms of the proposed treaty it has appeared to us that there may be significant differences of interpretation of some of these principles between the Six countries and ourselves. Our concern is not primarily with the legalistic question of what is the correct interpretation of each of the relevant articles of the GATT, on which there is room for genuine differences of opinion. We are worried however about the following substantial points of policy which appear to underlie this question of interpretation. In total these are important enough that to our minds they might have a decisive bearing upon the future development of multilateral trading arrangements in general and perhaps upon the eventual success of the Customs Union itself.

Tariffs

3. On the basis of information so far available we understand that definite plans set out in the treaty only go part way in the elimination of duties between the participating countries leaving the details for the final and most difficult phase of reductions to be decided later in the light of experience. There have been indications too that some of the rules being considered for the establishment of a common tariff might in quite important respects result in duties which would be higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of duties under the present régime.

4. While we fully recognize the difficulties which are inherent in the process of eliminating internal tariffs and arriving at a common tariff we wonder whether it will be possible to obtain the confidence and support of outside countries for plans which might be represented as half-way measures.

Quantitative Restrictions

5. We have received assurances that it is the continuing firm intention of the Messina countries to make progress as rapidly as possible in the general dismantling of restrictions and discrimination affecting international trade as a whole. We have welcomed these assurances without which it would be very difficult to envisage the continuing effectiveness of the worldwide postwar agreements which provide for the strengthening and expansion of multilateral trade. Within this context we are concerned at the prospect of the proposed treaty containing provisions, with respect to quotas restrictions and discrimination, which seem designed to take priority within their scope over the relevant provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Even though we have not yet seen the proposed provisions in their entirety we feel it incumbent upon us to express our views while there is still time because non-member countries will be greatly affected by the terms of the treaty in these matters.

6. The increase in the degree of discrimination against outside imports involved in the complete removal of existing quantitative restrictions on common market trade, even though progress in the removal of restrictions against other countries were less rapid, would not necessarily be opposed by the Canadian Government. However, the impression we have gained is that the treaty provides in effect that if any member of the Common Market finds it necessary in the future to reimpose restrictions these will almost inevitably be discriminatory in character as it would only be as a last resort, and by virtue of special dispensation of the Common Market itself that restrictions of a non-discriminatory character could be imposed.

7. The Canadian government would have great difficulty in supporting arrangements which, in their effect, deprive members of the Common Market of the right provided in GATT to take appropriate measures in their own defence in the face of overall balance of payments difficulties and which would also impair their ability to eliminate quotas against the outside world. Nor would we consider it appropriate that the judgment of what measures in this field were justifiable should be exercised not by GATT but by the institutions of the Common Market. The provisions of GATT do not, in our judgment, entail that the fact of membership in a Common Market is itself a basis for discrimination, and we should be very disturbed to see enshrined in a permanent treaty provisions whose real meaning and intent was that if members of the Common Market ever had to reimpose quantitative restrictions they would, in principle, avoid adopting a non-discriminatory approach. (It goes without saying of course that if the Customs Union should eventually develop into an economic union with a common balance of payments with the rest of the world an entirely different situation would prevail and this would merit reexamination in those circumstances). We also find it disturbing to learn that the treaty may encourage the establishment of a common list of liberalized products. Since such a list would unavoidably reflect the needs of the countries in the weakest balance of payments position, and would be contrary to the principles of the GATT, we have consistently opposed such an approach in the OEEC.

Agriculture

8. We would be quite prepared to see agricultural products included fully in the Customs Union arrangements with all of the advantages attendant upon this for the flexibility, prosperity and productivity of European agriculture. We would equally be prepared to recognize that the problems of including agricultural trade on an acceptable and defensible basis might prove to be so difficult as to lead to its exclusion during the early years. We do not as yet know in any detail what provision is envisaged for trade in agricultural products. There are indications, however, that exceptional arrangements are being considered that would seem to provide for very effective protection against imports of agricultural products from the outside world, without being consistent with the general objectives of the Customs Union within the Common Market. The contracting parties to the GATT have recognized the special difficulties inherent in the liberalization of the trade in agricultural products and have made appropriate provision to meet these difficulties in the so-called "hard-core" waiver decision and in the Belgian waiver. Arrangements which would be more restrictive or of longer duration than is contemplated in these GATT decisions would give rise to considerable concern.

9. We would expect that many of the above views may be shared by other non-member countries, who may nevertheless sympathize, as we do, with the difficulties facing the participating countries in setting up the Customs Union. The Canadian Government would therefore hope that these views will be taken seriously into consideration in the final drafting of the treaty. The Canadian Government considers that a real Customs Union, if successfully implemented, will enable the six countries to play their part even more effectively in a multilateral trading world. Such a Customs Union can make a vital contribution not only to the economic strength and prosperity but also to the political solidarity and common purpose of the peoples of Western Europe. As the Prime Minister said in his statement of November 13, this outcome could not fail to be welcomed by Canadians whose security, and cultural and political heritage, as well as economic welfare, have been, and are, so closely linked with that part of the world.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

In my telegram 137 January 25 I sent you the text of a proposed note to the Six Governments concerned in the common market negotiations. Please amend that text in accordance with the alterations set out below, then consult your US colleague and if he has already delivered his note please deliver the amended text as a matter of urgency to Spaak. Please explain that this message is not intended to be made public.

2. For your own info the note was prepared in full interdepartmental consultation and has the approval of the ministers concerned.

3. Following are the amendments to be made to the text contained in my telegram E-137:

(a) Second paragraph, second sentence should read "We welcomed this assurance; but as we have learned more about the terms of the proposed treaty and the intentions of the six countries it has appeared to us that there may be significant differences of interpretation of some of these principles between the Six and ourselves".

(b) Sixth paragraph should read:

Canada has not objected to the programme of trade liberalization within OEEC accompanied as it has been by progressive action on the part of the individual members to dismantle restrictions against outside countries. However, the impression we have gained is that the Common Market Treaty provides in effect that if any member finds it necessary in the future to reimpose restrictions these will almost inevitably be discriminatory in character as it would only be as a last resort, and by virtue of special dispensation of the Common Market itself that restrictions of a non-discriminatory character could be imposed.

(c) Seventh paragraph. Third sentence should be replaced by following two sentences:

"The provisions of GATT and subsequent decisions made by the contracting parties to GATT do not, in our judgment, recognize the fact of membership in a Customs Union as justification for the discriminatory application of restrictions to safeguard the balance of payments. We should be very disturbed to see enshrined in a permanent treaty provisions whose real meaning and intent was that if members of the Common Market ever had to reimpose quantitative restrictions they would, in principle, avoid adopting a non-discriminatory approach.

(d) Eighth paragraph. Add this sentence at end of paragraph: "In particular the Canadian Government would be most concerned if the régime of agricultural trade involved exclusive marketing agreements or discriminatory state trading."

(e) Ninth paragraph. First sentence should read: "We would expect that many of the above views may be shared by other non-member countries, who may nevertheless sympathize, as we do, with the difficulties facing the participating countries in drawing up a satisfactory and acceptable Customs Union Treaty within a limited time."

Embassy Paris, Hague, Bonn, Rome:
Please deliver notes in same terms to governments to which you are accredited.

London: Please inform UK Government of this action and give them text of revised message.

Washington: Please inform State Department.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

This morning I delivered to Spaak an aide-mémoire incorporating your suggested text as revised by telegram E-150. The USA Ambassador made a similar démarche yesterday evening and I am forwarding by today's bag a copy of his aide-mémoire.

2. As I expected Spaak was aware of three major items which are disturbing us. Insofar as the level of external tariffs and the use of QRs is concerned Spaak felt that we had little to worry about and that we would be reassured if we could see the complete text of the treaty. He appreciated however that we might have some cause for concern about the treatment of agriculture. While minimum prices and long-term contracts are to be established in the Community, in Spaak's view protection for third countries should be afforded by a provision that long-term contracts must recognize existing patterns of trade.

3. Spaak asked whether we would agree to our note being considered in the Brussels Committee. Presumably the USA had not agreed to this suggestion because I suspect they have delivered somewhat different notes in each of the capitals. I agreed to Spaak's suggestion since I considered it the most effective way of ensuring that our concerns were brought to the attention of the drafters of the treaty. Accordingly Spaak will ask Heads of Delegations to consider our note at this afternoon's meeting and we will receive a reply in the near future.

4. I have also asked the Luxembourg Embassy here to convey a copy of the aide-mémoire to M. Bech.

5. In a subsequent telegram† I will outline in more detail the supplementary info which has come to our attention concerning those items of the treaty which are of particular interest to us.

OEEC MINISTERIAL MEETING — FREE TRADE AREA

OEEC Heads of Delegation held a meeting on February 1 to discuss further the method of handling the Free Trade Area item on the ministerial agenda. Discussion in fact centred around the "Heads of Agreement" suggested by Sir Hugh Ellis-Rees, which were sent to you in our telegram under reference. Item (b) of the Heads of Agreement led to an immediate discussion of substance, since it was clear that several delegations, in the absence of agreement on agriculture and on the problem of the under-developed countries, were unwilling to give prior agreement to the proposal that ministers should "give general approval to the objective of creating a European Free Trade Area".

2. The Swedish delegate opened discussion of the problem by proposing what he called a simplified version of the Heads of Agreement which omitted clause (b). He gave the following as reasons:

(1) The UNISCAN negotiations were proceeding and were to include Finland. The Swedish Minister would be going direct from Paris to Helsinki and it might have an undesirable effect upon the Finnish attitudes if the Swedes appeared to present them so bluntly with a "fait accompli".

(2) His government did not like the idea of a prior approval in principle before the practical implications had been worked out in negotiation.

(3) His government, before agreeing to accept in principle the creation of the Free Trade Area as an objective, would like to know more about the arrangements contemplated for agriculture.

3. The Danish Delegate also spoke to the point about agriculture and said that in the absence of a solution, he was not in a position to accept in principle at once. His further remarks, however, suggested that the Danes may not be adamant on this subject. He said that it would be helpful if any decision taken by ministers did not rule out a parallel examination of agricultural problems and that any decision taken should recognize that the goal was non-discriminatory trade in agricultural products.

4. The issue of agriculture also arose on January 31 at the meeting of the deputies with the ministers of agriculture. They adopted a decision indicating that, if the Ministerial Council should decide to pursue the study of the problem of agriculture in connection with the work towards the creation of a Free Trade Area the Committee of Ministers of Agriculture or the agricultural deputies should be given the mandate to make this study in liaison with the bodies of the organization to which the Council might entrust the work on the creation of a Free Trade Area. As it is worded, this decision is probably quite acceptable, and most of the debate in the Agricultural Deputies Committee arose from a wish to make sure that the Agricultural Directorate, which considers itself rather the Cinderella of the OEEC, should not be overlooked in discussions on this subject. The only intervention of substance came from the French delegate, who suggested that the agricultural arrangements in Brussels would fall short of a Customs Union as defined in GATT and that any arrangements for agriculture in the Free Trade Area might fall equally short of the GATT definition. He made an appeal to delegates not to put too much importance on words, and seemed to be suggesting that the door to a reconciliation between the arrangements for agriculture in the Free Trade Area and in the Customs Union should not be too firmly shut. His statement would tend to support the impression given recently that the French are adopting a more positive attitude towards the Free Trade Area.

5. The other difficult question of principle which arose at the Heads of Delegation meeting, the position of the under-developed countries, was brought up by Cristides, the Greek delegate, who repeated his Cassandra-like speech about the under-developed countries which, if they were unable to assume the obligations of the Free Trade Area, could only expect to be forced out by European cooperation all together. He made no constructive suggestions, but contended himself with rhetoric. The Secretary-General and several delegates intervened to suggest that in the course of negotiation, the situation of the individual under-developed countries should be examined in the light of the obligations which it might be decided that the Free Trade Area would impose upon its members. Sergent (greatly to Christides' indignation) suggested that when the special situations of the under-developed countries were examined they might be found to be no more special than anyone else's. The Swiss delegate implied that such an examination might, if necessary, lead to the development of an individual special status for each under-developed country.

6. Sir Hugh Ellis-Rees summed up four considerations, which could not be overlooked, as follows:

(1) Reciprocity in the Free Trade Area is important, since otherwise countries would be reluctant to accept any obligations whatever.

(2) The existence of the under-developed countries is a fact and it can be argued that they must not be excluded from the Free Trade Area but should be nursed along.

(3) It may also be contended that once the Free Trade Area venture is launched, all the remaining activities of the OEEC would tend to be geared to it and countries not participating in the Free Trade Area would therefore not share fully in the benefits of the organization.

(4) It is necessary to consider world opinion and the wider obligations which some OEEC members have assumed. It has been suggested that, if the Free Trade Area were not fully reciprocal, countries external to it would feel that they were being discriminated against.

From the OEEC point of view, the basic assumption must be that the OEEC membership must be maintained. The organization is an important instrument in the consolidation of Europe, and the Free Trade Area itself had been conceived partly as a means of preventing a division between the countries of "little Europe" and the rest of the membership. He went on to say that it was important not to think of the under-developed countries as one bloc and the remaining members as another. Each special situation should be examined individually and it was to be hoped that the blueprint for the Free Trade Area would turn out to be something to which all could adhere with full reciprocity. If this proved not to be possible, it would be necessary to consider what special circumstances would in fact prevent full participation on the part of certain countries or whether the fears of third countries regarding discrimination would be justified if a special status were contemplated for some members.

7. On the general point as to whether ministers should be expected to take a decision on principle, Ockrent, the Belgian delegate, urged strongly that this was essential; otherwise their decision would be no more than a mandate to continue studies already undertaken. Sir Ellis-Rees supported this position, his argument being chiefly that the OEEC was now embarked upon one of the most important experiments in European solidarity to be undertaken since the war. There was a strong political impetus at the present time and if the great practical difficulties in the way of achievement were to be overcome, there must be an "act of faith" at the beginning. Disappointment on the part of the public now would do great harm to the future of the OEEC.

8. The trend of the discussion, as we indicated above, was to suggest that points of difficulty such as agriculture and under-developed countries would have to be worked out in the course of the future negotiations, for which ministers would provide. In this regard, Valéry expressed the view, which was strongly supported by Sir Hugh Ellis-Rees, that the practical problem was in fact to devise an effective negotiating procedure, allowing the work to proceed without prejudice to the unresolved issues. It is likely that an effort will be made before the ministerial meeting to find a form of words which would achieve this purpose.

9. Heads of Delegation are to have a further discussion on (February 5?).

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

In conversations with Rothschild and USA Ambassador this afternoon I learned that our aide-mémoire was made a formal conference document and discussed by the six ministers yesterday. Spaak, who was evidently quite pleased to have a concrete paper to put before the meeting, has been charged by the other ministers to prepare a reply. This reply is now being drafted by Hupperts, who will clear it with Spaak when latter returns to Paris from Washington on February 11. We might then accordingly expect a reply about February 13. A copy of the reply will also be given to the USA and will, I understand, constitute the bible for replies to other third countries who may raise similar questions.

2. From what I learned from Rothschild, our reply will contain reasonable assurances on all points except question of long-term contracts. With respect to latter, however, the reply will probably maintain that there are certain built-in safeguards for what they are worth in the concessions which have been made in this respect to France, i.e. countries such as Belgium and The Netherlands will resist any attempt to raise unduly the price at which their import requirements of cereals, for example, will be obtainable. Presumably long-term contracts must also be reconciled with the existing patterns of trade, but in the absence of detail I am unaware of how they expect this to work. By the use of the qualified majority it would be possible for the other partners to override French objections by the end of the second stage of the interim period.

3. Spaak leaves tomorrow for Washington and it is unlikely that he will be back in Brussels before February 22. He indicated publicly at conclusion of yesterday's meeting that treaties would probably be ready for signature about March 10 and that adequate agreement had now been reached on all points except status of overseas territories.

OEEC MINISTERIAL MEETING — FREE TRADE AREA

The lines of a possible compromise resolution which ministers might agree upon next week and which would enable negotiations to be initiated emerged at this morning's meeting of Heads of Delegations. The problem was to find a formula expressing a decision to seek to establish a Free Trade Area in spite of the fact that there was no agreement on such problems as agriculture and the status of less-developed countries, which some countries regard as essential pre-conditions to going ahead. At the outset the Greek Representative laid down three such pre-conditions:

(1) solution for the problem of agriculture;

(2) agreement on the need for an investment fund for development purposes;

(3) agreement that Greece be granted a long-term waiver for industrial goods.

If ministers could not agree to these conditions the only possible approach would be to take note of the report and to instruct the organization to continue its studies. He said that there was a feeling in his country that Greek interests were being neglected and warned that there was a real danger that OEEC would disintegrate. Curiously enough, the Turkish Representative remained silent throughout the debate. The Danish Representative was not nearly as adamant. He said his authorities hoped to be able to join the Free Trade Area and accordingly hoped that ministers would find a solution which would take account of the interests of agriculture exporters. The possible compromise solution was selected out by Ockrent (Belgium) and Bauer (Switzerland). Ockrent saw no reason why ultimately some system could not be devised for agricultural products which would protect the UK special

Commonwealth interests. The objective would be to find means whereby the exporters of agricultural products in Europe could be given equivalent advantages to those which the Free Trade Area would provide for the industrial producers. Bauer suggested that whatever words might be used, what was intended and necessary was that a special status be worked out for agricultural products. If ministers were agreed that an effort should be made to find a suitable solution for the special problems of agriculture, then there was no reason why any country should block the start of negotiations. He accordingly suggested that in the course of the debate ministers should agree on the need to establish a Free Trade Area and at the same time record formally the conditions which they regarded as fundamental. The ministerial resolution would establish a negotiating body on the Free Trade Area and another one to study simultaneously the possibility of a special status for agriculture in close relation to the Free Trade Area. Both would ultimately report to the Ministerial Council which would then be in a position to make a final decision. Valéry of France supported this approach and strongly stressed the necessity for political reasons of taking a clear and bold decision setting negotiations on their way. He said there was also great danger for the future of OEEC if no decision was taken. The French, he pointed out, regarded harmonization and social charges as a pre-condition to ultimate signature. At the same time they were quite prepared to enter into negotiations and strongly hoped that a Free Trade Area would be established. The Austrian Representative expressed support in principle for the inclusion of agriculture and also supported the Swiss proposal. The Norwegian Representative likewise supported this approach and expressed the strong interest of his country in the Free Trade Area objectives. Summing up, Sir Hugh elaborated on the Swiss proposal and indicated that a third body or working group might be established to study the special problems of countries such as Greece which could not envisage accepting the full obligations of the Free Trade Area. He expressed his hope that the Ministerial Council would make the necessary act of faith and warned that failure could be disastrous for the OEEC. He added that if this occurred countries which were prepared to go ahead would then have to pursue their aims through other channels.

2. There will be no further meetings of Heads of Delegations before the ministerial meeting and no attempt will be made to draw up for ministers a tentative resolution. Heads of Delegations will simply advise their ministers on the basis of the discussions which took place. Sir Hugh mentioned in closing that the memo on the UK position which they had sent to OEEC countries would be tabled in the UK Parliament tomorrow. The agenda of the ministerial meeting will consist of the free trade area item and also of a pro forma report on developments in the field of nuclear energy.

Déclaration du représentant permanent auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord et de l'OECE à la réunion ministérielle de l'OECE, les 12 et 13 février 1957

Statement by Permanent Representative to North Atlantic Council and OEEC to OEEC Ministerial Meeting — February 12-13, 1957

Mr. Chairman,

In presenting the views of the Canadian Government on the subject before this meeting, I am fully conscious of the far-reaching importance and significance of the steps which the members of the Organization are contemplating. It is not an overstatement to affirm that this may prove to be an historic occasion.

2. Having had the privilege as an associate member to follow closely the deliberations of Working Party 17, we are also well aware of the extraordinary complexity of the problems involved in establishing a free trade area in Europe in association with the Customs Union being negotiated among the Six. I should, therefore, like to take this opportunity to extend our most sincere congratulations to the Chairman and to the members of the Working Party, as well as to the members of the OEEC Secretariat, for the very clear report they have been able to prepare within a very short period of time.

3. Certain of the issues that such a free trade area would raise have now been clearly defined and examined. The Report concludes that a European free trade area is technically feasible and suggests that a number of important problems which are common to the area and to the proposed Customs Union should be solved in an identical manner. The issues upon which I shall comment have, in some cases up to the present, been more clearly defined in the discussions regarding the Customs Union. Nevertheless, they are obviously relevant to the free trade area. It is important, I think, in considering the issues involved to bear in mind the general pattern of world trade relations as they have developed since the war.

4. During the past ten years, the countries of Europe have joined other trading nations in restoring and developing a system of multilateral trade and payments on a world-wide basis. Non-discrimination, equality of treatment and the reduction of trade barriers have been recognized as the principles best calculated to promote the economic welfare of each individual country as well as of the trading world as a whole. These efforts have been remarkably successful. Tariff levels have been significantly reduced on many thousands of items covering a large proportion of world trade. An unprecedent degree of assured tariff stability has been enjoyed. Significant progress has also been made by reducing and avoiding other barriers to trade on a world-wide basis. We in Canada have welcomed the important steps that have been taken in the removal of quantitative restrictions in many parts of the world, and particularly in the countries of Europe. The dismantling of import restrictions has been found to be of direct benefit to the individual countries themselves, and has also served to strengthen their relations with the rest of the world. Of particular importance has been the additional cohesion these policies have given to the North Atlantic Community.

5. The OEEC has dealt with a wide range of common European problems. Canada has welcomed the successive efforts made since the war, in the OEEC and elsewhere, to achieve a greater degree of European cooperation. The success in these tasks in economic spheres is partly attributable to the fact that they have been undertaken within the framework of a world-wide approach to multilateral trade and freer payments.

6. The Report of the Working Party makes specific reference to the importance of conformity with the principles of GATT and of the IMF and also states as the aim of the proposed free trade area that it should promote the objectives of multilateral trade. Should a European free trade area be decided upon, it is of great importance that the detailed arrangements should be of a character which hastens and does not impede the attainment of these objectives.

7. I turn now to some of the specific problems which are discussed in the Report of the Working Party. The industrial countries of Europe are traditionally among the most important markets for agricultural products from Canada and from other parts of the world, and it is neither in their interest nor in ours that they should isolate themselves from the most efficient and competitive sources of supply, wherever these may be. The nature of any arrangements that may be developed in Europe in the field of agriculture will bear directly not only on the economic prosperity of Europe but also on the vital trading interests of many other areas. The Canadian Government would be quite prepared to see agricultural products included fully in the free trade area arrangements with all the advantages attendant upon this for the flexibility, prosperity and productivity of European agriculture. We recognize, however, that such inclusion on an acceptable and defensible basis may present very difficult problems and may be impossible during the early years. We would not wish agriculture included on terms which were restrictive or prejudicial to the interests of third countries or which provided for excessive protection against agricultural imports from the outside world. In particular, the establishment of the proposed economic arrangements in Europe would not, in our view, provide justification for exclusive marketing agreements which would discriminate against imports from the outside world.

8. Another of the most important questions that will face the free trade area relates to the criteria that will govern the use of import restrictions and the discriminatory application of such restrictions. The fact that quantitative restrictions have harmful effects on the countries imposing them as well as on their trading partners has been generally recognized in post-war international agreements. We would regard it as most important that the free trade area arrangements should not include provisions which would make it more difficult for individual members to continue to remove restrictions against the rest of the world as their individual circumstances permit.

9. It is, of course, not impossible that balance of payments difficulties might again arise. It is important that there should be no provisions or policies which would lead a country in such difficulties to reimpose quantitative restrictions on a discriminatory basis. In our judgment, the fact of membership in a free trade area is not in itself justification for the discriminatory application of quantitative restrictions.

10. The removal of tariffs within the area is dealt with in paragraphs 19 to 23 of the Report. As an outside country, we would regard it as important that the arrangements should clearly provide for the elimination of internal tariffs within a reasonable transitional period. We note that the method suggested by the Working Party is fairly flexible. Considering this flexibility, and the very gradual nature of the programme of tariff elimination, we have difficulty in recognizing the special need for escape clauses envisaged in Annex III to protect specific industries which may encounter serious difficulty as a result of increasing competition. It would appear to us that the programme contemplated by the Working Party would itself provide ample scope for making, without unnecessary hardship, the kind of adjustments which, after all, the free trade area is designed to bring about.

11. The Working Party has devoted a good deal of thought to the question of the definition of origin of goods for the purposes of the free trade area. Many difficult technical problems are involved. These will have to be examined in detail with a view to ensuring that fair and equitable treatment is accorded to the trade of all concerned including outside countries.

12. With regard to the problem of the less-developed countries, we are fully conscious of the very real difficulties which may be involved for these countries and share the view that their individual situations and problems should receive careful and thorough examination. Member countries will likewise appreciate that the decisions which will ultimately be taken in this field will inevitably be of concern to outside countries.

13. Mr. Chairman, if I have dwelt in my remarks on the points which could give rise to difficulties, as well as indicating our sympathy and support for your objectives, it is because we believe that it is in this way that we can most usefully contribute to your deliberations. We would expect our views to be shared substantially by other non-participating countries. While we have welcomed and supported this initiative, we cannot, of course, be indifferent to the form the proposals ultimately may take. We endorse Mr. Hollister's statement that the directives emerging from this meeting should take fully into account the interests of the other countries of the free world.

14. Last November, the Canadian Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent, issued a public statement in which he expressed the views of the Canadian Government. He indicated broadly the effects which might be expected as regards Canada's foreign trade and the objectives which, in the Canadian view, any free trade area arrangements ought to fulfil. In particular, he stressed the importance which Canada would attach to the full implementation of such a plan since a partial development might result only in the creation of a regional system of preferences, without achieving the positive results expected of it. Mr. St. Laurent also said that if such a plan were adopted and successfully carried through, it should increase the economic strength and prosperity of the peoples of Western Europe and also their sense of solidarity and common purpose even beyond the economic field. He indicated that such a result could not fail to be welcomed by Canadians whose cultural, political and security interests, as well as economic welfare, have been and are so closely linked with that part of the world. In the same sympathetic spirit, we shall continue to follow with great interest the further discussions and negotiations and no doubt will have further occasion to make our views known.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL ON FREE TRADE AREA

The essential issues before the meeting were agriculture and the status of the less developed countries. Because of the sharp division on these two questions, the technical and commercial problems involved in the establishment of a free trade area, though mentioned, tended to remain in the background. In this telegram we will try to review country positions on the two main issues. The UK stood essentially alone on both. Thorneycroft, at the outset, adopted a conciliatory attitude and expressed willingness to study the special problems of all countries. However, Sir David Eckles indicated in his statement that the UK goal was to set in motion negotiations for an industrial free trade area though parallel studies might be carried out on the other issues. The underdeveloped countries were led by the Greeks, who adopted at the outset a completely unyielding attitude and laid down three conditions: inclusion of agriculture; establishment of an investment fund; and thirdly, a waiver on tariff obligations. In the absence of an agreement of principle on these three points, they could not accept the decision to open negotiations. For each of the less developed countries, the inclusion of agriculture was considered essential. The Turks were however considerably less outspoken. The Portuguese were also forthcoming and less inclined to argue over drafting nuances. Their main concern seemed to be to ensure that they would have a full voice at all the stages of the negotiations. In the end, they registered a general reserve with regard to the resolution adopted. The Irish attitude was somewhat of a surprise in that it showed considerably more interest in the free trade area than had been expected. The Irish Representative gave passing support to the idea of an investment fund and ended by proposing the creation of three working parties one of which would study the industrial free trade area. His proposal seemed to be in line with the compromise solution the UK was hoping for. The Icelandic Representative was generally uninterested.

2. For the Scandinavians, agriculture was the central issue in view of the Danish interest. The Danes, after a moderate opening statement stiffened their attitude, drawing on the Greek example and had equal success in influencing the final resolution. They received rather lukewarm support from the Swedes. Norway stood more or less alone concentrating on the problems of a free trade area and on the economic conditions required for its success, i.e., prevailing atmosphere of expansion, accumulation of capital, increased credit facilities. Regarding agriculture, the Norwegians favoured limiting special arrangements to a defined list of products.

3. The attitude of the Six was somewhat ambiguous. Spaak acting as their spokesman emphasized that the free trade area should be a form of association with the Common Market, inferring that the six would be negotiating as members of the Common Market rather than as individual countries. This interpretation seemed to be resented by the Germans. The six supported inclusion of agriculture and full OEEC membership, but at the same time gave some backing to the UK. Thus it was Spaak who proposed that Thorneycroft should be given wide discretionary power to organize the negotiations. The Netherlands were very subdued and did not participate in the general debate. The Swiss and Austrians, who do not belong to any grouping were generally moderate. The Swiss supported inclusion of agriculture on a basis guaranteeing reciprocity of treatment and favoured a plan limited to trade and commercial matters which should take account of the interests of outside countries. At the same time they were for full OEEC membership and a detailed study of the problem of agriculture. The Austrians expressed strong support for the initiative and generally favoured the inclusion of agriculture and full OEEC membership as well as the establishment of an investment fund.

4. The USA and Canadian attitudes were not relevant to the final voting but nevertheless were attentively observed. In general the two statements were taken as an endorsement of the proposal, in spite of the reservations they contained. The references to GATT and to associated countries which were proposed by Canada and the USA were adopted without opposition in the final resolution. The effect of these differing country attitudes on the outcome of the meeting is described in a separate telegram.† They reveal a fairly complete isolation on the part of the UK, save for the qualified political support of the Six and to a lesser extent the Scandinavians.

OEEC MINISTERIAL MEETING ON THE FREE TRADE AREA

The ministerial meeting which took place on February 12 and 13 presented this peculiarity that the general statements which occupied the first part of the second day concerned only in an indirect way the real issue which had to be resolved: how to secure unanimous agreement to start negotiations on a free trade area in spite of the fundamental disagreement which existed between the UK on the one hand, and to a varying extent, all other member countries, on the questions of agriculture and of membership of less developed countries. This procedural issue was worked out in a Working Party which attempted to draw up a compromise resolution and ultimately in the Council itself before an acceptable solution could be found.

2. In our telegram 250 we quoted and explained briefly the terms of the resolution which was adopted and in telegram 261 we summarized the country positions on the problems of agriculture and less developed countries. In this telegram we will attempt to analyse the nature of the compromise which was reached and to draw some tentative conclusions. The general statements dealt for the most part with the substantive issues raised in the report of Working Party 17. We are sending you by bag the text of the principal statements made at the meeting, drawing attention in a covering letter† to points which seemed of particular interest at this stage. For the most part the positions adopted followed closely those taken in the Working Party which were previously reported to you.

3. The struggle at the meeting centred around the attempt of the UK to maintain a sharp distinction between the undertaking to enter into negotiations for an industrial free trade area, and an agreement to examine the special situations with regard to agriculture and to less developed countries. The original draft resolution proposed that these should be dealt with by three different working parties. One was to be the body in which the negotiations for a free trade area should be conducted and the necessary instruments prepared. The second was to examine "How an expansion of trade in agricultural products between all members may be achieved and to make proposals to this end". The third was to "Consider the special needs of the less-developed member countries and to make proposals regarding the ways in which these could be met and the manner in which such member countries could take part in a further move to reduce trade barriers in Europe". You will note that these mandates were so phrased as to avoid any implication that the special arrangements for agriculture and the underdeveloped countries were necessarily to be a part of the free trade area agreement.

4. It proved impossible to have this approach accepted. On agriculture the UK found itself completely isolated as the Scandinavians led by the Danes, the Six led by France and the less-developed countries led by Greece all pressed for inclusion of agriculture in the free trade area negotiations. As regards the problem of less-developed countries, the Greeks were adamant in demanding that negotiations should be conducted with a view to finding means of enabling them to participate in the free trade area from the outset. They were supported by the Portuguese and, if less vigorously, by the Turks. The approach favoured by these countries was the setting up of a single negotiating body with working groups established on specific problems as needed.

5. In these circumstances the solution could only be found in a resolution which left the procedural questions open and entrusted to some coordinating authority the responsibility of organizing the negotiations in an appropriate manner taking full account of the views expressed at the meeting. It was Spaak who proposed a solution along these lines and suggested that Thorneycroft, as Chairman of the Council, should be given the central coordinating authority.

6. The failure to delimit precisely the scope of the discussions which will take place on agriculture and on the special situation of less-developed countries may tend to work out to the advantage of the majority. Thorneycroft will inevitably be under very strong pressure from the Greeks and the Danes and it may be difficult for him to establish his impartiality without yielding some ground. It will require extraordinary skill on his part to prevent the two unresolved issues from blocking negotiations on the free trade area or alternatively from spoiling the integrity of the plans for the free trade are as envisaged by the UK. In conversations we have had with the UK delegation since the meeting we were told that Thorneycroft was confident that three working parties as originally envisaged would be established.

7. A factor which emerged from the discussions at the meeting may be worth nothing; that is the effect of the unanimity rule which prevails in all OEEC governing bodies. This gave the Greeks, or any other country, a veto power over the final decision, thus weakening the UK bargaining position. This fact will be relevant to the forthcoming negotiations as well. If these negotiations were carried out outside the OEEC framework the fear of being left out might exert a restraining influence on the less-developed countries. In view of the importance attached by the UK to the OEEC as a focal point of European co-operation and of Thorneycroft's position in the negotiations, it is difficult to see the UK making use of the threat to "go it alone" with the Six. It is well to remember, however, that on many of the issues involved in the creation of a free trade area the UK can expect some strong support from the Scandinavians, the Germans, the Benelux countries and the Swiss.

8. The appointment of Thorneycroft as co-ordinator of the negotiations is in itself a fact of some considerable political importance and will give the UK an even greater stake than before in ensuring that negotiations will succeed. It underlines formally and publicly the decisive turn which UK policy has taken in respect of European integration. In this regard, the speeches made by Thorneycroft and Sir David Eccles at the beginning of the meetings created a profound impression. Mr. Spaak's proposal reflected both the importance which the Six attach to the UK participation as well as his own belief that a strong "political personality" is needed at the helm. In the extraordinarily difficult negotiations which are about to open, the political fact that the changed UK attitude offers what is perhaps a unique opportunity will be an important asset to strengthen the hand of the UK Chancellor of the Exchequer.

COMMON MARKET TREATY

This afternoon we learned the following in a meeting with Hupperts, who had just returned from the Paris meetings.

2. It now appears that we will not receive a detailed written reply to our aide-mémoire as we had previously been told. According to Hupperts, the Messina powers are reluctant to "weaken their position for the GATT discussions" by committing themselves to piecemeal expressions of view at this time. He reaffirmed that they considered GATT to be the appropriate forum to discuss the treaty and that it would be available for discussion in GATT between signature and ratification. In Hupperts' view a useful discussion cannot be held until third countries have had an opportunity to study the final texts of the treaties which he hoped would be available to us within a fortnight. He said he did not know whether it was still the intention that someone should go to Canada and the USA to discuss the treaties before discussion in GATT. You will recall that we reported this possibility to you in our telegram 23 January 29.† We told Hupperts that while we had had no official reaction, it was our own view that a visit to Ottawa might be helpful in clarifying some of the issues before the GATT discussions and might possibly lead to a greater sense of confidence on our part about the motives of the Messina powers.

3. While we gathered that the Six had not yet taken a firm decision about the position they will adopt in GATT, we got the impression that they would insist that the treaty was in conformity with GATT and that a waiver was not required even for the treatment of agriculture. In the latter respect Hupperts acknowledged that the long-term contracts now envisaged would be of substantial concern to us and could scarcely be justified in GATT. On the other hand he made the point which has been reported to you before, that the rules for the treatment of agriculture at the end of the transition period could be determined by a majority vote in the Council of Ministers and thus France could presumably be overruled. We gained the impression, although there is little evidence in this direction, that the Belgians are pinning their hopes to the possibility that changes and reforms can be brought about in France within the transition period to enable the latter to enter fully into a true Customs Union.

4. Hupperts explained that the Belgians for obvious reasons were anxious to avoid a split in GATT but they would be prepared to fight if this was necessary.

5. On the basis of our meeting with Hupperts it may not be unreasonable to assume that quite serious difficulties lie ahead in GATT. I am seeing Spaak tomorrow morning at eleven and following this interview we may be in a better position to comment on the intentions of the Messina powers. I understand that the treaties are now likely to be signed in Rome on March 14.

CONVERSATION WITH SPAAK — INTEGRATION TREATIES

When I saw Spaak last Saturday I informed him that reports which had come to our attention concerning the final negotiations in Paris were not likely to dispel the Canadian fears which had prompted the aide-mémoire left with him on February 1st. I reminded him particularly of our concern over future discussions in GATT.

2. Spaak told me that conclusion and ratification of the treaties would represent a tremendous step for Europe. Politically and economically the impact on Europe might equal that of the French revolution. Once the community is set up, its influence, both political and economic, will be so powerful that other European countries by virtue of their own interests will be forced to seek some form of association with it.

3. According to Spaak, the effects of the treaty on trade in particular commodities could be measured only after the transition period, as the volume and nature of internal demand within the Community is bound to change over fifteen years. During this time of course there would be constant need to balance pressures from within the Community. He emphasized however that most of the countries were serious about protecting existing patterns of trade. By the latter he meant trade both ways. Belgium for one realizes that if the Community's policies were to provoke commercial retaliation from third countries, the Belgian economy might suffer disastrously. There is no thought that they could prosper on trade within the Community alone.

4. Although this point had not emerged clearly from our own understanding of the Common Market Treaty, Spaak emphasized that the levels which are now being established for the common external tariff would be attained progressively over the transition period at the same pace at which internal barriers were being reduced. According to Spaak, the figures for common external tariffs now being agreed were maximum levels which might not necessarily ever become effective.

5. Spaak undertook to provide me with a memorandum prepared for the Belgian Cabinet setting out the aims and objectives of the treaty. This should be available within the next day or so and, depending on its length, we shall cable you its contents or a summary.

6. I also mentioned that it would be useful, once our authorities had an opportunity to study the texts, if Hupperts could visit Ottawa, as suggested by Spaak earlier this month.

Spaak now thought he might be able to send Hupperts to Washington and Ottawa sometime after March 15. I appreciate that we are anxious that any preliminary talks should not prejudice the position which we will take in GATT but I have assumed that you would consider it useful to have one of the key officials responsible for the drafting of the texts provide supplementary explanations about the treaties prior to GATT.

7. Spaak put great emphasis on the significance of the proposal for association with overseas territories. In his view, Europe was now moving to fill a gap in the financing of the development of many of the under-developed countries of Africa. It could be no less significant than the decision of the USA to embark on its point-four programme. At least as far as Africa is concerned, it would appear that the Messina powers have succeeded in finding a way of mobilizing German capital for use in the under-developed countries without raising the special political problems inherent in bringing Germany into SUNFED or any of the UN-sponsored programmes.

SECRET [Ottawa], March 22, 1957

WESTERN EUROPE AND THE UNITED STATES: A STUDY OF ATTITUDES

The great debate of the past few weeks about the proposed reduction of United Kingdom forces on the Continent[35] has been so absorbing that we may perhaps be neglecting another fundamental aspect of the European picture which could also have serious implications for the future of the Western alliance. In spite of all the concern which has been expressed about weakening the shield, particularly in official circles in Western capitals, I think it is nevertheless a fact that public opinion in Western Europe is generally persuaded that there is very little risk of a major war at the present time. It is popularly assumed that even if fighting were to break out again in the Middle East or elsewhere around the periphery, it is very unlikely to involve Western Europe and NATO.

2. Insofar as this point of view is thought out logically, it could be said that if neither Suez nor Hungary led to a direct clash between the major protagonists, then it seems clear that both sides are determined to avoid their mutual destruction.

3. It follows from this — and the French Press in particular has drawn these conclusions explicitly — that Western Europe has less immediate need of NATO. It must be there, just in case, as a final back stop. But as they see it, the United States no longer regards the North Atlantic alliance as its primary instrument of policy; it acts as though NATO were now regarded as merely one among several military alliances, as Mr. Dulles unfortunately pointed out all too clearly in Paris last December. This is seen in the increasing emphasis in American policy on the United Nations and on anti-colonial themes better adapted, perhaps, to the requirements of competitive co-existence in the uncommitted areas of the Middle East, Asia and Africa. Both from our missions and from Western European diplomats in Ottawa, we keep getting reports that the Western Europeans have begun to conclude that the United States does not intend to return to the kind of relationship which it had with its NATO partners before Suez. This is more, they believe due to the new turn of American policy in recent months than to any merely temporary shift intended to teach Paris and London a lesson by putting them in the dog house. Although the Mollet visit to Washington and the Bermuda talks may help to restore personal relations and mutual confidences, the fact that neither side of the Atlantic now seems to live under any imminent threat of Soviet attack has tended to reduce the weight given by the countries on both sides of the Atlantic to the North Atlantic Alliance.

4. I think this perspective makes it easier for us to understand why the Western Europeans are seeking for means of closer collaboration among themselves in all spheres. We see this in the approaching signature of the Common Market and Euratom Treaties, as well as in the efforts which are being made to strengthen the Western European Union. It even emerges, I think, as one of the United Kingdom's assumptions of a trend which they would like to offset by their "Grand Design" intended to place Western European cooperation more authentically within a North Atlantic framework.

5. These divisive trends have been discernible for some time and Suez merely accelerated the process. In a large part they stem, in our opinion, from the failure of United States policy to take a more positive lead in developing the non-military side of NATO. If Washington could not move as rapidly towards economic cooperation and real political consultation as some of the Western European members of the Alliance, the alternative was for those who were prepared to go faster, to go it by themselves.

6. Suez gave an emotional barb to the logical point. As M. Armand said recently of the Euratom and Common Market Treaties, Western Europe should commemorate their signature by erecting "A statue to Colonel Nasser decorated with a little medal from President Eisenhower".

7. To disentangle the strands of the United States' attitude to Western Europe is even more difficult than to sort out the attitude of the Europeans towards the United States. On the surface it would appear as if the United States' Administration were much more wholehearted in their support of European integration, for example, than either the United Kingdom or Canadian Governments. This does not necessarily mean, however, that the United States is closer to Europe than Canada. In fact it has been consistent United States policy to get Europe on its feet so that it would not be on Washington's neck. In this sense United States' objectives in Europe have always been limited. Marshall aid, NATO, and now the strong political support which the United States Government has given the Common Market and Euratom ventures, show that the United States wish to help the Europeans to help themselves. For at the point at which Western Europe becomes relatively a viable and independent economic and political area, there would be less burden for the United States to carry in support of Western Europe. It is assumed, in other words, that the military dependence of Western Europe will continue, but that in the non-military field it would probably be preferable for the Western Europeans to have a stronger and more independent life of their own. This reading of events is no doubt an over-simplification. It is an interpretation seen through European eyes and we need not agree with it; but it does, I think, effect the basic attitudes of each side of the Atlantic towards the other.

8. And what of the USSR? Soviet leaders have consistently held to one principal objective of their postwar policy in Europe — to get the United States off the Continent. They felt that this would break up NATO, and would leave Western Europe economically weak, politically divided and psychologically demoralized. They have until recently done remarkably little to counter the emergence of a Western European Customs Union and Euratom, partly, perhaps, because they calculated that these European tendencies would feed on anti-American sentiments, but perhaps even more, because they did not think that Western European integration could happen. Now that they see the prospect of having the worst of both worlds, from their point of view — European integration still linked firmly with North America — they have begun to try very hard to stop the signature and ratification of the Common Market and Euratom Treaties. Their notes to the Western European countries which were published last Sunday are an indication of their concern. For they no doubt realize that not only would increasing strength in Western Europe within an Atlantic framework be an important gain for the West, but they fear the pull of a prosperous and self-respecting Western Europe upon their own shaky position in Eastern Europe. And though a rational analysis might indicate the advantages they might derive from coming to terms on German reunification and European security, involving at least a withdrawal from Eastern Germany, they cannot face the political consequences for Marxism-Leninism of admitting the failure of a full-fledged communist experiment which collapsed, against all the rules, from popular opposition.

9. I feel we have yet to try to digest these developments in the Department in terms of Canadian interest and Canadian policy. Is it automatically concluded that, because the United States is encouraging the Europeans to integrate on their own, Canada should also keep its distance from these emerging institutions which are likely to be increasingly important? Only this week, for example, the Italian Ambassador has asked us — of course on a personal basis — whether Canada could not consider joining the Western European Union as a full member. There have also been a few suggestions, chiefly from within the Department, that there would be at least political advantages for Canada in being associated, in some specially hand-tailored way, with the Free Trade Area; a number of the Western European countries are likely to be given special terms for their association.

10. Without going more deeply into these questions at present, the problem for Canada could be put in general terms: is it not once again in the Canadian interest to have a closer relationship with Western Europe than has the United States?[36] As Mr. Fenoaltea said to us this week, it has always been Canada's role to draw the United States back to Europe. We may not quite subscribe to this definition, but we may be coming to the point where we need not automatically restrict our possibilities to what the United States decides is appropriate for its own interests.

11. I realize that we have not really worked our own way through to the core of the problem, but I thought I should try to give you before Bermuda, some of our reflections on these problems which extend beyond the immediate issue of United Kingdom troop reductions[37] and, in another context, are bound to colour the attitude we adopt towards such developments as the Common Market, European integration, and "the Grand Design".

J. L[ÉGER]

P.S.- The only concrete proposal which I would like to submit to you at present is that we should establish our observer status in W.E.U. on a more official basis. I am not suggesting that this step follows directly from the points presented in this memorandum, but this is perhaps an appropriate context in which to raise our W.E.U. status. As you know, Canada and the United States have been asked to attend as observers the last few meetings of the W.E.U. Ministerial Council. This has been an ad hoc arrangement and North American representatives were not, I believe, invited to the earlier W.E.U. Council meetings. I think this is a good time, while the "Grand Design" is being discussed, for Canada and the United States to explore with the United Kingdom the possibility of becoming associated with the W.E.U. in the same way that we are associated with the O.E.E.C., so that we could have official observers at W.E.U. meetings on a regular basis.[38] If you agree, this idea might perhaps be brought forward at Bermuda. I think it is likely to appeal to the United Kingdom and probably to the other members of W.E.U., particularly if the United States is ready to take this small step with us. We shall, if you agree, sound out the State Department early next week.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Yesterday we received a telephone call from our NATO Mission to say that a member of the USA Delegation had referred to a document in his possession which was presumably a draft reply to the Canadian aide-mémoire on the Common Market which we delivered to Spaak on February 1. At the time we told our NATO Delegation that no such draft had been made available to us and that as far as we knew it was still the intention of Spaak and the Messina powers to withhold replying to us in writing until after consideration of the Common Market Treaty at GATT.

2. We have now learned from the USA Embassy that they also have received a document containing a draft reply to the Canadian aide-mémoire. This document did not originate in Brussels and Economic Counsellor at USA Embassy was reluctant to divulge source which had provided them with the draft reply. In fact it was pointed out that it had been given to them in confidence and they were specifically asked not to let us know that it was in their possession. USA authorities have been asked to comment since points set out in draft reply would constitute main lines of defence of treaty at GATT by Messina powers. In view however of references to this document in Paris USA Embassy agreed to make a copy available to us and we hope to be able to put it on the wire to you later this afternoon.

COMMON MARKET

We are quoting below an excerpt from the document referred to in paragraph 2 of our telegram 71 March 28. It would appear that the aide-mémoire which I left with Spaak on February 1 became a conference document of the Brussels Committee. It was presumably on basis of this document that the following series of questions and answers were prepared. The questions do not in all cases follow faithfully the language of our aide-mémoire but an attempt has been made to reply to each of the points we raised. USA Embassy has asked us not to reveal to Messina governments that they have made this available to us.

Text of excerpt follows:

I. TARIFFS

1. Elimination of Duties Among Member States

Canada: The methods which are to be employed for the final and most difficult stage in the reduction of internal duties — in the third stage of the transition period — are left open. To what extent can outside countries place confidence in a program where certain elements remain insufficiently defined?

Reply: Articles 5 and 15 (now Articles 8 and 14) of the treaty draft envisage that the total elimination of duties among the Member States will be achieved no later than the end of the (group corrupt) period, and only the rate of reduction during the third stage remains to be fixed by qualified majority of the Council of Ministers.

2. Establishment of the Common External Tariff

Canada: Fears that application of the rules for establishment of the external tariff can only lead to a situation in which certain duties are higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of the duties previously applied.

Reply: (a) GATT Article 24, paragraph 5A, stipulates that the duties on the whole shall not have higher general incidence than previously existed.

(b) Although certain individual duties will be raised above their current level others will be lowered, so that duties considered as a whole will not have a higher general incidence. The GATT requirements are thus satisfied.

(c) Article 19 (now Article 18) of the treaty stipulates that the Member States are disposed to contribute to GATT objectives through the conclusion of agreements on the basis of reciprocity and mutual advantage to reduce duties below the general level authorized in GATT Article 24.

II. QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTIONS

1. Re-establishment of Quantitative Restrictions

Canada: Considers that the treaty will lead to the following situation: if a Member State judges it necessary to re-introduce quantitative restrictions, it will almost inevitably apply them in discriminatory fashion to third countries, since it is only as a last resort and through special authorization of the Common Market institutions that non-discriminatory restrictions could be introduced. The result would be (a) to deprive Common Market Member States of their right under GATT to adopt all appropriate safeguards to cope with balance of payments difficulties; and (b) to affect the ability of Member States to eliminate restrictions toward third countries.

Reply: The objection is less to treaty provisions themselves than to measures that the Member States or institutions could be induced to take in the future. It is useful to recall in this regard that it is envisaged to insert in the draft treaty a provision to the effect that the rules of the treaty cannot be applied in a manner which runs counter to obligations which Member States have subscribed to in other international agreements.

The treaty provisions, and particularly those on mutual aid are designed to avoid to the maximum extent re-introduction of quantitative restrictions as a device to re-establish equilibrium in the balance of payments. Mutual aid could be invoked not only in case of balance of payments difficulties towards member countries but also with regard to the outside world.

2. Common Liberalization Lists

Canada: Fears the prospect of common liberalization lists since in its opinion these lists would inevitably be established at the level attained by the country in the least favourable balance-of-payments position.

Reply: (a) Under Article 62, paragraph 5, (now Article 111) of the treaty Member States agree to make their lists uniform at as high a level as possible.

(b) In Article 61, paragraph 1 (now Article 110) Member States announce their intention to contribute to the harmonious development of world commerce and to the progressive elimination of restrictions on international trade.

III. AGRICULTURE

1. The Canadian Government formulates no objection to the full inclusion of agricultural products in the Common Market and understands the necessity of envisaging the application of certain special rules during the first years after the entry into force of the treaty. [It is not clear whether this is an interpretation by the Conference Secretariat].

Reply: In principle agriculture is subject to the general rules of the treaty; in conformity with the concept of a Customs Union defined (group corrupt) Article XXIV duties and quantitative restrictions will be eliminated among the Member States and a common external tariff will be created vis-à-vis third countries.

The special rules for agriculture are for the most part limited to the transition period for example, systems of minimum prices: long term purchase or sales agreements among the Member States.

All the methods of the system envisaged have not been worked out yet; the majority will be fixed within the framework of the common agricultural policy, whose elaboration and entry into effect will take place only after the treaty has come into force. In any event the common agricultural market will be fully realized at latest at the time that the common organization of agricultural markets is created.

2. Canada: The treaty appears to envisage effective measures of protection against imports from third countries. Although some special difficulties inherent in liberalizing agricultural imports have been recognized by GATT, for example in the case of Belgium and certain derogations have been granted, it would be dangerous to envisage more extensive derogations.

Reply: The provisions on agriculture do not imply in any way the establishment of import restrictions on imports by the Community or by the Member States. It is possible, however that in certain cases measures might be taken in the framework of the common organization of markets with a view to regulating imports. The institutions of the Community have the right to take appropriate measures after the transitional period, but these must conform to agreements and obligations undertaken in international organizations.

3. Canada: It would be particularly disagreeable to find (a) that long term multilateral agreements would be concluded among Member States; (b) that discriminatory state trading would be introduced.

Reply: The conclusion of long term multilateral agreements is limited to products for which there is a national organization of the market in a Member State. The validity period of these contracts expires in any case when a common organisation of markets is introduced for the products in question – in general beginning with the second or third state or at latest at the end of the transition period. Finally, to safeguard the interests of third countries, the provisions on long term agreements explicitly include an obligation to take account of traditional commercial trade flows.

There is nowhere in the treaty an obligation to institute discriminatory state trading nor state trading of any kind. While provisions for the common organization of markets do not inhibit the institution of state trading, it will be for the Community to insure that the measures it takes are compatible with international obligations contracted by the Member States.

IV. GENERAL

Canada: Asks that the points of view expressed in its aide-mémoire be taken into account in the definitive phase of the work of the conference.

Reply: From the beginning of the negotiations the Conference has been aware of the need to avoid incompatibilities with other international agreements already in force. It is moreover envisaged that a provision will be inserted in the treaty imposing an obligation for the Community to take account of existing international conventions and agreements.

Note de la direction générale des Relations commerciales internationales du ministère du Commerce

Memorandum by International Trade Relations Branch, Department of Trade and Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL. FOR OFFICIAL USE ONLY. [Ottawa], April 9, 1957

EFFECTS ON CANADIAN TRADE

This is a preliminary appraisal based on the text of the Customs Union Treaty and Annexes

Canadian exports to the Common Market countries have increased in 1956 to over $350 million, of which three-fourths go to Germany and the Benelux countries. Germany is the largest market, absorbing about $150 million, followed by Belgium ($58 million), Netherlands ($54 million), France ($53 million) and Italy ($38 million). More than one-half of total Canadian exports is made up of agricultural goods (wheat: 33%) and about one-tenth, at present, is made up of manufactured and chemical products. The remainder of Canadian exports consists of industrial raw materials and semi-finished products.

On the basis of available information, more than 50 per cent of our exports to Europe will probably be adversely affected in varying degrees by the establishment of the proposed Customs Union. This proportion consists of manufactured goods and chemicals in general, agricultural products and even some industrial raw materials which are produced in Europe or in the associated overseas territories.

Affected Products

(1) Germany, Belgium and Netherlands are major markets for Canadian exports of manufactured and chemical products. These represent over 10 per cent of Canada's total sales to these countries and these are the very countries which will have to raise their national customs duties on practically all these imports so as to bring them in line with the common tariff. This higher level of tariff structure will entail a tariff differential in favour of European competitors which it would be practically impossible for our exporters to overcome. Canada would also be at a tariff disadvantage on the French and Italian markets, although their general tariff structures will be somewhat lower. The manufactured products affected include chemicals in general, office machines, stoves, radio and wireless apparatus, gas engines, parts of farm implements, synthetic fibres, machinery in general, etc. These are exports which, it had been hoped, would have increased appreciably with the further removal of import restrictions in Europe.

(2) In addition, some products, such as aluminum in primary forms, lead and zinc, lumber, synthetic rubber, and wood pulp, which also represent an important proportion of total Canadian sales to these countries, might also be affected by an increase in the general incidence of the existing tariffs. The fact that common duties on these products are to be fixed between Member States leads us to expect that these negotiations will result in higher common duties than would have been the case from the strict application of the "arithmetical rule". This special treatment appears to be designed to provide effective protection through a high common tariff to products imported from the overseas territories and to domestic industries. The Customs Union countries already purchase from the French Overseas Territories 40 per cent of their total imports of vegetable oils, 38 per cent of copper, 30 per cent of zinc and non-ferrous metals and 12 per cent of lead. Production of aluminum and iron ore in the overseas territories could be expanded substantially.

(3) Canadian sales of agricultural and fish products to common market countries would also be affected in varying degrees through the implementation of the existing provisions of the Treaty. These will involve increased protection through an increase of Customs duties in our major markets combined with restrictive devices, such as high minimum prices and long-term marketing arrangements with increasing quotas designed to dispose of European surpluses of agricultural products in other European importing countries. As is noted above, more than 50 per cent of total Canadian sales to the Messina countries consist of agricultural products. Wheat alone accounts for over 30 per cent, while the rest is largely made up of vegetable oils, barley, rye, oats and tobacco.

Wheat represents our largest export item to Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands and Italy, accounting for about 30 per cent of their total imports of wheat. With the exception of Belgium and the Netherlands, imports of wheat are not liberalized but the monopolistic State trading organizations in Germany and Italy have bought regularly substantial quantities of Canadian wheat. Our chief European competitors have been French exporters who continue to receive substantial financial assistance so as to gain and consolidate their foreign markets. It is also to be noted that Morocco has entered the Common Market for the first time in 1955 with sales of wheat to Germany totalling about $6 million. Although it is considered that the common tariff on wheat which is expected to be 20 per cent, would not in itself be a serious obstacle to imports of Canadian wheat into the Customs Union, this preference coupled with long-term marketing arrangements for increased quantities and at subsidized prices granted to our Customs Union competitors would, no doubt, be harmful to our sales to the Member countries. Barley and other coarse grains are also expected to be subject to long-term contracts between exporting and importing Customs Union countries. These contracts involve the revival of State monopolies in Belgium and Netherlands for the products concerned.

The extent to which other Canadian agricultural exports could be affected by the establishment of the Customs Union will largely depend on the forms of organization envisaged in the Treaty for the various agricultural products. These restrictive measures applicable to all agricultural and fisheries products are to be determined on a product basis after signature of the Treaty. Flax seed which is our second largest export will be admitted duty-free but may well be subject to these restrictive trade devices such as the operation of minimum prices below which imports from any country are either suspended, reduced, or prohibited unless they are sold at higher prices. This method will apparently be applicable to a large number of agricultural products.

The Italian market for salt cod will likely be lost to French competition (and Norway as a Free Trade Area member) as a result of a prohibitive common tariff and marketing agreements. Canadian exports of canned salmon will be more expensive as a result of a high common tariff of 20 per cent and, therefore, more vulnerable to substitutes. Except for Germany, the common tariff on seeds for sowing will represent an increase of 10 per cent. The common tariff of 30 per cent on tobacco will increase the protection for Italian and German producers and provide a shelter behind which the production of tobacco within the community could be expanded. Our sales at present amount to about $1 million a year.

Unaffected Products

It is expected that the competitive position of a number of Canadian exports will remain unchanged tariffwise as they are already admitted free of duty in all countries of the proposed common market. No tariff is expected to be imposed on their imports. These are asbestos, scrap iron and steel, copper, and undressed hides and skins which account for 10 per cent of our total sales to these countries.

A further group of Canadian exports to Western Europe should be unaffected or affected very little, as the incidence of the common tariff is not expected to involve a substantial diversion of trade from Canada to sources within the Common Market. Indeed, some of these may in the long run find an expanded market in Europe. This would stem either from a lack of basic resources in Western Europe (e.g. nickel and copper scrap) or from Western Europe's partial dependence on outside supplies for some basic commodities (e.g. steel plates with nickel content, newsprint, copper rods). In these latter cases, the incidence of the tariffs would probably not have much effect upon purchases from Canada. This group is made up of non-ferrous metal scrap, nickel, newsprint, steel plate with nickel, copper, titanium, and cadmium. They account for 10 per cent of total Canadian exports to these countries. It should be noted, however, that with the establishment of the Free Trade Area, Scandinavia will have a tariff advantage (as well as a freight advantage) in exports of newsprint to the Common Market countries, which are traditional purchasers of the Canadian product.

In summary, while the Common Market may involve in the long run an expanded demand for Canadian exports of most industrial raw materials, a substantial diversion of trade from Canada to the partner countries is expected to take place in the field of manufactured goods and chemicals, agricultural and fisheries products and some industrial raw materials, which now account for well over 50 per cent of total Canadian sales to the Common Market countries.

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION AND THE GATT REVIEW OF THE COMMON MARKET

On March 25 the following countries signed a Treaty to establish a European Common Market: France, Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, Netherlands, Luxembourg and Italy. This Treaty is subject to ratification by the legislatures of these countries. It must also be examined by the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in order to determine whether it is consistent with the provisions of the General Agreement relating to customs unions and to consider what is to be done with respect to any inconsistencies. The Intersessional Committee of the GATT will meet on April 24 to give some preliminary consideration to this and to set a date for the Contracting Parties to the GATT to give definitive consideration to the Treaty.

2. In considering when and how Canadian views on this Treaty should be expressed, the Cabinet will wish to take into account the political as well as the economic aspects of the problem. Both sets of considerations are very important and each has a moderating effect on the other.

3. For the Governments of Western Europe, the achievement of a European Economic Community (as the Common Market is to be called) is perhaps the most important development of the past 12 years, to be compared only with the establishment of NATO. Their present undertaking may represent for them a stepping stone to the kind of federal political union which Germany achieved in the 19th Century, via a customs union. The logical development of this would be the creation of a United States of Western Europe.

4. There are compelling reasons which have led the political leaders of the six countries to adopt this course. Perhaps the most important is the necessity, as they see it, of recreating a Western Europe able to stand more firmly on its own feet and to compete in an era of larger economic units dictated by mass production methods and the prospect of atomic power. Faced with the erosion of Western Europe's political and economic position in the world, leaders such as Chancellor Adenauer, M. Spaak and in past years M. Schumann, have been forced to the conclusion that only by means of integration in the political and economic spheres could Western Europe hope to survive as something more than a group of small and middle powers dependent in the final analysis upon the United States.

5. Another motive was to facilitate close cooperation between France and Germany. Equally important, given the present division of Germany, was the problem of binding Germany — or at least Western Germany — firmly to the West.

6. The United States Government has consistently given the Europeans every encouragement in their pursuit of Western European integration. It supported the establishment of the Coal and Steel Community and the ill-fated European Defence Community. It has also encouraged the six countries concerned in their endeavours to set up a Common Market. Even the restrictive nature of the Common Market Treaty as it has emerged from the final negotiations does not appear to have weakened U.S. support. Nor does the United States Government seem to have been disturbed by the approval which these Treaties have evoked from some anti-American elements in Europe, especially since Suez.

7. The United States presumably sees in this development some prospect that Western Europe may become less dependent on Washington. Presumably they hope that the result would also be a more prosperous Western Europe which would strengthen the whole Atlantic area. It would seem that for such reasons the United States Government has so far been willing to accept the potential disadvantages to its commercial interests and the risk of a relatively more "free-wheeling" Western Europe.

8. After many months of opposition to the proposed common market, the United Kingdom Government decided last summer that, both for political and economic reasons, it should seek instead a method of association with the Common Market. The United Kingdom Government came to the conclusion that free trade area arrangements with the common market countries would protect their relationship with the Continent with a minimum of damage to their interests elsewhere.

9. The Canadian Government has, from the beginning, sympathized with the objectives of Western European economic integration, although we have been more conscious than the United States of the potential damage a restrictionist approach could do to our exports and to the structure of multilateral world trade. As early as February, 1950, we welcomed the prospect of closer economic co-operation among the countries of Western Europe which might eliminate uneconomic production and encourage competitive efficiency. Speaking in Bonn in 1954, the Prime Minister emphasized the need for "the peoples living about the great basin of the Atlantic Ocean" to work for the solution to their economic, political and military problems in closer integration.[39]

10. It is particularly important to Canada that these European developments should take place within the framework of the Atlantic community of interests. Though this is also central to the United Kingdom position, it is not so vital either for the United States or for Western Europe. They need a transatlantic framework for military security: For Canada and the United Kingdom it is essential in other fields as well. No country of the area would stand to suffer more than Canada from a growth of Continentalism in any field on either side of the Atlantic.

11. For such reasons as these, the Canadian Government have qualified their support for the current developments in European integration. When the United Kingdom made its proposals for a free trade area in association with the common market, the Canadian Government expressed a cautious welcome for the whole scheme. A statement issued by the Prime Minister on November 13th warned against some of the dangers involved and concluded:

> "Should the proposals be adopted and successfully carried through by Britain and nations of Western Europe they should increase the economic strength and prosperity of the peoples of that whole great area and also their sense of solidarity and common purposes even beyond the economic field. Such a result could not fail to be welcomed by Canadians whose security, and cultural and political heritage as well as economic welfare have been, and are, as closely linked with that of the world."

12. The prospects for ratification of the Common Market Treaty appear to be fairly good, provided the French Government survive their current economic crisis. Many of the less defensible features of the Treaty are the result of concessions made by some member countries in order to facilitate ratification by France. It is now probable that by mid-summer (i.e., well before the German elections on September 15), the Treaty will have been ratified and the new institutions will commence operations on January 1, 1958. The programme for achieving the common market will extend over a 12-15 year period.

13. Negotiations on phasing and detail will continue, for much has deliberately been left out of the treaties. These supplementary negotiations will affect the manner and spirit in which the common market will be implemented. It is in these negotiations that outside countries have most hope of influencing, by means of the GATT review and through diplomatic consultations the impact which the Common Market will have upon their trade.

14. In recent months as some of the treaty provisions began to emerge in draft form we sought from the six countries assurances that the provisions of the treaty would be consistent with the GATT. We also made written representations about certain aspects of the treaty as we understood them. A preliminary examination of this Treaty and its Annexes reveals a number of important provisions which appear more damaging to trade than we might have expected and indicates the following areas of danger:

(a) With respect to the common tariff to be developed by the six countries, the Treaty lays down a framework which will facilitate unjustifiably high levels of protection on many sectors of interest to Canada, such as wheat, fish, chemicals synthetic rubber and aluminum, as well as over a wide field of manufactured goods.

(b) With respect to import restrictions, the Treaty establishes a basis for policies which could well reinforce existing discriminatory restrictions for an indefinite time. It could also lead to the development of common measures of restriction against the outside world, something which Canada has consistently opposed. The provisions of the Treaty might entail the re-imposition of restrictions by countries like Germany and Belgium and discourage others from removing theirs. If these developments occur, the Treaty will not only lead to a permanent system of tariff differentials vis-à-vis outside countries, which is of course the effect of any customs union, but will, in addition, strengthen the use of discriminatory import restrictions.

(c) The agricultural provisions of the Treaty (which cover both agricultural and fisheries products), will establish a common system of permanent protection in Europe. The Treaty provides for guaranteed prices, long-term marketing agreements among the members and restrictive measures on imports. These long-term marketing agreements must be established within the first four years of the Treaty, and member countries are committed to employing every possible measure, especially in the field of import restrictions, in order to ensure the fulfilment of these agreements. The extent of the protection envisaged by the Treaty is shown by a clause which states that members may import agricultural products under long-term contracts from outside the community if these are required for processing and re-export and goes on to state that even this will not be permitted if the member countries, as a group, decide to subsidize purchases within the Area. These agricultural provisions are likely to lead to the stimulation of high-cost production in Europe and are bound to affect Canadian exports of wheat, barley and other agricultural products which make up about 50 per cent of our present trade with these countries.

(d) The Treaty provides for the association with the Customs Union of the dependent overseas territories of the European countries, as well as of such countries as Morocco and Tunisia, which have lately achieved independent status. Exports from these areas to the Common Market will receive preferential tariff treatment and will benefit from the protection of the agricultural arrangements. In return these territories will extend to the Common Market countries the preferential tariff treatment they now grant to the metropolitan countries. Some of these areas are important potential producers of commodities which compete directly with Canadian exports, such as wheat, iron-ore and aluminum.

(e) The Treaty provides no clear general undertaking that the arrangements envisaged will be consistent with the obligations of the member countries under the GATT and the IMF. Indeed, the implications of some of the provisions of the Treaty are that member countries will give priority to the Treaty in cases where there is a conflict with other international obligations.

15. The actual agreements that have been reached, therefore, are inherently much more objectionable than the proposals which were made at earlier stages. The various arrangements envisaged under the Treaty seem heavily weighted towards regional protectionism with all that this implies. There are increasing expressions of concern within Europe about the undesirable effects this could have on the European economy. It will be recalled that, in the recent discussions between Prime Ministers in Bermuda, Mr. Macmillan indicated that he had some fear that the six European countries might be moving in a protectionist direction and cutting themselves off from world trade. Our failure to make constructive comments would disappoint influential groups in various European countries, inside as well as outside the Common Market, who are hoping for our support of liberal trading principles. These developments create a most difficult dilemma for the formulation of Canadian policy. There are strong reasons to avoid conflict with the six governments; in particular, we would not want, by criticizing the Treaty, to be held partially responsible for any failure to get it ratified. On the other hand, Canadian export interests will be affected by the protectionist features of the Treaty.

The establishment of this Common Market has serious implications in many different fields:

(a) The creation of a regional protectionist trading bloc in Western Europe could well lead to the emergence of regional and restrictive arrangements in other parts of the world and perhaps even to the breakdown of the present system of multilateral trade. Of particular importance from Canada's point of view are the repercussions this may have on United States trade policy. With the development of regional groupings, which would weaken the status of existing international organizations, there is a real danger that protectionism in the United States will once more gain the upper hand.

(b) The establishment of a European Common Market along the lines envisaged in the Treaty could also have implications for North Atlantic solidarity. The proposed arrangements could result in a considerable weakening of the trade links within the North Atlantic community and affect the basis of close co-operation in the economic field that has been developed thus far.

(c) There are also important implications for countries in Asia and Latin America. In the face of a restrictive European regional trading bloc it will become increasingly difficult for Japan to continue to centre its trade policies on its GATT relationship, and it will be under increasing pressure to look elsewhere and to establish exclusive arrangements of its own. The provisions in the Treaty for special relations between the European Common Market and overseas territories will lead to intensified discrimination against the products of underdeveloped countries in Asia and Latin America. The creation of a trading bloc comprising the most highly industrialized countries of Europe will further increase the dissatisfaction in these countries about present world trade arrangements.

16. The implications outlined above are all of concern to Canada. The Canadian Government has worked for the past ten years to promote multilateralism as opposed to regionalism in world trade. The Canadian Government's policy has been motivated by a positive interest in trade on the widest possible basis and also by a desire to avoid joining any particular trading bloc. It may be that the cross-roads of these efforts has now been reached.

The damage that might result to Canadian exports from the creation of this Common Market appears to go beyond the normal disturbances and adjustments that could logically be expected from the creation of any customs union. Canadian exports to the Common Market countries are now over $350 million. Over one-half of this total consists of agricultural products, primarily wheat. About one-tenth consists of manufactured and chemical products, and it had been hoped that as these countries continued to remove their restrictions this sector of our trade might have increased. The effect of the high common tariff, combined with special protective devices for agriculture and other preferential arrangements, could be to limit our exports to these countries largely

(a) to industrial raw materials not available in the Common Market or its associated territories, and,

(b) to wheat and other agricultural products only after surpluses within the area had been absorbed.

The result could be to make Canada even more dependent on the export of primary products and on trade with the United States.

17. The Intersessional Committee of the Contracting Parties to the GATT will meet in Geneva on April 24, 1957, to discuss procedures for consideration of the Common Market Treaty. There will have to be a full Session of the Contracting Parties to consider the substance of the Treaty as against the relevant GATT obligations and the trade interests of countries outside the Common Market. The most urgent issue to be decided by the Intersessional Committee is whether this Session should be held before or after ratification of the Treaty by the six governments. The United States would prefer the latter course, in order that any critical comments they may make will not embarrass the ratification process. We appreciate the importance of the U.S. reasoning. However, in view of the damage that could be done to Canadian trade interests by the terms of this Treaty, it may be difficult for the Canadian Government to justify having withheld criticism until after the Treaty has been ratified. It appears that many other countries, including most Commonwealth countries, favour an early GATT session.

Recommendations

1. That the Canadian Government should be prepared to participate in the GATT review of the Common Market Treaty at the earliest date at which an effective session can be held — before ratification if it is found that a representative majority of the GATT countries hold this view.

2. That the Canadian Government should continue to seek assurances that the Treaty will be interpreted and administered so as to minimize damage to Canada's broad trading interests.

3. That the Canadian Government should, at an appropriate time, advise the six countries that, despite Canada's sympathetic attitude to the objectives of the Treaty, (a) at the GATT Session we shall be unable to concur in those provisions of the Treaty which go beyond the essential principles of a customs union and unjustifiably impair Canadian trade interests, and (b) Canada reserves its rights to take appropriate measures, if necessary, with a view to restoring the balance of advantage in the Trade Agreements between Canada and these countries.

4. That action which may be required from time to time to implement these decisions may be taken on the authority of the three Ministers primarily concerned.[40]

GATT — MEETING OF THE INTERSESSIONAL COMMITTEE APRIL 24 TO 27 TO CONSIDER THE COMMON MARKET TREATY

The Intersessional Committee took the following decision concerning procedure for considering the Common Market Treaty:

1. At the end of the Intersessional Committee's meeting the Executive Secretary shall transmit to all Contracting Parties the summary records of the Committee's proceedings on the treaty together with any documentation that may be received from the Interim Committee for the Common Market. At the same time he shall invite Contracting Parties to submit questions not later than May 31 1957 concerning the provisions of the treaty and its implementation.

[40] Approuvé par le Cabinet le 11 avril 1957./Approved by Cabinet on April 11, 1957.

2. A small working group of the Contracting Parties to be appointed by the Chairman shall meet immediately after the end of May to prepare a consolidated list of questions for transmission to the Interim Committee. The Executive Secretary shall then forward the list to the Interim Committee and shall enter into such consultations as may be necessary to assist the Committee.

3. The Interim Committee shall be requested to supply explanations in answer to the questions to the Executive Secretary not later than July 15. These will be conveyed by the Executive Secretary to the Contracting Parties. The Intersessional Committee shall be convened in the latter half of August for such further examination of the treaty as may be necessary and to recommend the subsequent procedure to be adopted for consideration of the treaty by the Contracting Parties either as a special session or at the latest at the Twelfth Session".

2. This decision represents a compromise between those countries who desired a special session before ratification (e.g. Japan, India and Dominican Republic) and those who wished to defer the matter to the 12 Session (e.g. USA, UK and the Six). It is generally agreed that this compromise decision has two main advantages:

(a) Provides time for Contracting Parties to thoroughly examine the treaty and prepare for an effective review later in the year;

(b) Draws the attention of the Six to the detailed concerns of other countries and thereby maintains pressure on them during the next few months.

The decision grew out of awareness that time is required to examine the treaty, appreciation that the Six must begin the ratification process almost immediately, and desire of European members to defer the problem until the free trade area negotiations are further advanced.

3. Approval of these procedures was accompanied by a general discussion of the treaty. In this discussion the representatives of twenty Contracting Parties made statement. Nearly all representatives stated that they feared the Common Market will become a new preferential area which would seriously damage the trading interests of non-members. Many criticized the agricultural plans affiliation of overseas territories and level of the common tariff and indicated the belief that these provisions were contrary to GATT. Several doubted that the transitional phase would be completed in fifteen years. Many enquired if Article 234 of the Treaty meant the Six would modify the treaty to conform with GATT and indicated they would welcome assurances on this important point. Some pointed out that GATT decisions on the Common Market will establish precedents for the free trade area. While the USA indicated support for the treaty it expressed serious concern over the common tariff, agriculture and overseas territories. The UK made a reasonably strong statement which questioned the adequacy of the plan and schedule and criticized the agricultural provisions inclusion of overseas territories and the level of the tariff. The USA, UK, Australia, India and South Africa stated that the provisions covering QR's (quantitative restrictions) required clarification. India and South Africa mentioned that benefits from the OEEC programme for removing QR's had been restricted to Member States. Brazil, Ceylon, Dominican Republic and Indonesia indicated they feared the Common Market would retard their economic development. Dominican Republic, India, Japan and Peru formally reserved their position until the Contracting Parties examine the treaty. The Dominican Republic and Indonesia indicated they would withdraw concessions granted to the Six if their trade is damaged. New Zealand stated it would re-examine its trade policy and consider withdrawing concessions if the Common Market injured its trade. Nearly all statements were intelligent firm and moderate. There were no irresponsible outbursts. The text of the Canadian statement is reproduced in the immediately following telegram.†

4. The Representative of the Six (Baron Snoy) spoke before and after the general discussion. His first statement largely ignored the commitments of the Six under GATT and the interests of non-members. It consisted of vague generalizations such as the Common Market is in the interest of world trade, the text of the treaty should be viewed as a whole, the treaty will be implemented in a "flexible" way, the treaty provides for the accession of other countries and GATT has nothing to fear. He continued to speak along these lines in private talks with other delegates which were held immediately after his initial statement and before the committee discussed the treaty. However his post-discussion statement indicated some appreciation of the obligations of the Six to other Contracting Parties and a desire to cooperate in settling any problems that might arise. He said the Six would respect legitimate interests of non-members. He went on to imply they would adhere to the rules of GATT when implementing the treaty. He said the Six expect other Contracting Parties to meet their obligations under GATT and he hoped the others would expect the Six to do the same. Turning to specific observations made by other delegates he said the transitional period cannot exceed fifteen years. Articles 234 of the Treaty applied to all obligations according to common law and that he could not examine the effect of the treaty on the trade of non-members at this time. On the key question of whether the Six would provide assurances to modify the treaty to conform with any recommendations made by the Contracting Parties he gave equivocal answer that might be paraphrased as follows: The Six do not know these recommendations. Acquiescence of the Six will depend on the recommendations and circumstances. The Six will abide by GATT "as long as they are members".

5. As a result of these events many delegations left Geneva with a growing confidence that the Contracting Parties might be able to persuade the Six to follow liberal policies in implementing the treaty. This attitude stands in sharp contrast to the feeling of despair that existed during the early phase of the meeting. The change in attitude began when we took the initiative in securing a change in the Executive Secretary's proposed plan of work for the meeting (out telegram 162 April 9†). It seemed to us that deferring the general discussion until Friday (the last full day of the meeting) ran the risk of stifling the debate leading the Six to believe the Contracting Parties would readily accept their treaty and giving the underdeveloped countries the impression that the USA, the Six, and Wyndham White had agreed that GATT would not raise any serious objections to the Common Market. We therefore took the lead in persuading the chairmen to begin the general discussion on Thursday. From this point on delegates acquired increasing confidence that GATT could effectively influence the application of the treaty. A member of the Indian delegation subsequently summed up the situation by saying our intervention on procedure indicated that at least one major trading country in the West was prepared to fight against the more objectionable features of the Common Market.

6. Other points that might be mentioned are:

(a) Wednesday afternoon and Thursday morning were spent on informal meetings in Wyndham White's office between the Six and successive groups of countries. The meeting were arranged by Wyndham White to provide the Contracting Parties with an opportunity to "confront" the Six with their criticisms of the treaty. The USA and ourselves formed the first group. Partly because no one had explained the purpose of the meeting to us and partly because Corse (USA) used considerable time discussing a technical point on the common tariff we did not have much time to develop our position. However we stressed that we would not support provisions of the treaty which were inconsistent with the GATT and which damaged Canadian trade. We also referred to the lack of balance which provisions of the treaty might introduce in our trade relations with the individual members of the Common Market and indicated that if necessary we would have to consider redressing this balance. The German and Belgian Representatives seemed to think that our concerns would be met through special quota arrangements for Canadian wheat and they hinted that this would be possible within the terms of the treaty. We agreed that the question of wheat was of great importance but emphasized that this was only one of many anxieties to which the treaty gave rise.

(b) In private discussions with members of the Six particularly the Germans we developed the points outlined in paragraph 6 (a). We made it clear that we would withdraw concessions if this became necessary.

(c) In the informal meetings in Wyndham White's Office Belgium (Forthomme) said the treaty was compatible with Article XXIV in the GATT. He went on to say that if some points are incompatible the Six would request a waiver. When we enquired if they would be prepared to meet the terms of a waiver he replied that they would examine each condition on its merits. It would be unfortunate if the Contracting Parties refused to grant a waiver and he hoped this situation would not arise. He refused to give us an assurance that the Six would take full account of the views of the Contracting Parties.

(d) Baron Snoy undertook to provide the contracting parties with a memo explaining the treaty. He did not indicate when this would be available.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL

The nuclear energy problem will be an important item on the agenda of the Ministerial Council, and in view of Canada's known position as a producer of uranium, it would appear advisable for us to make a statement on the subject. It is reported that the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Brussels powers is scheduled for February 11-12 and that there will be on February 15 a meeting of Heads of Delegation of the Messina Conference to perfect their report on the new plans for integration. The precise tactics that the six countries may adopt at the OEEC Council will depend upon the outcome of the political decisions taken at the earlier meetings. We assume, however, that you would not, unless some factors in the situation change radically, wish us to take any stand in the OEEC against Euratom. It appears to us that the Canadian interest, from the nuclear energy point of view, at the OEEC Ministerial Council is not primarily to attempt to influence the issue one way or the other, but rather to assure that, if the OEEC does pursue its nuclear energy discussions (either independently or with a view to co-ordinating with Euratom) Canada will play the part in those discussions to which it is entitled by its position as a producer of nuclear materials. We give below the text of a draft statement on which we should be glad to have your comments. We should also like to have your views as to the validity of the assessment of the Canadian position which is given above, since, however it is worded, the precise effect of your statement will depend to some extent upon its timing.

Text Begins:

The Canadian Delegation has followed closely the important discussions regarding the development of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy which have been taking place in the OEEC during the last three months. The excellent report prepared by the Working Party of the Council, and the estimates now being made by the Commission for Energy of total future energy demand in Europe, both underline the part which nuclear energy will be called upon to play when the other conventional forms of energy have reached or passed their capacity — possibly after 1975. In these circumstances, it is wise and foresighted to examine now, when the possibilities of the new industry are just being revealed, what can be done to co-ordinate its development and avoid overlapping or waste of effort.

As members of the Council are well aware, Canada is one of the world's largest producers of uranium ore. In view of our special position in this field, the Canadian Delegation has earlier stated — and I feel that I should here repeat — that the Canadian Government would welcome the opportunity to market uranium within a suitable international framework. Though as one of the twelve governments now engaged in consultations in Washington to consider the possible status and functions of the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency, we would not feel free at the present time to prejudge the outcome of these discussions, neither would we foresee any necessary incompatibility with the other proposals now being considered.

If therefore the members of the OEEC are agreed that they wish to pursue their examination of the possibilities of action in the field of nuclear energy, the Canadian Government will continue to co-operate to the best of its ability and experience, and in particular is prepared to send a high ranking expert to participate in the work of a special expert committee such as that envisaged in the Working Party's report. OEEC DISCUSSION OF NUCLEAR ENERGY

The assessment of our position given in your telegram No. 171 is substantially correct. We agree that you should make a statement based on this position at the forthcoming ministerial meeting. We would, of course, wish to make this statement as forthcoming as possible; you are, however, aware of the reasons why we are not at present able to announce a detailed policy concerning the sale of natural uranium to European or other countries. We consider that your draft statement pretty well meets the case, and we approve the purpose of the amendment incorporated in the revision given in your telegram 196. We set out below a further revision which modifies your language slightly on a few points. Text begins:

The Canadian Delegation has followed closely the important discussions regarding the development of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy which have been taking place in the OEEC during the last few months. The excellent report prepared by the Working Party of the Council and the estimates now being made by the Commission for Energy of total future energy demand in Europe both underline the part which nuclear energy will be called upon to play when the other conventional forms of energy have reached or passed their capacity — possibly after 1975. In these circumstances, it is wise and foresighted to examine now, when the possibilities of the new industry are just being revealed, what can be done to coordinate and encourage its development and to avoid overlapping or waste of effort. If the plan which may for convenience be called Euratom proceeds, the Canadian Government will support any mutually satisfactory form of cooperation between it and the wider and more flexible type of association proposed in the Working Party's report. In our view a satisfactory form of cooperation will be one which, while not injurious to the further growth of sound relationships with other countries, strengthens the economic base of all the countries of Western Europe and thereby contributes to their political strength and unity. The statements we have heard today have confirmed our hope that such cooperation will be sought and can be attained.

As members of the Council are aware, Canada is and will continue to be an important producer of uranium ore. In view of this fact, and in view also of the developments which have taken place as a result of the recent conference in Brussels, I feel that I should here repeat the statement made earlier by my delegation that the Canadian government would welcome the opportunity to market uranium within a suitable international framework. We do not wish to prejudge the outcome of the present twelve-power consultations in Washington on the status and functions of the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency, and therefore have no comment to offer at present on the question of security controls which may be under examination there. We would assume, however, that the outcome of these consultations is unlikely to be incompatible with the various other proposals for cooperation now being considered. As for the practical arrangements which may be worked out by the European countries co-operating in this important and promising field of activity, we consider that it would be to the advantage of those countries to preserve access on a non-discriminatory basis to the most economic sources of supply of the various materials involved.

Referring specifically to the proposals now before the Ministerial Council, I am authorized to say that if the members of the OEEC are agreed that they wish to pursue their examination of the possibilities of action in the field of nuclear energy, the Canadian Government will continue to cooperate to the best of its ability and experience. In particular, we are prepared to make available a high-ranking expert to participate in the work of a special expert committee such as that envisaged in the Working Party's report. Text ends.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL; DISCUSSIONS ON NUCLEAR ENERGY

The Ministerial Council finished its discussions of nuclear energy at noon to day by adopting a very slightly modified version of the resolution given in our telegram 256 of February 24.† At our suggestion, the word "between" in the title and paragraph 4 of the preamble was changed to "among". In proposing this amendment, we took this occasion to draw the inference suggested in your telegram under reference and stressed again the allusion to the advantages of non-discriminatory access to economic sources of supply which was contained in the text of the statement authorized by your telegram E-165 of February 23. We made this statement during the first part of the debate on February 28 and received comments from a number of sources, including the Secretary General and Sir Hugh Ellis-Rees, on its helpful and constructive character. This was also stressed by the Austrian Minister, Figl, in his clear-headed and powerful statement to the Council.

2. The United Kingdom expressed support for the OEEC and like almost all of the other speakers expressed the belief that the OEEC and Euratom plans were not incompatible. Thorneycroft also referred to the need to abolish trade barriers on a reciprocal basis (along the lines forecast in London telegram 5 of February 25†), and stated that Euratom could not, in fact, exist on a discriminatory basis but would have to get within the OEEC framework. The United States gave assurances of its intention to help the European countries' efforts in the nuclear energy field and stated that the precise form of organization to be adopted was primarily a matter for Europe itself to decide. Spaak, as spokesman of the Six, made an agreed declaration of which the text is contained in our immediately following telegram.† He capped this on his own account with a long and able piece of special pleading which did not, however, succeed in concealing that the Six have yet to agree on the precise form of their proposed co-operation.

3. We shall comment more at length on the Council proceedings by letter. We shall also try to find out as soon as possible the plans for convening the special committee and the names of the representatives who will attend. These names must be submitted within fifteen days and we should be glad to know whether you wish us to inform the Secretary General now that Mr. Bennett proposes to attend or whether his coming will depend upon the level of representation and the dates of the meetings.

4. In conclusion, we wish to thank you for your full and satisfactory briefings.

Le conseiller de l'ambassade en Belgique au chef de la Direction économique

Counsellor, Embassy in Belgium, to Head, Economic Division

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Brussels, November 23, 1956

My dear Ed [Ritchie]:

About the time I left Ottawa some thought was being given in the Department to the possibility that Canada might associate itself in some way or other with Euratom. One suggestion was that we might provide a research reactor; another idea was that we might make token agreements to provide research quantities of uranium to the Euratom countries with an indication that we would be in a position to supply greater amounts in the future. The first of these ideas, for very obvious reasons, does not seem to me to be even a starter. The other idea has much to commend it although since we do not produce enriched uranium it would probably involve some type of trilateral negotiation with the United States.

The anticipated shortages of oil and the reliance of Western Europe on the Middle East for most of its oil has given a shot in the arm to the Euratom negotiations. I was told the other day by the Secretary of the Brussels Committee that it is now not inconceivable that the Messina powers might go ahead with the Euratom treaty alone if there was any thought that the Common Market was going to flounder or be delayed.

Belgium, as you know, has always thought it should have priority to supply the uranium needs of Euratom. However, although the Belgians themselves are very tight-lipped about this, I have been told by both the Dutch and the Germans here in Brussels that the supplies from the Congo will not approach the needs of Euratom and that in fact in a few years most of the uranium which is concentrated close to the surface in the Congo will have been expended.

One of the chief considerations for Euratom is the establishment of a separation plant. This of course is a very costly operation involving overwhelming amounts of power. I gather that this power is simply not available in any Western European country at this time. Under these circumstances Euratom must rely on the separation plants in the United States for all of their fissionable material (largely, I understand, enriched uranium). For strategic and political reasons, I am sure that most of the Euratom Governments find this anticipated reliance a little disturbing. For these Governments the ideal situation would be to establish their own separation plant somewhere in Western Europe. For the moment, because of the shortage of power, this seems virtually out of the question. Perhaps in time (I have heard estimates of ten to fifteen years) atomic reactors will have increased the available power to the point where Western Europe could undertake to set up its own separation plant. Some thought has been given to linking a separation plant with the Inga River development in the Congo but I gather the logistic problems of setting up an Oak Ridge in the heart of the Congo make this a somewhat unrealistic approach. In any event I gather that the development of the power aspects of this project alone are quite bewildering and its unlikely that the Belgian Government could become committed to anything as complex as the establishment of a separation plant.

This raises the question of whether or not Canada is going to establish a separation plant. I assume on the basis that it is cheaper to use the United States facilities at the present time this possibility has not been given very serious consideration. Is it worth thinking about the possibility that a Canadian separation plant would enable us to provide guaranteed amounts of enriched uranium on long-term contracts say of ten years to Euratom countries? While I understand that great amounts of power are required to set up such a plant, surely one of the potential power sites in Canada could be linked to such a project.

As I see it, the advantages would be the following:

(a) The long-term contracts for the provision of enriched uranium to Euratom would in a sense subsidize the establishment of a Canadian separation plant during the initial period when our own demand at home for enriched uranium would not be anything like sufficient to justify the establishment of the separation facilities;

(b) We would have got a firm foothold as providers of nuclear fuel to the Western European countries. This could be a great advantage in ten years' time when uranium or other sources for fissionable material may have become more abundant;

(c) From the point of view of our own strategical and political outlook there is much to be said in having our own separation plant in Canada;

(d) In terms of doing something concrete to promote the Atlantic Community, I can think of no more effective contribution from Canada.

I have the impression that German, Dutch and even Belgian capital is prepared to cooperate in the establishment of such a project abroad. So far I understand they have got a cold shoulder from the Americans. If there was a decision to set up a separation plant in Canada, we might for purely selfish commercial reasons not wish to bring in European capital. On the other hand if there was some worry about the shortage of capital I think it would not be too difficult to attract some investment from Western Europe.

It is more than likely that all of the points which I have mentioned in this letter have been examined in Ottawa. However, from this vantage point, it is difficult to ignore the effects which the recent Suez crisis have had on the plans for developing atomic energy as a source of power in Western Europe. This seems to me to be one of the few places where our commercial, political and strategic interests might all benefit from a decision at this time to establish our own separation facilities. I must confess that I doubt whether Canadian public opinion in the long run will really approve of complete Canadian reliance on United States for the provision of fissionable materials which will play a tremendous part in our industrial development but which will always be subject to the prevailing economic or military policies in Washington.

Sincerely,

GERRY [STONER]

Dear Gerry [Stoner],

Your letter of November 23 is a really stimulating one and one which we shall follow up discreetly. For your own information I would merely remark at this time that something of the sort which you have suggested is in various people's minds here. How likely it is to get further than that I wouldn't dare predict. We shall, however, keep you informed as fully as we can.

Thank you for your good wishes for Washington. We are looking forward to it although we have not started preparations for our move yet. We expect to go down shortly after Christmas.

I should add that we are greatly pleased with the reports which we are getting from Brussels. We detect your fine hand in many of them.

Warmest regards, etc.

EURATOM COMMITTEE OF THREE

Mr. Robertson has forwarded to us from London a letter from Kohnstamm of the High Authority, who is acting as Secretary of the Three-man Committee appointed by the Euratom powers to report on the forseeable level of atomic energy production in the six countries. Kohnstamm mentions that they wish in their report, which is to be completed by the end of February, to take into account atomic energy developments in Canada. He has assembled a small group of experts to help in the drafting and asks whether there is a qualified Canadian official in Europe who might informally discuss with this group the details of the Canadian programme. His letter does not indicate a wish to secure more than the info necessary to round out his report from the technical point of view, but it is of course possible that the request indicates a desire to sound out the intentions of the Canadian Government with regard to sales to the Euratom powers. Whichever is the case, this initiative may give you further reason to consider whether it would be advisable to follow the suggestion in Brussels telegram under reference and suggest that the Three-man Euratom Committee should visit Canada as well as the USA. Or, if you do not wish to do this, you might consider suggesting that Kohnstamm have a talk with Canadian officials when he accompanies the Committee to the USA (as it seems he must do). It seems to us that it would be worthwhile following up the request to find out if anything lies behind it. Moreover, even if there is no more than appears on the surface, it is worthwhile doing what we can to see that the Canadian contribution to the peaceful development of nuclear energy is adequately dealt with in a report which is likely to be an influential document here in Europe.

2. We have written Kohnstamm saying that we know of no qualified Canadian official at present in Europe who could talk with his expert drafting group, but we have asked the Canadian authorities what can be done to procure for him the type of info he asks.

VISIT OF EURATOM EXPERTS

For Brussels

We would welcome an opportunity to discuss matters of common concern with the Committee of Three experts. It would of course be most satisfactory if they could come to Ottawa for this purpose during their forthcoming North American visit. Although we learn from Washington's telegram No. 68 of January 10† that their visit has now been put off until February 2, it may be nevertheless that their itinerary is already determined to a point which would exclude a trip to Ottawa. In this event we would hope that they could arrange for discussions, which we would not expect to be too time-consuming, with our representatives in Washington.

You may therefore extend an invitation through Mr. Spaak along the lines indicated. You should say that we would be glad to have them come to Ottawa to meet Canadian officials concerned, and if they have the time available to visit the Canadian atomic energy project at Chalk River. (This would add one day to their time in Ottawa). Should this be agreeable to them, perhaps they could give us a tentative indication of the date or dates they would come. If they should be unable to come to Ottawa it would not be necessary to consider now the date for a meeting in Washington, as our Embassy there is fairly familiar with the questions likely to arise, and we would probably not send anyone from Ottawa although someone might go down from New York. A date could therefore no doubt be arranged after the arrival of the Euratom experts in Washington.

For CANAC and London

While the formal invitation should go through Mr. Spaak, presumably in Brussels, it may be that you are in the best position to see that our proposal is made known as soon as possible to the three experts. You might therefore get in touch with Kohnstamm (see CANAC's telegram No. 40 of January 10) to explain our plan. A meeting of officials with Kohnstamm himself would appear to be a supplement or alternative to discussions with the three.

VISIT OF EURATOM "WISE MEN"

I believe that you have seen the telegrams relating to the forthcoming visit to Ottawa of the Euratom committee of three, and that Mr. Couillard and Mr. Watson of A.E.C.L. have spoken to you about it.

In the last few days more complete information relating to the visit has become available, and I am writing in the light of that information to make certain suggestions.

At first it was considered that the committee would wish to discuss in Ottawa the more technical aspects of atomic power planning. Recent telegrams, particularly from Washington, have now made it clear that the talks are likely to cover a broader range, including the political aspects of supplying uranium and probably various points relating to the general question of European integration. It is also noteworthy that in addition to talks in Washington with Mr. Dulles and Admiral Strauss, the three visitors are reported to be having a fairly lengthy interview with President Eisenhower this afternoon. In these circumstances, and taking account of the very senior position and political influence of the visitors, I believe that they should be received in Ottawa on a governmental basis. I understand that this is your view also. Indeed it might be considered whether the Prime Minister might meet them briefly at some stage during their visit.

The visitors are to arrive in Montreal by the overnight train from New York about 9 a.m. on the morning Thursday, February 14. It is intended that they should proceed as rapidly as possible to Ottawa, to spend that afternoon in discussions here. These talks would cover a range of subjects of mutual interest, including the supply of uranium by Canada to Western Europe, about which the visitors have asked particularly, and also no doubt a variety of points relating to Euratom and its prospective role in the movement towards European integration. It is intended that the visitors should spend Friday, February 15 at Chalk River discussing questions of Reactor Design and Technology. They might proceed to Chalk River on the train leaving Ottawa at 6:10 p.m. on Thursday and spend that night, and possibly the following night as well, at Chalk River. They are leaving Canada by plane from Montreal on the late afternoon of Saturday, February 16 to proceed to the United Kingdom for discussions there.

I consider this general programme to be satisfactory. It seems to me that it would be desirable to start the visit off with a luncheon on the Thursday, at which a Minister might serve as host. If he is not otherwise engaged Mr. Howe might be willing to do this, or alternatively Mr. Pearson.

As for the discussions in the afternoon, they are more likely to be fruitful if the number of officials present is kept to a minimum. With this in mind, I would suggest that the visitors with a suitable selection from their staff (which will total eleven) might meet under your chairmanship with Mr. Bennett, Mr. Taylor (or Mr. Plumptre) and myself, with a few of our officials who have been associated with atomic matters being present. For my part I would wish Mr. Couillard, Mr. Kirkwood, and perhaps one other officer to attend.

I understand that such a programme would conform with your own ideas, and I believe it would be acceptable to Mr. Bennett although he is out of town and I am unable to confirm this. It seems to me that we cannot await Mr. Bennett's return to make firm plans. I would therefore suggest that you might approach Mr. Howe (or if you wish I will do so) outlining what we have in mind and asking if he would be able to act as host at a luncheon on the Thursday. This might be held about 12:30 o'clock at the Rideau Club, assuming of course that arrangements can be made for the visiting party to make the trip from Montreal to Ottawa in time. We are making arrangements to bring the visiting party by air from Montreal to Ottawa during the morning to arrive in good time for the luncheon.

The afternoon talks could then take place, either in your conference room or in ours depending on the size of the group, at about 2:30 p.m. I believe Mr. Bennett's staff envisage that those visitors who will be going to Chalk River should do so on the 6:10 p.m. train that evening, spending that night and perhaps the following night also at Chalk River and returning to Ottawa either Friday evening or Saturday morning to leave for Montreal about noon on Saturday in order to catch their plane to the U.K.

If Mr. Howe agrees to act as host at the luncheon, it would probably be most convenient for Mr. Bennett and his staff (who are in close contact with Mr. Howe) to make the necessary detailed arrangements for the function. I would suggest that this Department make arrangements for the afternoon meeting, and other administrative matters such as hotel bookings, etc.

I am sending copies of this letter to Mr. Bennett and Mr. Taylor. I should be grateful for your comments, in particular on the question of having a Minister serve as host at the luncheon since the arrangements on this matter should be concluded promptly.

VISIT OF EURATOM'S "THREE WISE MEN"

The "three wise men" and their staff of twelve advisers were entertained at luncheon on February 14, the wise men themselves and Kohnstamm by Mr. Howe and the remainder of the party separately by a group of Canadian officials. The afternoon was spent in discussions in Ottawa with Bryce, Bennett, Macdonnell, and others from Finance, AECL and this department. The following day was spent at the Chalk River plant, where the programme included a tour of the reactors but was devoted mainly to talks by the appropriate technical authorities of Chalk River followed by questions and general discussion. No business programme was arranged for February 16, when the party left Canada.

The discussion on the Thursday centred upon the supply of uranium. Bennett first outlined the institutional, production, contractual, financial and reserves aspects of the Canadian uranium industry, and the remaining time was taken up in questions and discussion arising from this exposition. Interest was shown in the possibility of having some Canadian uranium production financed by European capital, and it was explained that while there was nothing to prevent this the export of that uranium would remain under Canadian government control through Eldorado's purchasing monopoly. There were also many questions relating to the availability of uranium for export to Euratom countries, to which it was replied in effect that production now in existence was committed by contract until 1962 with the purchaser (the USAEC) having the option to continue to purchase up to the same annual amounts after that date. Hence uranium could be made available for Europe (apart from the small quantity now disposable) only in the three following ways (of which the first seemed to attract the greatest interest):

(i) By expanding production of existing mines and arranging for the export to Europe of the increase.

(ii) By re-opening our special price purchasing programme and hence seeking to bring about the discovery and development of new mines.

(b) After 1962

Through a decision by the USAEC not to exercise its option on all or part of the production covered by the existing pre-1962 contracts.

It was made clear that in deciding whether to pursue any of these courses the government would have commercial considerations prominently in mind, and hence would give special attention to the volume and duration of any purchasing contacts proposed by European governments.

In response to questions it was made clear that Eldorado's purchasing monopoly was designed to ensure control of uranium produced rather than to exploit this production for profit.

At Chalk River on the Friday the main starting point was the account given by Lewis of the reasons why he regarded reactors using heavy water and natural or slightly enriched uranium as holding out the greatest promise of meeting the Canadian target of atomic power at 6 mills per kilowatt-hour. There was a good deal of development work involved, but it was hoped that a large scale reactor meeting this target might be built about 1964. The advantage of this type of reactor was based in large part on the relatively high burn-up of fuel which could be achieved. Lewis was followed by the Head of a Reactor Development Team, who outlined the features and characteristics of a projected 200 megawatts (electric) reactor based on the design of the NPD reactor now under construction, which it was hoped could be built by about 1964 to produce power at or near 6 mills per kwh. These two talks were impressive, and were followed with considerable interest and many questions by the visiting party's experts.

The visiting party appeared more interested in early operation on an industrial scale than in high economic efficiency — understandably in view of the fact that marginal power in Europe now costs 10-12 mills per kwh and the cost is rising. Whether or not they accepted Lewis's conclusions, we would expect that they might focus their immediate attention on less efficient types which can be brought into large scale operation rather sooner than the proposed heavy water power reactors. This will be a point of considerable interest in the "wise men's" report.

In summary, the committee's brief visit to Canada was devoted mainly to gathering information on these two particular questions (availability of uranium and power reactor technology) rather than to providing information on Euratom's plans and prospects. It did appear, however, that they were fully in earnest, and quite confident both that Euratom would come into being and that it would undertake a substantial power programme as soon as possible. Etzel stated bluntly, incidentally, that as far as the German government was concerned the ratification of the Euratom and Common Market Treaties was a single and indivisible question.

This account may be shown to officials of the US and UK governments, and the substance of it may be conveyed orally at the discretion of missions to officials of Euratom governments. In remarks concerning the visit to representatives of governments other than these eight, our missions should not give the information in paragraph 2 above concerning our commitments to the USAEC and the methods by which uranium could be produced for export to other countries.[41]

OEEC — THE NEXT SIX MONTHS

When we last wrote on this subject, OEEC was in the doldrums. There was little new work on the horizon and the weak U.K. position gave little hope of progress toward convertibility or toward the fulfilment of the 90 percent stage of intra-European liberalization. The prospects, if not the situation, have now altered considerably and it is now possible to speculate on the general aspects of the work of the organization over the next six months.

2. The principal new elements derive from the Messina Conference, in particular the proposals for a European Nuclear Organization and for a common European market. As you know, the OEEC Working Party on Nuclear Energy in its report C(55) 305 of 15 December has put forward proposals for the establishment of a European nuclear energy administration under the aegis of OEEC. Previously the Brussels Preparatory Commission of the Messina Powers had drawn up the basis for a nuclear energy authority of the Six Powers (Euratom). Neither of these proposals has yet been discussed by ministers but it is expected that the Messina ministers will meet in mid-February (if the French can form a government in time) and the OEEC Council of Ministers is scheduled to meet on February 28-29. In view of the political uncertainties involved, it is unlikely that much definitive progress will be made in OEEC in elaborating the Working Party's report prior to the Ministerial Council. It is expected that this will be one of the most important items on its agenda. It would be hazardous to speculate on the outcome of the struggle for position between the Messina Powers and the OEEC, but compromises are possible. Regardless of the institutional structure which may emerge there is a general recognition of the need for some form of European nuclear energy organization.

3. The situation with regard to the common market is different. The proposals of the Brussels preparatory commission have been publicized and digested. U.K. has made its position clear on this question of an OEEC Heads of Delegations meeting in December: i.e., that the U.K. will not be able to participate in a common market. The U.K. has taken the line that any proposals should be carefully considered by the OEEC with a view to ensuring that non-participating countries are not harmed. Since this question is also primed with political content, further discussion in OEEC has been postponed until the Ministerial Council on February 28-29.

4. Depending on the outcome of the ministerial discussions both these initiatives could give rise to new programs of work for OEEC.

5. The more traditional work of OEEC in the trade and payments field is still overshadowed by the adverse U.K. position and the difficulty for that country to take the lead. Also the French position remains incalculable largely because of political uncertainties.

6. On the payments side, the Managing Board has its usual mandate to report to Council by March 31 on the conditions under which the European Payments Union should be prolonged after June 30, 1956, and, if necessary, to make any proposals for ameliorating the European monetary agreement. Although the Board is only just beginning its discussions this week there seems to be a fairly general conviction that EPU will be renewed for another year without substantial alteration. It has been mentioned by the creditors that the gold ratio might be increased to perhaps 90 percent but country positions have not yet been taken on this issue and it is not yet possible to see what the balance will be.

7. The Managing Board is also giving some thought to the relationship between EPU and non-participating countries — particularly Yugoslavia and Spain. The purpose is to see whether some method might be found for multilateralizing some of the bilateral arrangements with those countries and perhaps with other countries. This study is sparked by the increasing interest which has been shown by Spain and Yugoslavia in OEEC. The Managing Board's work in this field ties in closely with the work of the Joint Trade and Payments Committee on more general aspects of bilateral agreements between OEEC countries and non-member countries which is just now under way.

8. The Managing Board has also a continuing interest in the subject of capital movements (on which it submitted a report recently C(55) 318 of December 27). It will pursue this work in conjunction with the new Committee on Invisibles. Although there is strong pressure from the Swiss delegation for more progress in liberalizing capital movements and invisible transactions, it is a very difficult field and not much may be expected from the current studies.

9. On the convertibility front there is nothing to report or to foresee at the moment. The consultative committee on problems connected with the move to convertibility (C(55) 194 final) has not met and there has been no suggestion that it should meet in the near future. Any movement will depend on the U.K. which, in turn will depend on the success of the U.K. government's efforts to contain inflation and reverse the trend of Sterling reserves.

10. On the trade side the negotiations which will take place in OEEC are beginning to take shape. They will be centred on the fulfilment of the ministerial decision C(54) 291 final taken in January 1955 concerning the extension and stabilization of intra-European trade liberalization at the 90 percent level. This decision to proceed provisionally and by stages to the 90 percent level by October 1, 1956 was taken, if you will recall, only after great heart searching on the part of the European countries with relatively more liberal commercial policies and it provides specifically that progress should be made on aspects of commercial policy other than QR's so as to provide reciprocity for the more liberal countries. More specifically, progress was envisaged in the reduction of restrictions on agricultural products, tariff reductions by high tariff countries, and reductions of artificial aid to exporters. The Steering Board is already beginning to work on its report on the fulfilment of the decision (C(54) 291) which it must submit to Council by June 30, 1956. Already the Danish and Belgian delegations have served notice that, if reciprocity is not forthcoming, they will not be prepared to maintain the liberalization of QR's at the 90 percent level.

11. It is still uncertain whether the subject of trade liberalization will be on the agenda of the next Ministerial Council. There are good reasons for not putting it on the agenda: in the first place the Steering Board would not be able to provide more than a preliminary report as a basis for discussion. Secondly, neither the U.K. nor France would be in a position to take a positive stand, and finally the discussion that might be envisaged might tend to show up the OEEC in rather a bad light just at the time when the major political decisions on the common market will be discussed. It might seem more likely that a major debate on intra-European commercial policy in all its aspects will be postponed until the autumn meeting when, in any case, a definite decision will be necessary on the maintenance of the 90 percent level.

12. Another proposal which is being discussed partly in connection with the 90 percent decision, but also in more general terms in connection with the procedure to be followed after the 90 percent stage is consolidated, concerns new methods for calculating the level of trade restrictions in each member country. The need for a new basis of calculation of percentages of trade under QR's was recognized by ministers (C(55) 291, paragraph 16) and a mandate was given to the Steering Board to suggest a revision of the 1948 base year. The Organization has not however been able to agree on a new base year.

13. The Steering Board is now giving preliminary consideration to new methods of procedure for the further elimination of QR's after the 90 percent consolidation. There is fairly general agreement that the percentage method of procedure by stages has served its purpose and that major concentration should be directed to the non-liberalized items many of which do not even appear in 1945 import figures. The principal ideas which have been put forward are (1) a percentage method for remaining restrictions with perhaps some credit given for relaxation as opposed to removal of QR's, (2) a product by product method — i.e., a negative list approach. The Secretary-General will shortly issue a paper on this subject which, we understand, will also include proposal for tackling the tariff problem and the general problem of reciprocity. We shall report separately on this matter as soon as we find out more about it. All discussions so far have been preliminary and have even been described as "nebulous" by a member of the Steering Board.

14. With regard more specifically to tariffs, the Steering Board will watch closely the developments in Geneva and, if progress is not very great, will be under pressure from the low-tariff countries to produce proposals for reducing tariffs by some European scheme. This is a possibility which we are watching closely. The Steering Board is also in the process of drawing up a report on artificial aids to exporters in pursuance of the ministerial mandate contained in C(55) 6. This report will probably be completed in mid-February. It is regarded as particularly important by the U.K. that some progress should be made (mainly by France) since the U.K. government is under pressure from its own exporters to provide export aids to enable them to compete on the continent and in their markets. With regard to agricultural restriction, the Steering Board is disposed to await the results of the confrontation of agricultural policies and the subsequent opinion of the agricultural ministers on policy questions before undertaking a serious initiative aimed at reducing restrictions.

15. With regard to dollar liberalization, a report by the Joint Trade and Payments Committee is in the final stages preparation. It will contain both the positive and negative elements and is not likely to give rise to any new initiatives in this field. The European countries are too concerned about incipient inflation and the adverse trend of their trade balance with North America as well as the trend of U.S. commercial policy for us to hope for major new moves at the present time. The Organization will probably decide to review the whole situation again in the fall of 1956 on the basis of another dollar liberalization report. We might point out that, if the E.P.U. is hardened by increasing the gold ratio, the effect would be to increase the desirability of liberalizing dollar import restrictions.

16. This is a brief tour d'horizon of the OEEC and will give us a broad picture of possible developments over the next six months as we see them. We have not mentioned the work of the European Productivity Agency from which nothing startling seems to emerge nor the work of the vertical committees. These committees remain interesting forums for discussion but produce very little apart from general reports on their respective fields of interest.

OEEC REPORT ON DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION

The Working Party, after a long and detailed drafting session, has completed its report on Dollar Liberalization TP(56)1. Seven copies sent under cover of our letter No. 271 of January 23, 1956.† The report will go forward to the Joint Trade and Payments Committee on January 26.

2. The character of the report has not been altered substantially. It still contains references to problems connected with liberalization which go beyond those recognized by GATT and IMF as reasons for maintaining QR's. It makes no effort to hide the fact that, although the European countries have specific commitments in their wider organizations to remove QR's as soon as their balance of payments situation permits, many if not all of them, in formulating their import policies do, in fact, take other considerations into account. In OEEC reports it is difficult to prevent member countries from stating their fears and it may even be useful to have them presented and refuted insofar as is possible by reference to recent trends and by discussions of principle.

3. The value of the present report is that it presents, on the whole, a favorable statistical picture of the results of dollar liberalization measures taken over the past year. It does not support the fears of some European countries that the removal of dollar QR's will result in a tremendous influx of North American products, cause unemployment in home industries, reduce trade within Europe and with dependent areas, etc. It does, however, recognize that in some countries there remain factors for consideration apart from balance of payments factors as liberalization proceeds toward the hard core.

4. We have noted, from your telegram, that you would prefer not to have these points mentioned in the report and we have, during the drafting sessions attempted to eliminate the less desirable implications of the points put forward by Member Countries. However, the U.S. Delegation has taken a different view of the OEEC report. They have consistently agreed that Member Countries should put forward their fears regarding further liberalization (in Chapter 5, Section A) on the understanding that other Delegations should be allowed to comment on them (Chapter V, Section B). The resulting report, while not entirely satisfactory to anyone (vis the French Appendix) nevertheless provides a confrontation of views on the problem of dollar liberalization backed up with detailed and helpful statistics. We were put in a delicate situation during the drafting as we never subscribed to the mandate given to the Joint Trade and Payments Committee in December 1954 C(54) 317. Although this did not prevent us from intervening in the discussions whenever we thought it desirable, we were not able to prevent the Member Countries from pointing up problems which they were clearly requested by the Council Mandate to study.

5. Following are the results of the Working Party's consideration of the specific points you raised in your telegram No. E-1278 of December 13[42] and No. E-8 of January 3.†

6. With regard to the implication of reciprocity from the U.S. for further reduction of QR's in Europe, you did not indicate any particular paragraphs which you wished changed. We take it that you do not object to the statement in paragraph 10 of the conclusions that "further (US) measures are desirable in order to assist in the creation of firm and lasting foundations for a multilateral system of trade and payments..." The Working Party are agreed on the principle that there is no question of requiring reciprocity for removal of dollar restrictions but it has emphasized the importance of a more liberal US commercial policy. We should be interested to know specifically what sentences you would wish changed.

[42] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 504.

7. Chapter 5, paragraph 18 (formerly paragraph 33). The Working Party agreed to a revision of the first sentence of this paragraph which we suggested in order to take account of the point of principle mentioned in your telegram E-1278, paragraph 3. It now reads: "Although liberalization of dollar products might be expected to have some repercussions on intra-European trade in the process of a re-establishment of competition, it is significant that no adverse repercussions have been felt so far." We noted your view that the positive statement in paragraph 7 (formerly paragraph 5) of the conclusions was considerably weakened by the emphasis placed on the detailed review of the obstacles to be overcome. We, of course, agree but, in view of what we have said above, we hope you will understand that it was not possible for us to secure the elimination of these sections.

8. Paragraph 9 (formerly paragraph 7) of the conclusions has been modified considerably. The last sentence which you wish deleted has been considerably toned down and is intended to be a reference to the hard core decision of GATT. It now reads: "While the need to abolish discrimination towards the dollar area must be accepted as the long term objective, it is clear that there are some products for which, for varying reasons, there will be little possibility of removing quantitative restrictions in the near future. This is still not a satisfactory sentence from our point of view, and we shall make further attempts to alter it. One of the difficulties is that it has been decided not to refer specifically in the report to commitments in other organizations. With regard to paragraph 31 of Chapter 2 (formerly paragraph 67 of TP/WP6(55)19, Second Revision). A new text was agreed by the Working Party which took into account the comments in your telegram No. E-8 of January 3.

9. The report has been somewhat strengthened by the insertion of a new introductory paragraph to Chapter 5. In this paragraph we have inserted a statement to the effect that relaxations of quantitative restrictions from the dollar area "apart from their underlying desirability, represent an important step on the trade side which will facilitate the move to convertibility." The United Kingdom representative was very hesitant about agreeing to even this modified statement. He did not wish to have any implication that the removal of dollar QR's was either a necessary preliminary step to the move to convertibility or a necessary result of convertibility.

10. As the Joint Trade and Payments Committee will probably consider the report on January 26, you will not be able to send us new instructions in time for that meeting. However, we gather from your reference telegrams that you would accept the report in its present form. We intend to make a statement to the Committee setting out our general views on the report which are reflected in your instructions. If, after reading the latest revisions of the report contained in TP(56)1, you have any further specific amendments to propose we hope you will be able to send them to us not later than February 1st. You will, of course, appreciate that since the report is now out of the Working Party stage it is a more serious and difficult matter to propose amendments.

OEEC DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION REPORT

The Council considered the dollar liberalization report C(55)22 on February 10. No general debate developed on the report itself which, with some amendments proved acceptable to all delegations. We made a statement of our views including points made in your previous instructions. We referred to the present high level of activity in Europe and stressed the importance of member countries seizing on the present favorable situation to adjust their economies to outside competition and to make progress in eliminating QR's as quickly as their individual balance of payments positions permit. We stated our view that the report gave too much emphasis to the obstacles to further progress which tended to obscure the fact that the balance of payments position should be the sole criterion. We stated that our acceptance of the report was predicated on the understanding that it in no way implies a derogation from member countries commitments in this regard in other organizations.

6. With regard to future work on dollar restrictions, Council agreed in principle with the Joint Committee's proposal (paragraph 11 of conclusions) that a further review of the situation should be reconvened during the preparation of the review. In addition, Council approved a proposal by the Economic Committee (C(56)30) that a parallel study should be carried out "covering some aspects of the economic background of the dollar liberalization problem including (1) relative rates of development of United States and European imports and national products, (2) factors limiting the expansion of European (group corrupt) dollar area whether they may be traced to Europe or to the United States, (3) the relative position of European and American goods in third markets, etc.

7. The Secretary-General has been charged with the preparation of a mandate for this background study. If you have any further points to suggest for inclusion in the mandate, please send us instructions as soon as possible.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 26, 1956

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE OEEC

You may have seen telegram No. 634 of April 24 from Mr. Wilgress; a copy is attached, together with a copy of our telegram No. E-378 of April 19, to which Mr. Wilgress referred.

We shall be sending a carefully considered reply to this message when we have had an opportunity to consult other Departments, but we thought we should give you a preliminary reaction in case Mr. Wilgress mentions this question.

There is no very great difference of view between Mr. Wilgress and those concerned in Ottawa about the part the OEEC should play, or about the general form Canada's participation in its activities should be taking. On a number of occasions, however, we have been reluctant to participate in certain individual OEEC projects, sometimes because we thought Canadian participation in these projects inappropriate for one reason or another, and sometimes because we could not make available the necessary experts or detailed technical briefs.

The particular project which is dealt with in our telegram No. E-378 will in our opinion be a highly academic one which it appears to us has been devised as a means of making work for the OEEC. This work would duplicate efforts that are already being made in the United Nations. This seems to be a much more appropriate subject for the United Nations than for the OEEC, since a great many countries in the United Nations, which are not members of the OEEC, are of importance in any worthwhile analysis of the causes and effects of fluctuations of economic activity. When we sent this telegram we were conscious too of our inability to make available for these discussions any official expert enough in this highly technical field. It was not our intention to reflect an unduly negative attitude towards the OEEC with which we believe we have been co-operating reasonably well.

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS OEEC

In recent instructions, and particularly in your letter E-205 of April 4† and telegram E-378, you have set out in some detail your attitude towards the OEEC. While we have not detected any change in principle from the policy which has guided us in our dealing with OEEC ever since its inception, we nevertheless feel bound to comment on the practical application of our policy in the day to day working of the OEEC in the practical situation which now faces us—particularly with respect to its political implications.

2. It is one thing to hope for the speedy end of OEEC (at least in its trade and payments manifestations) and a return to convertibility and the wider trading system in which GATT and IMF are the sole arbiters of trade and financial policy. It is surely quite another thing to expect that by declining invitations to take part in OEEC studies — when the United States is prepared to take part in them — that we are hastening the decline of OEEC. In our view this type of Canadian attitude has no effect whatsoever except to raise the eyebrows of European representatives.

3. The reason they raise their eyebrows, of course, is that we are the advocates of North Atlantic economic collaboration under Article 2 of NATO but we always seem most hesitant to give it any practical expression in OEEC. If, by declining to take part in OEEC studies, there were any possibility of quickening the move to convertibility, the decline of OEEC in the trade and payments field and the strengthening of GATT and IMF, then it would be most reasonable for us to remain aloof, but we fail to see what effect we are having by our attitude.

4. The effect would seem to be just the opposite. The full participation of the United States and Canada tends to influence European decisions in the direction we wish. (The United States has consistently played a full and influential part in OEEC discussions).

5. An example of this is the United States and our own participation in the dollar liberalization study which was strongly influenced by our views. The advantage of our associate membership is that we can influence decisions by our participation without adhering to decisions which we feel are retrograde or too regional in conception. If we fail to make use of our associate membership, whatever influence we might have is wasted or neutralized.

6. One important point that we must reemphasize is that the OEEC is a very highly regarded institution on the Continent. Also it is expressed U.K. policy that it should continue, even after the move to convertibility, to be a forum for European consultation and cooperation. Politically and technically it is an important organ for European cooperation in a large number of fields. It is also a modifying influence on some of the more adventurous projects, such as the common market initiative of the Messina Powers, which would most likely develop along less desirable lines if OEEC were not a vigorous organization. This modifying influence is increased with full participation, within the limits of associate membership, of the North American countries.

7. We fully appreciate the dangers of being drawn into agreements with which we are not entirely in accord, but avoidance of embarrassment should not be beyond us if we adopt a more flexible attitude toward OEEC discussions. In our view the advantages of participation: i.e., of shaping North Atlantic or fully multilateral solutions out of purely European ones, outweigh the risks of embarrassment.

8. Finally, the strength of the desire for European cooperation must not be underestimated. There is no evidence to support the hope that the European continental countries will be prepared to give up their European economic institutions and rely on GATT and IMF as the sole arbiters of international economic policy. The evidence is all in the other direction. If the common market project is brought to fruition, the continuation of OEEC as the organization for establishing links between Common Market countries and the rest of Europe would seem most likely. The maintenance of a strong North American influence in such an organization would seem to be wise.

9. Unless NATO were prepared to take over the economic functions of OEEC, this organization is likely to remain the main instrument for economic cooperation in the North Atlantic area for day to day decisions for as long as such a requirement exists. As such, it will pose many of the practical problems for which consultations regarding the political repercussions of economic collaboration in the North Atlantic area can be held in NATO. Our intervention in such NATO discussions would be weakened to the extent that we remain aloof from OEEC. If we make it clear that our sole preoccupation with OEEC is to see it, and the close European and North Atlantic cooperation that it embodies, disappear, then our motives in NATO will be questioned...a result which could have considerable political repercussions.

10. We have felt these comments might be useful not because, and we would emphasize this point, we wish to raise doubts about basic Canadian policy toward OEEC. We would hope that the trade and payments manifestations of OEEC could be transferred as soon as possible and to as great an extent as possible to GATT and IMF. But, as you are fully aware, the OEEC is now exploring several new fields of action. We ourselves, in this telegram, have suggested certain lines along which its work might in future develop. We cannot, simply by holding aloof, prevent it from entering these new fields if the European members wish to push this ahead; nor can we expect thus to influence their decisions at this evolutionary stage. What we should like to suggest, therefore, is that by a less rigid Canadian attitude, together with fuller participation in discussions and studies, we are more likely to have some success in contributing to the development of the organization's efforts along lines which we consider acceptable.

11. In another telegram† we are reporting on the invitations which were extended to the associate countries to participate in some of the work of OEEC arising out of the ministerial directives.

OEEC STUDIES OF ANTI-CYCLICAL MEASURES

We are not enthusiastic about the developments reported in your telegrams under reference. We agree with your assessment of the proposed OEEC study of anti-cyclical measures, as contained in paragraph 5 of your telegram 553. This appears to be another manifestation of the search by OEEC for new functions to offset the decline in its influence. While this is not the occasion to go into the question of the functions and usefulness of OEEC as a whole, we cannot believe the organization will prove its value or add to its prestige by an attempt to deal with the question of fluctuations in economic activity, which is a worldwide problem that can affect most trading countries, as though it were susceptible to an OEEC solution. This problem it seems to us, can be dealt with more effectively on a broad basis rather than within the confines of any regional group like the OEEC. As you know, we look with considerable disfavour upon projects in OEEC which duplicate the efforts of other established international organizations which are better equipped and are specifically designed to deal with problems of worldwide importance. For example there is as you know as annual United Nations study of employment which covers this field fairly well.

2. We would leave to your good judgement the question of how far you can go in discouraging this project; but if it goes forward we are not in favour of participating ourselves. Our participation in the annual review, which was specifically approved by Cabinet, gives adequate opportunity for an exchange of views on Canadian policy in the economic field.

SECRET Paris, May 14, 1956

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I am submitting herewith three copies of a memorandum on "New Initiatives in the Economic Field" which we have prepared for your use in connection with the responsibilities placed upon you as a member of the NATO Committee of Three.[43]

You will observe that the main proposal set forth in this memorandum is that the United States should take the lead in a renewed drive for the convertibility of currencies and that, in order to provide political and North Atlantic content to this initiative, both the United States and Canada should become associated with the European Monetary Agreement and assume full membership in the OEEC. In order not to drive the neutrals out of OEEC we are careful to recommend no change in the functions or the name of that Organization.

The advantages for Canada of this approach are obvious. The economic advantages for the United States are just as great but may be offset by the implication that they may be expected to underwrite the European balance of payments with the dollar area. We believe that this danger can be minimized by a hedging around of the obligations they would assume and that this could be done by putting forward definite reservations when the proposal is announced. Canada could make similar reservations.

The political advantages for the United States will lie in the fact that for the first time since the Republican Administration came into office they are taking a constructive initiative in regard to Europe, instead of merely carrying on what had been initiated by the previous Democratic Administration. It is to be hoped that this will be sufficient to overcome the lack of interest in economic questions displayed by Mr. Dulles and the apparent indifference of Mr. Humphreys to international co-operation in the financial field.

We have not attempted to work out all the implications of these proposals, because we wished to provide you as soon as possible with a preliminary report. This should assist you in securing expert advice in Ottawa and thereby enable you to come to a decision before you leave for Washington as to whether or not you consider the memorandum opens up a sufficiently promising avenue for further exploration.

We shall be glad to undertake any specific enquiries into points arising out of the memorandum if you, or those advising you, consider that more detailed information is required on any such points.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE
NEW INITIATIVES IN THE ECONOMIC FIELD

The previous investigations on what could be done to implement Article 2 took place in quite a different atmosphere. In the past, the threat of Soviet aggression was a strongly binding cement which held the Alliance together. It was consequently not urgently necessary to reorganize the non-military aspects of collaboration within the North Atlantic area.

2. It was quite evident from the recent Ministerial Meeting, that the Ministers were in unanimous agreement that the new situation of competitive co-existence emphasized the need for strengthening the unity of the Alliance by promoting increased collaboration under Article 2.

3. In this regard, it is evident that the objections which were raised in the past to closer practical economic ties in the North Atlantic area will have to be reviewed in the light of the changed political atmosphere and its dangers for the unity of the Alliance. It may be necessary to adopt a more flexible attitude to the methods of achieving our economic aims which will provide the stimulant for unity and closer collaboration in the North Atlantic area.

4. The problem of increasing economic collaboration in the North Atlantic area has two aspects: 1. The practical measures which might be adopted to increase trade and improve financial relations, 2. The organizational possibilities.

Practical Measures

5. The most important single economic dividing force in the North Atlantic area since the end of the war has been the division of the area into two currency blocks, viz. the EPU area and the Dollar area. All OEEC countries are committed to the objective of convertibility and a wider trading area, but interest in achieving convertibility has noticeably slackened in Europe for a number of reasons. Firstly, the inflationary tendencies in the United Kingdom last year, coupled with an adverse trend in the balance of payments, forced the United Kingdom Government to give up the leadership of the drive to convertibility. This leadership was not taken up on the continent where an adverse trend in the dollar balance was also experienced and scepticism about the possibility of ever reaching a stable dollar balance is widespread.

6. The United Kingdom position is beginning to show hopeful signs of improvement and it may be that before the end of this year convertibility may be a practical possibility, but the United Kingdom has shown no inclination of her willingness to take the lead again.

7. In view of the general stalemate with regard to convertibility in OEEC countries, it may be necessary for a new initiative to come from the North American continent. If such an initiative is feasible — and the political necessities of the present provide a strong lever to dislodge purely economic considerations — it might be worthwhile sounding out the United States Government on the possibility of providing a new stimulus to convertibility.

8. The stimulate that might be necessary would have to be the subject of detailed study and negotiations. An agreement to provide credit up to agreed limits through the IMF would, as was always envisaged, be fundamental to any negotiations. In addition, however, the political desirability of tightening practical economic ties with the European members of the Alliance[44] suggests that Canada and the United States might consider the extension of marginal short term credit through the proposed European Fund.[45] This would involve a form of participation in the European Monetary Agreement, but need not necessarily include North American participation in multilateral settlements.

9. The United States has already agreed that the initial resources provided by them to the EPU should be transferred to the European Fund. An agreement by the United States and Canada to provide relatively small additional amounts of credit through the European Fund might have a significant impact on European countries — particularly the weaker countries. It would also greatly enhance Canada's influence in European economic affairs during the transition to full convertibility.

10. Finally, the United States and Canada might look into the possibilities of strengthening their ties with OEEC with a view to forming what would in fact be a North Atlantic Economic Organization — although it need not be presented as such — to tackle the problems of convertibility and its immediate consequences.

Organizational Problems

11. The question of full membership of the North American countries in the OEEC raises many problems, not the least of which are the entrenched and rigid positions of those who favour a world-wide solution to the West's economic relations (GATT and IMF). These positions will have to be carefully reviewed in the light of the necessity of increasing political and economic collaboration in the North Atlantic area.

12. On the political side, there is the problem of overcoming neutral opposition to full membership for the Associated Countries (United States and Canada) in OEEC if the initiative should come from NATO. This would have to be carefully handled and it would be essential to maintain a sharp division between NATO and OEEC. The neutrals, particularly the Swiss, have always been in favour of the fullest participation by the Associated Countries in the OEEC and if the question of full membership is carefully presented to them their fears may not prove an insuperable obstacle — as they would be if OEEC were to be linked in any way with NATO.

tighten without loosening ties to others [L.B. Pearson]

[45] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
what is this [L.B. Pearson]

13. Full membership in OEEC would not necessarily imply that the North American countries would have to partake in all of the decisions of the Organization. Article 14 of the OEEC Convention provides that:

> "Unless the Organization otherwise agrees for special cases, decisions shall be taken by mutual agreement of all the Members. The abstention of any members declaring themselves not to be interested in the subject under discussion shall not invalidate decisions, which shall be binding for other Members."

Although the OEEC has seldom resorted to the provisions of Article 14, it could be used to free the North American countries from purely European decisions which might be necessary during a transitional period to convertibility. There are a number of other even more flexible arrangements that might be envisaged.

14. A major question to be answered is whether there is really any economic necessity for the North American countries to join the OEEC when the pressures of a move to convertibility will imply the need for trade and payments discussions to take place in the GATT and IMF. On this question, we would agree that as many of the trade and payments functions as possible should be transferred as quickly as possible to the wider organizations. However, the problems of regional transition to a wider system are sure to be difficult and some of them will be relatively long term problems. It may be that there will be a need for strong North American influence and participation to ensure that the progress toward a wider system maintains its initial impetus.

15. It must also be kept in mind that, as the trading potential of the USSR and Satellite Countries develops, there will be augmenting pressure for increased trade and financial relationships between the European countries and the USSR. The possibility that the USSR, by appropriate policies, might be able to provide an alternative to convertibility must at least be kept in mind. The political and defence implications of this possible trend would suggest that North American influence be increased in the OEEC and that, as soon as practicable, the European countries be drawn, through the vehicle of convertibility, into the closest trade and financial relationships with the North American countries and the rest of the Free World. The alternative of closer economic relationships with Eastern Europe, for which there is some support, particularly in European opposition parties, has been raised in the past (viz: in the Council of Europe) and the USSR might conceivably make it a practical alternative.

16. The political advantages of North American membership in OEEC are obvious. It would provide the organizational focal point for collaboration under Article 2 which neither the present OEEC nor NATO has ever accomplished. It would provide an expression of North Atlantic non-military solidarity which could never be achieved in GATT and IMF. Finally, it need not be considered as a permanent necessity but as a transitional phase leading to greater reliance on the wider organizations when the objectives and dangers of competitive co-existence become clearer. We would regard our participation largely as a political move which would not endanger our economic objectives, but on the contrary would provide a more flexible basis for their realization.

17. One political danger which would have to be dealt with positively concerns the reception which might be given to the development of a North Atlantic regional block by the developing countries who might be inclined to consider an extended OEEC as an adjunct of NATO military policy. This possibility would suggest that the sharpest division should continue to be drawn between the defence aspects of NATO and the economic objectives of OEEC. If the closer links between the North American countries and OEEC were accompanied by an increased drive to aid the developing countries through the U.N.

and if convertibility and a wider non-discriminatory trading area — which could benefit all countries — were the stated immediate objectives of the extended OEEC, scepticism of the developing countries might be reduced. These stated objectives might include an affirmation by the North Atlantic countries of their faith in GATT and IMF and their aim to make the fullest use of these organizations.

18. In summary, we believe that some new initiative is probably needed from North America if the move to convertibility is to be stimulated again in the near future. The economic situation in Europe is increasingly favourable for such a move although governmental interest in its realization has flagged. A strong and co-operative attitude from North America, together with an offer to discuss the problems involved on a North Atlantic basis, might provide the required practical and psychological push needed.

19. The alternatives available for consideration seem to be very meagre. There is no interest in, and almost unanimous opposition to, increasing the economic functions — as opposed to consultations — in NATO. The Europeans, including the United Kingdom, are strong supporters of OEEC which, we feel, is certain to continue in existence in one form or another for a long time and may tend to move in a more narrow regional direction. Thus, if we wish to do anything practical to unify the NATO countries in the economic field we have little choice other than to reinforce and extend OEEC. The GATT and IMF are not likely to provide the psychological requirements of increased unity in the area of the Alliance.

20. We fully realize the difficulties involved in taking any action on the suggestions we have put forward. But, if there is to be any result from the NATO Committee of Three, economic views will have to be balanced more heavily than in the past with political requirements, based on the exigencies of competitive co-existence and the necessity of maintaining the unity of the Alliance.

Deputy Governor of Bank of Canada to Head, Economic Division

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 16, 1956

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

I write to acknowledge your letter of the 7th† (which we have already discussed) and to confirm that I think it would be most desirable to have an inter-departmental meeting attended also by the officials who were present at the recent NATO Ministerial Council meeting to discuss, among other things, the questions raised in Mr. Wilgress' telegram of April 24 on the Canadian attitude towards OEEC.

I believe that Mr. Wilgress' message deserves a considered reply and provides a very good occasion to re-appraise our attitude in this matter. It seems to me that any real embarrassment in Mr. Wilgress' position arises out of the stress which Canadian representatives have in the past placed on Article II of NATO (implying, as this might seem to do, some special and exclusive forms of economic cooperation among the members of the alliance) rather than on the instructions he has received in regard to our participation in various OEEC activities. One would hope that the present Three Wise Men exercise in NATO will result in a general clarification of Article II and eliminate this possible source of embarrassment.

Our general line with regard to OEEC has, I think, been clear and consistent and, on most issues in accordance with Mr. Wilgress' own views. There is no doubt that the European countries place a high value on the association with each other in the OEEC and wish to maintain this association even after the particular administrative functions which gave rise to OEEC, e.g. the partitioning of American aid, the extension of large credits through EPU, the intra-European trade liberalization programme, have disappeared or lost some of their importance. This desire is a natural one which we should not discourage. The difficulty, from our point of view arises (a) when the attempt is made to have OEEC rules take precedence over the broader international obligations to which some members of OEEC are subject, e.g. through the IMF and GATT and (b) when the attempt is made to infuse life into OEEC by giving it administrative or other tasks which it is not really qualified, by reason of its regional character, to undertake or which are already being performed adequately elsewhere. The prime example of (a) is, of course, the attitude of some OEEC members towards discrimination and convertibility. A good example of (b) is the abortive anti-cyclical study, with respect to which the sceptical Canadian attitude (our telegram 378 of April 19) provoked Mr. Wilgress' telegram of April 24.

I suppose that so long as the OEEC organization exists it will be under continuous or intermittent pressure (originating partly in the permanent staff and permanent representatives and partly in the weaker countries) to maintain a special set of trade and payments rules and also to assume tasks which are already being done or could be better done elsewhere. The organization is therefore potentially dangerous to us, especially in the trade field. Mr. Wilgress may well be right, however, in thinking that we can reduce the dangers by taking part in a more forthcoming way in some of its activities than we have done, always subject to the proviso that we do not thereby weaken the authority of the non-regional bodies having jurisdiction in the field of trade and payments. I agree, for example, that the dollar liberalization study of the OEEC was a very useful exercise and that our active participation in it was, in the event, well warranted.

Moreover, in spite of the potential danger of OEEC to us in the trade field, it is true, as Mr. Wilgress says in paragraph 9 of his telegram of April 24, that if we make it clear that our sole preoccupation with OEEC is to see it disappear, our motives will be suspect. On the other hand our economic interests will not be served by building OEEC up. The right course for us is probably that enjoined in the New Decalogue:

> "Thou shalt not kill, but needst not strive > Officiously to keep alive".

Yours sincerely,

L. RASMINSKY

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 4, 1956

Attached is a memorandum† from Economic Division and two telegrams dated June 1,[46] the first one on the Canadian attitude to the OEEC and the second on the NATO Committee of Three.[47]

One of the main themes developed in these three documents is that we should not take any initiative to seek full membership for Canada in the OEEC and that we should even be inclined to question the wisdom of the United States taking such an initiative. It is pointed out, however, that if the European members on their own initiative request Canada and the United States to become full members, we will have to consider such a request very sympathetically. After discussing this whole matter with Mr. Ritchie, I am inclined to agree with the line he recommends, although I am somewhat hesitant to suggest that we should take such an attitude vis-à-vis Canadian participation in the OEEC when the whole subject of economic cooperation is to be discussed within the context of your NATO study. I would therefore suggest if you have a minute that Mr. Ritchie and myself discuss this matter with you before the attached telegrams are despatched.

The following comments result from study of your memorandum at the official level.

2. As you have pointed out, the lack of any recent progress by the United Kingdom in the direction of convertibility and non-discrimination is basically due to the internal inflationary situation. Some other OEEC countries, notably Germany, have continued to make substantial progress. In the case of all the OEEC countries it seems to us that apart from their internal economic situations the basic factors in any reluctance to make faster progress are protectionist influences and doubts about U.S. commercial policy and the future level of

[47] Les deux télégrammes ont été signés et transmis le 7 juin.
The two telegrams were signed and sent on June 7.

U.S. economic activity. We do not think a modest or even a fairly sizeable contribution of credit through the European Fund would overcome the effect these influences are exerting. These countries are of course aware that to support convertibility moves stand-by credits would be available from the IMF in amounts very much greater than any practicable contributions the United States or Canada could make to the European Fund.

3. Full Canadian and U.S. membership might result in a considerable change in the character of the organization, lessening its value to the Europeans themselves with the probable result that they would turn more and more to other and sometimes still smaller regional groupings. In our opinion a large part of the value the European members attach to the OEEC results from the fact that it is basically a European organization with only a loose and informal association with the United States and Canada.

4. We would suggest that Article 14 of the Convention would make it more, not less, difficult for us to be full members. We could not declare ourselves not interested in a discussion of, say, intra-European liberalization. Surely we would therefore have to veto decisions which were contrary to our interests, whereas under the present form of association we can turn a blind eye to certain OEEC policies which we do not favour but are prepared to tolerate.

5. We think the present form of North American association with the OEEC is about right, though we will be reviewing the matter in connection with the work of the Committee of Three. Accordingly we ourselves would not wish to take any initiative with regard to North American membership, and we would probably question the wisdom of any U.S. proposal to do so, although we would first have to consider whatever reasons they thought valid. If the European members of their own volition and after considering where their own interests lay were to come to us with such a proposal it might be quite a different matter.

6. We shall in any case, however, do our best to take a more active part in OEEC activities.

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TO OEEC

Although our primary interest is in the work of more broadly based organizations, i.e., the GATT and the IMF, we recognize that narrower groups such as the OEEC or even the Messina countries will find a role to play. We should support and encourage their general lines of activity — so long as they are not too inconsistent with the work of the GATT and IMF. There are some functions the European countries will wish these groups to carry out to which we would have no right or desire to take objection.

2. We still believe it is in our own national interest and in the general interest that the work of the GATT and the IMF should continue to be as effective as possible. We would hope that the principles espoused by these organizations would pervade the narrower organizations and exert a wholesome influence, although we cannot always count on this.

3. Having said this, we agree that the time has come for us to take a more active part in a number of OEEC activities. We agree that by doing so we may have some helpful influence on the trend of the discussions or the nature of the decisions taken.

4. We are giving further consideration to the relationship between the OEEC and NATO and to the question of whether full OEEC membership for Canada and the United States would be desirable. Our opinion at the official level is that any initiative from Canada or the United States on the question of full membership would be unwise and that the present form of association is about right. We are explaining our reasons in a separate telegram.

5. Our intention is to play a more active part in OEEC activities within the limits set by the very real strain this will impose on officials concerned in the interested departments. We would plan to have senior officials from Ottawa attend important OEEC meetings more often than in the past, (and possibly ministers on occasion) and to try to provide fuller briefs for meetings of interest to us which the delegation covers. We shall have to consider what arrangements we can make here to provide quicker and more comprehensive interdepartmental examination of the questions which arise in OEEC meetings and committees. You will no doubt wish to consider just what additional committees we should participate in and what personnel problems may be involved for the delegation in terms of additional and possibly conflicting meetings.

6. Two particular fields in which we might wish to take a more active interest occur to us. One is the European productivity agency, in which the extent of our interest would be considerably enhanced by any possibility that it might be of service in connection with technical assistance to underdeveloped countries. Another is the Committee of Ministers of Agriculture, to whose meetings we would wish to send senior officials more often than in the past.

NATO COMMITTEE OF THREE — OUR MEMO ON NEW INITIATIVES IN THE ECONOMIC FIELD

We appreciate greatly the comments resulting from study of our memorandum at the official level. We have anticipated in our memorandum several of these comments but it may help to bring about a better understanding of our motives in submitting the proposals if we take the liberty of giving you the following comments on the different paragraphs of your telegram under reference.

2. As regards paragraph 2, we did not contemplate that the United Kingdom could move in the direction of convertibility and non-discrimination immediately. We appreciate that further progress in dealing with their internal economic situation is required. We did feel, however, that definite expression of United States support at this stage would revive once more interest in and prospects for the early realization of convertibility and non-discrimination. While the main support would have to come from the stand-by credits available from the IMF, we felt that modest contributions of credit through the European fund by the United States and Canada would serve as a gesture to give concrete evidence of North American willingness to cooperate in the move towards convertibility.

3. As regards paragraph 3, we are fully aware that full Canadian and United States membership in OEEC would change the character of the Organization. However, convertibility would bring about the liquidation of EPU and the Europeans have been wondering what work would then be left for the Organization to do. It was to stress the fact that in a convertible world the need would not be so much for a purely European Organization as for a North Atlantic one that we felt European countries would accept the change in the character of the Organization that Canadian and United States membership would imply.

4. As regards, paragraph 4, we called attention to Article 14 of the convention in order to indicate that it would still be possible for the Organization to deal with purely European questions. We do not feel that in a convertible world, or even in the period approaching convertibility, there would arise conflicts of interest between North America and Europe which would make it embarrassing to Canada and the United States to resort to the veto.

5. As regards paragraph 5, we did not contemplate the Canadian government taking any initiative with regard to North American membership. The way we see it is that Mr. Pearson is a member of the NATO Committee of Three which has been given the mandate of considering ways and means of developing greater unity within the Atlantic Community. The division of the Community into two currency blocs, the EPU area and the dollar area, is a divisive force and therefore one which the Committee must necessarily take into account. We felt that this was a subject which Mr. Pearson in his personal capacity as a Member of the Committee of Three might first wish to discuss with the United States Government and then, if they raised no objection, with his two colleagues on the Committee of Three. According to present tentative arrangements, it would then be left to Mr. Pearson to pursue the subject further with the United Kingdom Government while the two European ministers would be responsible for preliminary discussions with the other European members of NATO.

6. Besides the divisive force stemming from the existence of two currency areas, NATO is constantly being urged to do more in the economic sphere, for instance, the special NATO supplement of The Scotsman contains an article by Professor James Meade in which he suggests certain economic subjects suitable for consideration by NATO. The present situation is that NATO could not discuss these subjects because they have no economic organization to which to refer them and the European countries would oppose setting up such an economic organization because it would duplicate what is being done in OEEC. Yet, these subjects could not be discussed in OEEC from a NATO point of view for the very reason that Canada and the United States are not full members of the Organization. Thus, once again we run around the circle until we come to the place where we started. Full Canadian and United States membership in OEEC would resolve this dilemma.

7. In my telegram 578 June 7† on the United States attitude towards European integration, I indicated the dangers both for GATT and the IMF of a European preferential area coming about as a result of the proposal for a common market. Very shortly, Mr. Spaak will be speaking to the ambassadors of the United Kingdom and other OEEC countries to ask if their governments are prepared to join the six Messina countries in further elaboration of the proposals for Euratom and the Common Market. Since the United Kingdom cannot contemplate discrimination against British trade in the important European markets, it is probable that their answer will be in the affirmative, although they no doubt will plead for time to discuss the subject with their Commonwealth partners at the conference being held in London towards the end of this month.

If the United Kingdom decide to participate, the Scandinavian countries probably will do likewise. Although the objective of a common market or a genuine customs union will be kept in view, at least until the GATT waiver has been secured, it is easy to see that the difficulties in the way of attaining a genuine customs union are so formidable that later on the sole binding force holding the countries together in their approach to a common market will be protectionism arising out of the fear of North American competition. The end result, therefore, will be a European preferential area which will confront the North Atlantic community with an even more potent divisive force than the present existence of two currency areas. For Canada, it will confront us with the choice we have been desperately trying to avoid. These are additional reasons why we see the necessity for active assumption by the United States of leadership in the economic field and why we consider that the NATO Committee of Three offers a unique opportunity for a thorough and frank exploration of all current tendencies with their possible consequences on the solidarity of the North Atlantic Alliance.

RESTRICTED Ottawa, December 17, 1956

OEEC "DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION" EXERCISE

While in Paris last week I attended two of the four sessions of the "Experts" Meeting on Dollar Liberalization. Dana Wilgress (also Hyndman and Miss Burwash) urged me to take part; so did Isaiah Frank and Ethel Dietrich. The Delegation will be reporting on the meeting as usual; this is just to supply a couple of personal observations.

2. I think that the last OEEC Report on Dollar Liberalization is a useful document, giving a convenient and comprehensive survey of progress (or occasionally retrogression) in all sections of the field. The U.S. people say they have used it to very good effect in Congress, to controvert claims that tariff concessions are neutralized by Q.R.'s. Unless and until some other body, such as GATT, produces a similar document I think the OEEC study should be continued.

3. I am somewhat doubtful whether the special Meeting of "Experts" is really necessary, in addition to the ordinary meetings of the Working Party concerned, in order to produce the Report. However, in OEEC we are in no position to call the tune. If we can, without great inconvenience, put someone from Ottawa into the Experts' meeting next year I think we should give the exercise as a whole that much encouragement.

4. The Experts' Meeting ranged very widely over what was happening in all the OEEC countries and both the associated countries. It was all pretty hasty and superficial and I doubt that it will influence the rate or direction of dollar liberalization. I do think, however, that the exercise as a whole, including the Report, acts as a rather useful "extrovert" influence in an OEEC which, under the impetus of the Free Trade Area, is all too likely to be "introvert" during the next year or two. Frank made this point in his closing remarks and I supported him.

5. Apart from a statement by a youthful Norwegian, who is stationed in Paris and did not come from Oslo, there was no suggestion of "bargaining" European reductions in Q.R's against North American reductions in tariffs. On the whole I was very pleased by the fact that several delegates laid heavy emphasis on the advantages to their own countries of eliminating discrimination; and most of those that did not say so explicitly seemed to accept the proposition implicitly.

OEEC DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION REPORT

We have now received a first draft of the section on Canada for inclusion in the Dollar Import Liberalization Report. The text is given in our immediately following telegram. There will be a preliminary discussion of the report tomorrow in Committee. The proposed draft closely follows the lines of our original submission, but omits reference to our all-round efforts to reduce barriers to international trade and to promote a world system of multilateral trade and payments. We shall probably suggest some addition to the text along these lines. There will be time after tomorrow for further suggestions if you wish to make any and we should accordingly be glad to have your comments as soon as feasible.

OEEC DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION REPORT

Text of section on Canada for OEEC Dollar Liberalization Report all quantitative restrictions on imports into Canada and all exchange controls have been abolished since 1951. The only products in which external trade is subject to government control are wheat, oats, barley and butter. The overall level of customs tariffs is moderate and further tariff concessions were negotiated on a reciprocal basis during the fourth GATT negotiations in 1956. Canada is therefore providing a free and growing market for import. With regard to investment, the Canadian government taxes foreign and domestic investments in a comparable manner.

2. Canadian imports from member countries have increased from $628 million in 1953 to an annual rate of $756 million during the first nine months of 1956 but member countries' share in total imports has decreased from 14 percent to 12.7 percent as against 23 percent prewar. This situation results from a fall in the share of the UK as the share of other member countries has steadily increased from 1.8 percent in 1946 to 4.6 percent in 1956 as against 5.3 percent prewar.

3. One of the reasons why member countries' exports to Canada generally are slow in regaining their pre-war share of the Canadian market in spite of the liberal trade policy followed by the Canadian government is due to the steadily growing orientation of Canadian import demand towards the USA. The reduction of European exports during the war and immediate post-war years, the proximity of the USA, the increase in American investments in Canada and the similarity of consumer tastes between the two countries explain the increase of the USA share in total Canadian imports from 62 percent pre-war to around 73 percent in recent years.

4. The major part of Canadian imports consist of semi-manufactured and manufactured products which industrial countries of Europe are producing. Greater efforts on the part of European exporters, in order to meet American competition, are therefore necessary if the growing opportunities offered by an expanding Canadian market are to be successfully exploited. Governments of member countries should therefore bring these opportunities to the attention of their exporters and afford them all necessary assistance to take advantage of them.

OEEC DOLLAR LIBERALIZATION REPORT

1. The Canadian statement contained in your message under reference is disturbing in several respects. The first and most important of these is the fact that as it now stands it does not provide a balanced explanation of the reasons for lack of success on the part of Western Europe in obtaining a continuing portion of the expanding Canadian market. Since the document will ultimately be made public we think that this shortcoming is especially serious and should not be disregarded.

2. The explanation given in paragraph 3 respecting the characteristics of the Canadian market and the difficulties which face European traders is not completely valid. You will recall that in our telegram 1124 of November 4, 1955 in which we commented on the draft prepared for the first dollar liberalization report we suggested that either the section on Canada and the U.S. should be deleted entirely or it should be included as an annex to the main report. Our motives were to avoid having to dispute with other members the statements which we could not accept at that time regarding almost identical subjects. Therefore, we suggest that if this section relating to Canada is to be retained, there should be a thorough and complete expression of the Canadian situation with a balanced comment on all of the factors which affect prospective traders in the Canadian market. If the latter were done we consider that the report could not help but give strong emphasis to the ideas touched upon in paragraph 4 where it is noted that European members are afforded a valuable opportunity to enter a rapidly expanding market in Canada — a market which requires great quantities of manufactured and partly manufactured goods which European industries turn out. As a logical conclusion it might well be not only to our advantage to have this record set straight but to the advantage of the Europeans for it can only be helpful to them if this point is clearly made and if there is a genuine realization that a market exists here which is theirs if they will only attempt to gain access. The pre-occupation of this report and its predecessor seem to be with the proximity of Canada to the United States (which has hardly changed since 1939 and cannot be described as principally responsible for the greater share which the United States now has in Canada's import trade).

3. We are also quite concerned that the Secretariat has made alterations and deletions which you referred to in your telegram under reference. In so doing the balance of the Canadian statement has been upset and unless very good arguments can be advanced for this action we are inclined to press for re-inclusion of the deleted portions.

4. As far as the draft chapters 1 and 2 are concerned it is not yet possible for us to make any comments. It may be that when we have examined them fully we will wish to make some remarks.

5. When the Canadian statement is considered on Tuesday we hope that you will find it possible to indicate our disapproval and that you will be able to secure both the re-adoption of the deleted passages and alterations along the lines suggested above with respect to the nature of the Canadian market and of the problem facing European exporters. We leave it to your judgment to determine how extensive and how strong our reaction should be but we hope you will find it possible to bring about substantial changes.

OEEC DOLLAR LIBERALISATION REPORT

1. We had prepared substantive comments on the original drafts of the report but these are now outdated by the latest draft received, together with your telegram under reference which goes some length in adapting the report to the lines which we think appropriate. For this reason and because of the time limitations which you have outlined in paragraph 2 of your telegram, and with which we are in complete accord, we think it is not now desirable or necessary for any substantial Canadian comments to be made.

2. As far as the section regarding Canada is concerned, we are satisfied that the objections set forth in our telegram E-333 of March 4 have been met in the latest draft as a result of your intervention in the Working Party. You might indicate to the Secretary that the figure requested for the seventh line of paragraph 27 should be $766,000,000 rather than $756,000,000 as now shown. This represents the imports from member countries for the whole of 1956 rather than for the first nine months at an annual rate.

3. We are prepared to accept the present wording of paragraph 28 which, as you note, is a compromise which should be acceptable to the European countries and the United States, and is also sufficiently strong to meet our own position.

4. In paragraph 36 we are a bit disappointed that the reference to structural problems in agricultural and in particular industrial sectors is as negative as it now appears, since these problems seem to be accepted as justification for restrictive measures. However, this is a point with which we are not likely to be able to make much progress at this late stage. In the same paragraph the next sentence is also somewhat disturbing for it suggests that for some countries "liberalising dollar goods creates problems with their trade relations with their overseas territories or with third countries with which they have special connections." We do not like to see any reference here to the question of relations with overseas territories or third countries with which members may have special connections since this would seem to suggest that participants in regional trade groups might automatically obtain some favoured treatment. If there is any opportunity to secure an amendment to this sentence by deleting the words "or with third countries" we would be most grateful if you would do so.

5. Like you, we think the report is more positive and favourable this year and we welcome statements that liberalisation has been beneficial to the expansion of European production and has improved the productivity and competitiveness of European industry. We hope that in any general statement, should you decide to make one, the favourable opinion which we hold can be made known to member countries since we consider that a genuine and marked improvement has taken place. This would appear to be one time when we can state with some emphasis that we are happy to note the positive attitude which member countries are showing towards the question of liberalisation. The comments contained in your telegram under reference seem appropriate to us and since it has not been possible to give any complete and detailed study to all of the revised drafts, we think that it should be sufficient, when the working party meets this week, for you to undertake to raise the points which you have made in your telegram and to supplement these with the comments which we have made above.

I. REPORT BY THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION ON HIS RECENT TRIP ABROAD

1. The Chairman said that if the Committee agreed, he would report on his recent trip to Europe by referring briefly to each country visited.

2. In the United Kingdom the high level of economic activity was likely to give Canada more and more difficulty in recruiting immigrants. Employees seemed to be in a position to select their employers, and, in the same spirit, prospective emigrants tended to give long and serious thought to the question before deciding to migrate. There appeared to be two schools of thought in the U.K. regarding emigration; one school favoured emigration particularly to Commonwealth countries, including Canada, while the other was opposed to the loss of manpower, particularly skilled workers. Colonel Fortier said he was recommending an increase in the number of immigration offices in the U.K., and increase in their staff, and the moving of the Liverpool office to a more central location in Leeds or Manchester.

3. Good reports of Canada had created an atmosphere favourable to emigration from Belgium and Mr. Fortier's visit had been widely publicized and commented upon favourably in the Belgian press. Some overcrowding in the farming areas of Flanders favoured the movement to Canada of a good type of immigrant from that area.

4. Germany was in a boom period and did not want to lose skilled workers through emigration. Indeed, Canada was one of the few countries still recruiting freely in the German Republic, and there was a danger that restrictions might be imposed upon our work. Germany was not able, however, to absorb the large numbers of refugees from the East Zone, although she liked to see the refugee flow continuing. A good number of the refugees were farmers and Germany favoured their emigration to countries needing that class of worker. At the request of the German Government, the Canadian office was to be moved this year from Karlsruhe to the Bonn area. Canada was considering placing it in Cologne.

5. Italy had re-organized its emigration service and was developing a consistent policy on emigration. The Italians were pressing especially for movement of close relatives, and it was noted that the number of close-relative applications was quite high, 22,000 at the time of Colonel Fortier's visit.

6. The number of applicants from Greece was very high, and the flow to Canada from that country could be increased. The problem was that ICEM was pressing Canada to process their cases at the neglect of close-relative and open placement applicants, who were numerous. This Canada could hardly accept.

7. There was a high number of applications from Israel, but it was very difficult to process them for security and medical fitness. The situation there was always under study.

8. We cannot expect a large number of immigrants from the Scandinavian countries because economic conditions were good and governments objected to propaganda activities of immigration countries. This was particularly true of Sweden and Norway. The situation in Finland was more hopeful, however, and Denmark was a little freer in permitting meetings and film showings.

9. The emigration service of Portugal had been very impressive. There was a source in Portugal of engineers, draughtsmen and artisans, a good number of whom were trained in the English system of measurement.

10. Although it was doubtful that a satisfactory migration from Spain could be achieved at present, there probably were thirty to fifty thousand persons who were potential emigrants to Canada. There had been a large movement to South America, but many emigrants had returned home because the reception facilities were not satisfactory. Indeed Spain was considering joining ICEM in order to become associated with an organization that might arrange better reception facilities for her emigrants.

11. In France a surplus population in certain sections is forecast for 1960 and it may reach a total of 200,000 persons. The government is encouraging a dispersal of industry towards centres where the increasing population might be absorbed. It seemed that emigration might be a solution to the problem, especially if the North African colonies no longer provided an outlet within the French union. Colonel Fortier said he had met with an interdepartmental committee of the French Government which was concerned with immigration, and had discovered that it was divided in its views on emigration. The Ministry of Labour in particular was opposed to emigration, and had suggested that the Canadian Immigration Branch should clear the names of all prospective migrants with the French Labour Department. This, of course, was unacceptable. There had been strong French opposition, also, to the suggestion that Canadian officials might tour in North Africa to investigate the situation in view of the large number of enquiries about emigration to Canada arriving from North Africa at the Paris office. North Africans would be good immigrants with a pioneer instinct, but it was possible that the French, in order to keep North Africa French, would make every effort to prevent emigration.

12. Mr. Léger remarked that the situation in North Africa was fluid and in a matter of some months Tunisia and Morocco might be virtually independent states and might accept a Canadian application for a consulate.

13. Colonel Fortier said that another problem in France was that the Canadian office in Paris was too remote from districts of emigration. Since France was also a country of immigration, she could not permit Canadian immigration offices to be opened throughout the country. Possibly, however, consular offices could be opened at two or three places in France in which some of the medical, security and recruiting offices now in Paris could work.

14. Immigrants from the Netherlands now benefit from a subsidy provided by the Dutch Government, and could obtain additional financial help, through the Canadian assisted passages scheme. The Dutch Government dislikes the assisted passages scheme, because it leaves the emigrants with a debt to pay after arriving in Canada, and has been trying to get Canada to agree to accept an ICEM subsidy. This has been resisted because Canada has not wanted to extend the activities of ICEM. Accepting ICEM subsidies would mean that continental emigration would be subsidized, while Canada had refused the U.K. subsidy scheme. Dutch immigrants can move more cheaply to Australia, which accepts the ICEM subsidy scheme, than to Canada. It was unlikely that the pressure being exerted by the Netherlands for a subsidy would be relaxed in the coming months, because the Dutch government, which is committed to a scheme of subsidized passages, is facing an election this year. The Netherlands would also consider their bargaining position strong, because of its favourable economic position.

15. The government in Austria was concerned about the Canadian assisted passage loans scheme being available to Austrian skilled workers and their dependents, and presented the same argument heard in France, that applicants for assisted passage should be cleared through the Ministry of Labour. Colonel Fortier pointed out that such a restriction could possibly drive would-be emigrants from the Canadian Government to racketeer lenders. A satisfactory solution to the problem would probably be worked out. Canada had been obtaining a very bad press in Austria. The need for a good film on Canada and a better system of disseminating information on this country abroad was very great, both in U.K. and on the Continent.

16. Colonel Fortier expressed his thanks to the Department of External Affairs for the co-operation and help he had received from their officers abroad.

17. The Committee noted the report of the Chairman and agreed that the main problem for Canada seemed to be to sustain a fairly stable level of immigration year by year. When conditions in emigrating countries were favourable to migration and Canada was accepting large numbers of immigrants, the flow tended to increase sharply. A recession in Canada, however, created hardships for immigrants and a bad opinion of this country in nations of origin which ultimately depressed the flow. The real difficulty seemed to be that since the reputation of Canada as a country of immigration lagged behind actual conditions here, the peak periods of demand and supply for immigrants tended not to coincide. This difficulty was complicated by the fact that bad news about Canada receives greater publicity than good news. In addition the condition of the economies of emigrating countries had a substantial, but probably secondary influence on the potential flow.

II. CONTINUED PARTICIPATION IN ICEM

18. The Chairman invited the Committee to consider the question of continued participation in the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration. The question had been considered about a year ago, and the Committee had decided then that although the original purpose of ICEM had been fulfilled, the organization continued to provide some useful services to migrants. In addition, Canada's withdrawal might cause the organization to collapse, and other less desirable organizations might assume its functions. For these reasons, the Committee had recommended that Canada should remain in ICEM for a definite period, following which our position should be re-examined. The Cabinet had subsequently decided, however, that although Canada should retain membership until January 1, 1958, we should indicate to ICEM that we intended to withdraw then and that we thought the organization should come to an end. ICEM had not been informed officially of this intention, but the organization certainly was aware of it. The question now was whether any further action should be taken.

(IACI Document No. 32,† Draft Report of the Canadian Delegation to the Fourth Session of the Council of ICEM, dated March 1955, had been circulated.)

19. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that as long as we had the problem of finding enough immigrants, we would probably need the services of a good organization to help us. Was it not possible that if we withdrew from ICEM we would be in a worse position than we are now? It seemed likely that an announcement of our intention to withdraw would make us bad friends with some countries, particularly with the Netherlands who were such an important source of immigrants.

20. Colonel Fortier said that Canada had most of its difficulties in countries where ICEM was active. It was not in our interest, therefore, to let the organization grow more permanent by extending its services, if we were to withdraw in 1958. Some other countries, of course, found it difficult to understand the Canadian position, because they benefited from those increased services, which were largely paid for by the United States. The fact remained that ICEM was of little help to Canada. On the contrary, it was diverting some of our potential immigrants elsewhere, especially to Australia.

21. There were certain negative advantages to Canada in seeing the organization continue, but it would not be worthwhile unless the terms of reference were changed. The Italians had suggested that these terms of reference might be reviewed, if Canada was willing to reconsider its intention to withdraw. Colonel Fortier suggested that our best move, if we wanted the terms of reference changed, might be to announce now that we intended to withdraw at the beginning of 1957. Interested countries would certainly make strong representations for Canada to remain a member, and more acceptable terms of reference might possibly be obtained.

22. Mr. Léger commented that such a strategy might be effective, but we would have to be prepared to accept the consequences if it failed. We might be left with no organization at all, or with the prospect of a similar organization under the auspices of NATO or the United Nations.

23. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Agriculture said that his Department was interested in a steady flow of immigrants to build up the domestic market and to increase the farm labour force. He was concerned, therefore, whether ending ICEM would decrease the number of immigrants.

24. Colonel Fortier replied that it would not. Australia was now benefiting most from ICEM. The danger was that ICEM might make bad friends for Canada in countries of emigration, if this country thwarted the wishes of the organization. ICEM was, in fact, trying to make itself indispensable, and our difficulties with the Netherlands were at least in part due to this fact.

25. Mr. Pollock said the position of the Department of Finance was that there was no point in remaining in ICEM if we received no benefits from membership. The Committee had advanced certain arguments in favour of continued membership a year ago, and Cabinet had not accepted them. Unless there were further arguments to put forth, therefore, the Committee had no reason to approach Cabinet again and recommend continued membership. Indeed it appeared that Canada was going to be embarrassed by continuing pressures until our decision was made known. If this were the case, we should announce now that we intended to withdraw from ICEM as soon as possible.

26. Mr. Léger and Mr. Brown both doubted the wisdom of trying to leave ICEM even more quickly than Cabinet had suggested.

27. Mr. Pollock said that rumours of our impending withdrawal had already started a campaign in ICEM against Canada. An advantage of withdrawing very soon would be to put an end to this campaign.

28. Colonel Fortier noted that both Finance and Immigration favoured an announcement in 1956 that we intended to withdraw on January 1, 1957, but for different reasons. He hoped that by giving notice of an early withdrawal Canada could obtain more satisfactory terms of reference for ICEM. The Director of ICEM and his Deputy would be in Ottawa this spring, and it would be useful to be able to tell them confidentially then about the Canadian stand.

29. The Deputy Minister of Welfare said there was no point in going back to the Cabinet and making the same recommendation as a year ago unless new reasons could be advanced in its favour. It might be useful, however, to sound out the Ministers most concerned on the question. If they agreed that membership in ICEM would be worthwhile under better terms of reference, then Cabinet approval might be requested of the strategy recommended by the Chairman.

30. The Committee agreed that the representatives of Citizenship and Immigration and External Affairs should inform their respective Ministers of the discussion, and if the Ministers agreed, should prepare a joint memorandum to Cabinet reviewing the situation and pointing out that:

(a) the early announcement of Canada's intention to withdraw from ICEM on January 1, 1957, might result in this country obtaining through negotiation terms of reference for the organization that would make our continued membership after that date worthwhile; and

(b) that the Director of ICEM and his Deputy would be in Ottawa this spring, and it might be useful to inform them then of the position Canada was intending to take.

EXPANSION OF ACTIVITIES TO STIMULATE IMMIGRATION

1. During the calendar year 1955, 109,946 immigrants were admitted to Canada. The decrease in the number of immigrants in 1955 over previous years is attributed to the adverse publicity given abroad to employment conditions in Canada during the winter of 1954-55, the improved economic conditions resulting in a high level of employment in many European countries and more complete social security benefits available in most European countries, particularly in the United Kingdom.

2. The Department has carried out an extensive review of conditions in overseas countries to determine what changes would have to be made in immigration operational methods that would be effective in increasing the flow of immigrants to Canada. It was found that the factors governing the immigration potential in overseas countries varied with the economic development and attitude towards emigration that have taken place in these countries over the past two years. Further, a concerted effort will have to be made to recover the ground lost through the indiscriminate dissemination of unreliable and distorted information on Canada by a multiplicity of individuals and organizations that are interested in migration to serve their own needs for commercial or other reasons. This has led to considerable criticism that immigrants are being misinformed on conditions in Canada and this could be controlled and offset by taking steps to expand the Department's present counselling service abroad to ensure that prospective immigrants are given factual and informative information with respect to working and living conditions in Canada.

3. Therefore, in order to ensure that future immigrants are attracted to Canada in numbers commensurate with this country's absorptive capacity, changes in the promotional programme of the Immigration Branch should be implemented along the lines and for the reasons set out hereunder:

OPENING OF NEW OFFICES

United Kingdom

The location of the immigration office in the Liverpool area was the most logical choice when it was first established, as immigration procedure at that time required the checking of an immigrant's sailing arrangements at the port of embarkation. However, improved economic conditions in England point to the need for a step-up in promotional activities which could be assisted by moving the Liverpool office to a more central location such as Leeds to serve the north of England and opening a new office in the Bristol area to serve the southwest of England. These new offices would result in better servicing of larger areas; the tapping and development of a larger fertile field of operations; reducing travelling expenses to the individual and would tend to overcome the natural reluctance of Englishmen to travel far from their home towns.

France

Recent developments in France, official reports and talks between Departmental and French officials indicate a relaxation in the attitude of the French Government against emigration. There is reason to believe that the French Government will become more receptive to expansion of Canadian immigration activities in France. Immediate advantage should be taken of this situation and the ground work laid for increased operations by exploring the possibility of opening two additional offices in France.

Spain and Portugal

Up to the present, immigration activities in these areas have been restricted to the sending of teams to the Azores to select immigrants from the Azores and Portugal, and inquiries on immigration emanating in Spain and Portugal are handled by the External Affairs office. However, as immigration inquiries in these two countries are continually increasing, it would be both desirable and advisable to assign a full-time Immigration Officer to Madrid to handle immigration matters in Spain and Portugal.

ADVANCE PUBLICITY, FILMS AND LECTURES — UNITED KINGDOM

At the present time, agents representing the larger transportation companies in the United Kingdom co-operate up to a point with the Immigration Branch by placing advertisements in newspapers giving notice of film shows and lectures on Canada. These advertisements appear over the name of the transportation company and agent concerned which has contributed to the misunderstanding, in some quarters, that the transportation companies and not the Canadian Government are promoting emigration to Canada. The cost of advertising rental of halls and wages of projectionists are borne by the agents, the films are supplied by the Immigration Branch and the lectures are given by the immigration staff. The expenditure incurred by the agents is recouped from the sale of tickets to immigrants.

To carry out an immigration promotional to cope effectively with changing conditions in the United Kingdom, the Immigration Branch should take over full responsibility for advertising, lectures and film shows from the transportation company agents. To continue to rely on the transportation company agents would be inadvisable for the following reasons:

(i) co-operation in immigration activities is restricted to the larger transportation companies, therefore, many areas are not served with film shows and lectures;

(ii) as the agent's co-operation is on a strictly commercial basis in which they expect to realize a profit, they are reluctant to explore new areas where their profit might be reduced;

(iii) advertisements and information on Canada are commercially slanted which has led to criticism from immigrants that they were misinformed about opportunities in Canada;

(iv) agents are not interested in lectures and film shows during the holiday seasons; they are too busy with the tourist trade;

(v) agents will not operate in an area for the sole purpose of developing future immigrant potential, nor will they conduct film shows to keep Canada's name before the public during the winter season.

Assumption of full responsibility for advertising, lectures and film shows by the Immigration Branch would result in an increased coverage of the United Kingdom to reach people in areas not hitherto covered; an increase in the number of shows and lectures; improved and more authentic advertising and promotional information; better control of itineraries and territories to be covered; time and place of show or lecture would be determined by the United Kingdom staff and transportation companies in the area would be invited to attend.

AGRICULTURISTS FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

When officials of the Belgian Government visited Canada last year they indicated that there were some 25,000 young Belgian farm families who are in search of an opportunity to own their own farms. In addition, it is considered that a substantial number of farmers in the United Kingdom, Germany and Belgium could be interested in migrating for this purpose. However, to promote, develop and encourage the migration of such persons, four qualified agriculturists with training in farm settlement in Canada should be assigned overseas to serve as farm settlement officers in the United Kingdom, Germany and Belgium.

OFFICIAL VISITS BY OVERSEAS REPRESENTATIVES

The unfavourable publicity about employment and economic conditions in Canada could be offset to a considerable degree by inviting representatives of various occupations in countries of emigration to visit Canada to view first-hand the opportunities available in this country for immigrants. The publicity given to conditions in Canada by such visitors on their return to their own countries should act as a further stimulant in promoting immigration to Canada.

PROMOTIONAL PUBLICATIONS

Expansion of our immigration promotional activities abroad should be supplemented and augmented by new promotional and informational pamphlets. These pamphlets will deal with subjects that will be of benefit to immigrants in outlining specific information on selected topics, e.g., facilities available to immigrants, Canadian homes, small business, education in Canada, general booklet on Canada, etc.

THE UNDERSIGNED, THEREFORE, RECOMMENDS THAT:

(i) the Department of Citizenship and Immigration open four new offices abroad, two in the United Kingdom, two in France and assign a full time Immigration officer in Spain to deal with applications for immigration in Spain and Portugal;

(ii) the Department of Citizenship and Immigration undertake complete responsibility for advertising and publicity and conducting lectures and film shows in the United Kingdom, presently carried out under the auspices of transportation company agents;

(iii) the proposed promotional activities be supplemented by new pamphlets containing material of a promotional and informational nature designed to interest prospective immigrants in migrating to Canada;

(iv) invitations be extended to Government officials, agricultural representatives, journalists, authors, etc., to visit Canada to examine and report on opportunities available for immigrants;

(v) four qualified agriculturists be assigned abroad, three in the United Kingdom and one for Germany and Belgium, to promote and develop the migration of persons who are desirous of purchasing farms.

Respectfully submitted,
J.W. PICKERSGILL

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE FOR EUROPEAN MIGRATION (ICEM)

I am making this letter a personal one to the Head of the Mission for reasons which will be obvious as it is read.

2. You know, I am sure, a good deal about ICEM and our policy towards it. However, it might be helpful if I reviewed, in a very general way, what has happened since IRO was wound up at the end of 1951. The Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration came into being about December 1951. It assists the movement to new homes overseas of migrants and of those refugees who can meet immigration requirements. The life-span of ICEM will depend on how expeditiously it can perform the tasks allotted to it of (1) transferring some three million surplus people in Europe, and (2) helping both the sending and receiving countries by organizing suitable services (vocational training, language classes, shipping facilities) to facilitate migration on the desired scale. Briefly looking back at the period prior to the formation of ICEM, you will recall that the International Refugee Organization (IRO), which was a United Nations Specialized Agency, operated from about 1947-1951, and Canada was an active member of IRO until it was liquidated. The total number of persons settled in Canada under IRO auspices was 123,479, and our monetary contribution to it totalled more than $18 million. Although IRO was wound up in 1951 (it went into liquidation on March 1, 1952), many of the problems with which it was concerned continued to exist; some of its problems and duties became the responsibility of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; others were handled by governments through bilateral arrangements, and other co-operative procedures. It seemed in 1951 that the International Labour Organization (ILO) might extend its interest into these co-operative procedures, particularly as far as European migration was concerned. The United States, where considerable opposition both to IRO and to the ILO had developed in Congress, partly because both organizations included communist countries as members, took the initiative in promoting the formation of an organization to foster the movement of migrants from Europe, the membership of which would be confined to non-communist countries of emigration and immigration. The United States undoubtedly also hoped by this means to relieve itself of some of the embarrassment occasioned by its failure to admit immigrants from Europe in excess of its regular quota intake. Therefore at Brussels in the fall of 1951, a new organization was set up under the name of Provisional Intergovernmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe (PICMME); this was later changed to the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration (ICEM). Its primary functions were conceived as those of a transportation agency, and it took over from IRO the ships which that organization had been using. It was, in addition, accepted as an organization which would make a valuable contribution to the relief of population pressures in Europe, by providing facilities and services for countries of emigration and immigration which might need them. The United States contributed a substantial sum (of the order of $10,000,000 annually) to assist the new organization to carry on its work, and by this means ICEM has been able to subsidize the movement of migrants as well as to provide shipping at a cost below that of regular commercial lines. However, Canada, which was a founding member of ICEM, has contributed only to its administrative budget and not to its operating fund. Also, Canada has not made very much use of ICEM's services (such as vocational training, language classes, and shipping services), since we prefer to work either through our own immigration services, or through bilateral arrangements.

3. By a Cabinet decision of June 15, 1955, Canada's membership in ICEM will be continued until the end of 1957; our position will then be reviewed in ample time for us to give final notice of our intention to withdraw from ICEM at the end of 1957; Cabinet also decided that ICEM should be advised of our plan to withdraw, since we consider that ICEM could and should be wound up then.

4. On July 9-10, 1956, there were discussions in Washington between Canadian and U.S. immigration officials, mainly on some of the problems of ICEM acting as an intermediary between sending and receiving countries. Then, as a sequel to the July talks in Washington, there were further discussions in Ottawa on August 16-17. Not only did Canadian and U.S. officials attend these later meetings, but Mr. Jacobsen and Mr. Delagrave of ICEM were present too.

5. We think that the most important result of these recent discussions in Washington and Ottawa is that there is an increasing realization here that ICEM could be used to greater advantage; that some of the present difficulties may not be insuperable; and that any alternative to ICEM could be far less satisfactory. On a number of occasions the U.S. officials said they hoped Canada would remain in ICEM, and they also said that should Canada withdraw at the end of 1957 the U.S. would continue to support ICEM.

6. It seems to officials in our Department that the case for continued membership in ICEM is clear, since (a) a number of NATO emigration countries (the Netherlands, Italy, Greece) are very strong supporters of it, (b) a number of other friendly receiving countries (Australia and Latin American states) believe in the organization, (c) the U.S. will back it as long as it serves a useful purpose, and (d) more countries are joining it (Spain and South Africa recently, and Portugal in the near future). Therefore, we are inclined to think that ICEM will continue to function for some years and Canada's withdrawal from it will not bring about either its withering away or a return to a bilateral approach in immigration matters between sending and receiving countries. Furthermore, there is a possibility that if we persist in claiming the right to operate along exclusively national lines we may stir up some ill will in the sending countries. Be that as it may, the Cabinet decision of June 15, 1955, still stands that Canada's membership in ICEM will continue until the end of 1957 and that our position will be reviewed in ample time for us to give final notice of our intention to withdraw. This review should take place not later than the spring of 1957.

7. I wonder if you would, within the next three or four months, and in any case not later than February 1957, send us your assessment on a number of aspects of Canadian immigration policy which are of interest to this Department. You will realize, I am sure, that this is only a departmental assessment, and you should be somewhat guarded in discussing the matter with any immigration officials on your staff since your conclusion may possibly involve criticism of policies pursued by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and it would be unfair to associate them with an assessment devised to assist another department to reach its own conclusions even on such aspects of the problem as are not of primary concern to the Immigration Branch. However, as I said above, it seems to some members of this Department that if Canada persists in claiming the right to operate along exclusively national lines, we might stir up ill will and even hostility which, in the long run, might not be confined to immigration matters. For this reason, we should like your assessment of where we stand now as far as relations in the immigration field are concerned in the country to which you are accredited.

8. A further matter on which we should like your appraisal is how our relations generally with the country to which you are accredited would be affected if Canada withdraws from ICEM at the end of 1957? There is also the subsidiary question — would our immigration relations be adversely affected in your opinion if Canada tried to revert to a bilateral approach in immigration matters?

9. As you will see from our comments in this letter, we do not approach the problems of participation in ICEM on the same basis as the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. They have to determine whether it would be easier for them to recruit desirable immigrants if ICEM did not exist or if we were out of it, and whether ICEM can assist them in achieving their objectives. On the other hand, we must assess the possible impact on our external relations of the courses followed or proposed by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Without suggesting that the officials of that Department are not co-operative, this is a task which we must obviously undertake independently and quite discreetly.

10. We think that (a) when certain features of ICEM are not satisfactory, Canada should try to sell its ideas to other members of the organization beforehand and have the matter dealt with in the ordinary way, in the ICEM Council; (b) when certain matters are objectionable to Canada in particular, there is no harm in discussing the matter with other countries and in trying to enlist their support, but the purpose should be, at least in the first instance, to seek redress rather than arguments to justify withdrawal; (c) whether we remain in ICEM or whether we leave it, immigration negotiations in the future are unlikely to be conducted and concluded on terms dictated by Canadian requirements alone. If the sending countries, who also have a say in the matter, prefer the multilateral approach and other than Canadian methods, whether we like it or not, we will have to defer to their views. It seems to us that the tactics for coping with the situation cannot be a matter of exclusive concern to the technical department involved.

11. We realize that this request for you to make an appraisal of immigration matters will be somewhat difficult to carry out since it may be hard to get information without relying mainly and simply on the main source which would normally be the Mission's immigration official. Nevertheless, we are sure that with ingenuity, circumspection, and some finesse you will be able to send us this appraisal in good time for the survey of the situation which this Department hopes to make prior to the review mentioned in Cabinet's decision of June 15, 1955.

12. As we mentioned in paragraph 5 above, it seems to us that the most important result of the recent discussions in Washington and Ottawa is an increasing realization in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration that ICEM could be used to greater advantage. Therefore, it may happen that when the review of the situation is undertaken in the spring of 1957 the present decision to withdraw from ICEM will be reversed. However, we feel that any reversal which may take place will not relieve this Department of presenting a point of view since immigration policy and the implementation of that policy impinge on our relations with foreign countries.

IMMIGRATION FROM FRANCE

You may recall that, at the end of July, Mr. Pickersgill sought the approval of Cabinet for the opening of two new Canadian Immigration offices in France to stimulate immigration to Canada from that country. At that time, I informed you that Mr. Fortier had written to me stating that it would be necessary for the Heads of the two offices to hold the position of Vice-Consuls and asking whether the Department would have any objection. I suggested to you that the question of opening new consulates and having them headed by Immigration Officers should be closely examined.

2. I understand that, at a meeting held on August 10, when you were away, Cabinet approved Mr. Pickersgill's recommendations, including the opening of the two new Immigration offices in France, subject to the details being settled in consultation with you and that Mr. Pickersgill subsequently telephoned you when you were still away "to settle the details". It seems clear that Cabinet did not discuss the question of whether the new offices should be consulates or simply Immigration offices.

3. In his letter† to me, Mr. Fortier admitted that the French Government would probably object if new Canadian Immigration Offices, as such, were opened in France because of their reluctance to authorize immigration propaganda openly. Mr. Fortier discussed this question informally with French Officials when he was in Paris early this year. Apparently, at that time, it was suggested to him by a French official that an acceptable alternative might be to open Canadian consulates in the French Provinces which could undertake immigration work without making it too apparent that their primary interest was immigration.

4. After considering this matter carefully in the Department, we are reluctant to recommend to you that we agree to the opening of two new consulates in France for the following reasons:

(1) We should not, if possible, agree to the opening of a new mission designed for a specific purpose without assessing its priority in relation to our other commitments and plans for new offices throughout the world.

(2) Immigration has suggested that the proposed consulates should be headed by Immigration Officers. In fact they have stated that the Department of Immigration would assume the responsibility for setting up the offices and providing the necessary staff. We have pointed out to Mr. Fortier that it has been our experience that wherever a consular office is opened, even though it is intended only for one particular field of activities, the office soon finds itself dealing with consular matters of every variety. It is advisable, therefore, that a consulate should not be opened unless we are prepared to have it staffed with experienced personnel who can handle consular matters of all kinds. Although we have some consulates that are headed by experienced Foreign Service Officers from the Department of Trade and Commerce, I would be reluctant to recommend that we agree to having consulates headed by and staffed by Immigration personnel. Apart from their lack of training in consular matters, which might perhaps be overcome, it is doubtful whether Immigration Officers at this time have the necessary background and experience to head a Canadian consulate. On the other hand, it would be very difficult to provide External Officers and staff particularly at this time.

(3) Perhaps even more important, if we were to agree to this proposal, it could lead to many Canadian Consulates operating outside this Department's direct control. We do not consider this to be a desirable state of affairs as it is one of the recognized functions of a Foreign Office to establish and operate consular posts as well as diplomatic missions.

(4) Once a Canadian consulate were opened for this purpose, it might well develop that in a few years the specific need for which it was established might disappear. In the circumstances, it might be difficult to close the consulate without incurring the displeasure of the French authorities.

(5) If the French object to Immigration offices as such being opened in France, they would object ultimately to consulates operating primarily for the purpose of encouraging immigration.

5. On the other hand, Mr. Fortier has emphasized the value to Canada of obtaining immigrants from France and the desire of his Department to develop this potential field at the same time as they are increasing their promotional activities in the British Isles. Further, they do not envisage the possibility of their interest in French immigration waning within the foreseeable future to the point where they might wish the Consulates to be closed. I think we should be as forthcoming as possible in helping Mr. Fortier in this respect and I have therefore suggested to him that he might wish to discuss this question with you. If he decided to do so I would like beforehand, however, to have your views on the proposals discussed in this memorandum. Specifically, if you agree, I propose to tell the Deputy Minister of Immigration that we cannot see our way clear at this time to agreeing to the opening of the proposed two Canadian Consulates in France. We would be prepared, however, (a) to seek the permission of the French Government to the opening of two new Immigration offices there; and, failing this, (b) to seek the permission of the French authorities to an increase in the present Immigration Office in Paris. I am thinking of the possibility of suggesting mobile Immigration units which, while permanently stationed in Paris, could travel throughout France for fairly lengthy periods to get in touch with provincial groups interested in emigrating to Canada.[51]

6. If it were impossible to implement (a) and (b), we would then have to reconsider the whole matter with a view eventually to setting up some sort of consular establishments in France to meet the requirements of the Department of Immigration.

7. Alternatively, you may wish to discuss this question with Mr. Pickersgill as a follow-up to the decision at the Cabinet meeting in August which you did not attend.

Dear Mr. Fortier:

I have recently discussed, with Mr. Pearson the question of opening two new Canadian Immigration offices or consulates in France, with a view to stimulating emigration from that country to Canada. You will recall that this was the subject of your letter of July 20,† my letter of August 21,† and Mr. Smith's interim reply of September 19.†

Mr. Pearson has concluded reluctantly that we cannot, for the reasons given in my letter to you of August 21, agree to the opening of the proposed two Canadian consulates in France at this time.

I would suggest, therefore, that we seek the permission of the French Government to the opening of two new Immigration offices. Alternatively, we could seek permission for an increase in the present establishment of your Immigration office in Paris. I realize that this second alternative would not be as satisfactory as having two permanent offices set up in the French provinces. However, perhaps with an increase in staff it might be possible for you to send mobile immigration units to the more remote parts of the country for fairly lengthy periods to process groups and individuals living there who are interested in emigrating to Canada. I believe that you have used this device in the past.

Please let me know whether you would like us to set on either of these two alternative suggestions.

Yours sincerely,
JULES LÉGER

IMMIGRATION TO CANADA — 1957

1. For the first eight months of 1956 immigrant arrivals in Canada numbered 98,761, an increase of 25% over the 79,249 who came forward in the corresponding period in 1955. It is anticipated that the total for 1956 will approximate 130,000, an increase of 18.2% over the 1955 figure of 109,946. The decrease in 1955 reflects the effects of adverse reports on Canadian economic conditions during 1954, together with the buoyant economies of European countries which resulted in a lessened desire to emigrate among Europeans.

2. The increase in 1956 may be attributed to a number of specific causes:

(a) publicity about Canada's buoyant economy;

(b) broadening of the immigrant selection criteria. Unlike former years occupation was not the basic criteria in 1956 and visa officers were allowed to exercise their discretion in the selection of immigrants having regard to their suitability, desirability and adaptability;

(c) extension of the scope of the Assisted Passage Loan Scheme to include all immigrants and their dependents;

(d) institution of the Family Assistance Scheme in lieu of Family Allowances;

(e) increased promotional and recruiting activity by Immigration offices abroad.

3. Throughout the first nine months of 1956 Immigration field officers have been unable to provide sufficient immigrant labour to meet employers' demands. Generally speaking, the estimates of absorptive capacity indicate that placement of at least double the number of immigrants received could have been achieved.

4. On October 19, 1956, the Departmental Advisory Committee on Immigration met with other Federal Departments to discuss the prospects for the Canadian economy in 1957 from the viewpoint of an immigration programme for next year. The economic advisers to those Government Departments primarily concerned with the economy of the country expressed a high degree of optimism as to Canada's economic prospects for 1957 with certain minor reservations. The consensus of this meeting was that Canada could probably absorb without difficulty more immigrants than could be recruited next year.

5. As regards the supply situation, it is anticipated that recruitment of suitable immigrants will continue to be difficult owing in particular to the expected continuation of buoyant economic conditions in countries of emigration. The main attraction for immigrants will be the prospect of broader and more promising opportunities in this country.

6. In the light of economic conditions as they are expected to prevail in Canada in 1957, it is considered desirable to maintain and if possible increase the flow of desirable immigrants to this country.

THE UNDERSIGNED, THEREFORE, RECOMMENDS:

(1) THAT for 1957, the selection criteria in respect of immigrants remain the same as for 1956, viz, that immigrants be selected primarily because of their general suitability, desirability and adaptability;

(2) THAT the Department endeavour to obtain as high a rate of arrivals as possible during the early months of the year, the rate to be adjusted later in the year if necessary by administrative controls as indicated by the economy;

(3) THAT the assisted passage and Family Assistance programmes be continued on the same basis in 1957 as in 1956;

(4) THAT the Department continue and increase where possible, promotional and recruiting activity abroad.[52]

Respectfully submitted,
[J.W. PICKERSGILL]

IMMIGRATION — EXTENSION OF SPONSORED CASES

1. At its meeting of October 25, 1956, Cabinet considered and approved recommendations respecting immigration to Canada during 1957. These recommendations were based on the principle that it is desirable to maintain and, if possible, increase the flow of desirable immigrants to this country.

2. It is considered that one means of increasing immigration to Canada would be to encourage the sponsorship of immigrant workers and their dependents by employers in Canada who can establish that they have a need for workers who are not available in the Canadian labour force.

3. Under the present procedure, employers in Canada may sponsor the admission as an immigrant of a prospective employee only where the employee and his qualifications are known to the employer personally. This practice, which is restrictive in nature, was adopted some years ago following certain irregularities which developed in the form of a number of spurious applications submitted by residents of Canada who had no intention whatever of employing the prospective immigrants. In the light of the current urgent demand for labour of various types in Canada, it is considered that there is less danger of abuse in the employer sponsorship field as the actual need for labour can be more easily established in individual cases.

4. The numbers of immigrants obtained by sponsored applications fell off in most countries of emigration in 1954 and 1955 as will be seen from the table hereunder:

CITY	1953	1954	1955	1956
ATHENS	1,499	2,176	2,268	3,841
BERNE	294	222	149	134

TOTALS	54,820	46,144	38,284	53,850

5. Except for Italy and Greece, where our facilities are being taxed to the utmost, all Immigration offices in Europe could handle a far greater number of sponsored applications.

THE UNDERSIGNED, THEREFORE, RECOMMENDS:

(1) THAT effective January 1st, 1957, applications for the admission of immigrant workers and their dependents be accepted from residents of Canada willing and in a position to provide satisfactory year-round employment to the prospective immigrants, whether or not they are known to the employer personally — this to apply in the case of immigrants residing in countries of Europe where Immigration offices could handle a greater number of sponsored cases;

(2) THAT prior clearance in respect of each such application be obtained from the National Employment Service to ensure that Canadian labour is not available;

(3) THAT in each case the prospective immigrant must meet the criteria for open placement selection, i.e., he must be suitable, desirable and adaptable, as well as willing and able to do the work offered; and,

(4) THAT the Assisted Passage Loan Fund be utilized as required to effect the movement of immigrant employees and their dependents.[53]

Respectfully submitted,

IMMIGRATION AIRLIFT FROM THE UK TO CANADA

For Mr. Robertson.

The Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has asked us to acquaint you with plans for a special airlift of immigrants from the UK to Canada this year and to request your assistance in obtaining from the UK authorities uplift rights in the UK for the aircraft that would be involved.

2. An anticipated short fall of 25,000 in available sea and air space for immigrants from the UK in the first six months of the year led Immigration to negotiate with ICEM, which has indicated it could charter sufficient aircraft to assure Canada of an airlift of 305 flights with the possibility of increasing the number to 500. Half of the flights would be directed to Toronto — the remainder to Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver. 30 percent of the departures would be from Prestwick and 70 percent from London. (There is a possibility a few departures might have to be arranged from Paris.)

3. Immigration has reason to believe the proposed carriers might meet with difficulty in obtaining uplift rights from the UK government. It would be appreciated if you would approach the appropriate authorities there to acquaint them with the reasons for the airlift. It has been suggested you might wish to point out to them that, although the Empire Settlement Act has been in existence for some time, Canada has always taken full responsibility for the movement of UK immigrants to this country. It could also be indicated to the UK government that, although BOAC was asked to participate in the airlift, it apparently has not submitted any bid. A factor in possible objections from the UK government may be the UK's lack of membership in ICEM. If so, it could be pointed out that the airlift is being organized by the Canadian government, which proposes to use the facilities of ICEM in view of that organization's experience. It is understood ICEM previously has organized airlifts to Australia and to other parts of the world.

4. It is hoped the airlift would be completed between March 15 and August 31. It would be appreciated if you could approach the UK authorities as soon as possible to explain the circumstances as the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration expects to inform the House of Commons this week of the government's decision to organize the airlift.[54]

PROPOSED AIRLIFT FOR IMMIGRANTS FROM THE UK

I addressed a letter yesterday to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations requesting approval in principle of the charter flights on the assumption that detailed clearance of the various flights would be requested in the usual manner at the appropriate time. In hanging the letter to Lintott at the CRO I mentioned that BOAC had been asked to participate in the airlift but that it had apparently not submitted a bid.

2. I have just been informed that a reply is already on the way and the gist of it was communicated by phone in the following sense: the UK authorities agree in principle with the proposal for the operation of up to 500 charter flights this year from this country for the transport of immigrants. This agreement is, however, on the assumption that the BOAC and other suitable UK operators would be included in the poll of tenderers for the operation of these charter flights.

3. You might explore the possibility of reducing costs by using some of the flights returning to this country to bring Boy Scouts for the Jamboree in August.

NETHERLANDS-NOVA SCOTIA LAND SETTLEMENT BOARD AGREEMENT
RE FARM LOAN GUARANTEES FOR SETTLERS FROM THE NETHERLANDS

The Netherlands Embassy has informed us the New Brunswick Government has approached it to ask whether the Netherlands Government would be prepared to complete a farm loan agreement with New Brunswick similar to that now in effect with the Nova Scotia Government. This adds a new complication to an already complex problem with the following history:

(1) In January last year the Netherlands Embassy, without consulting us, negotiated an agreement with the Nova Scotia Land Settlement Board providing guarantees, under certain circumstances, for loans to settlers from the Netherlands who wished to purchase farmlands in Nova Scotia.

(2) After consulting Citizenship and Immigration and other interested departments, we called in the Netherlands Ambassador on May 16 to express our displeasure with the Netherlands Embassy having concluded an agreement with a Provincial Government without our knowledge or consent. The Ambassador was asked to consult us before negotiating similar agreements with other provinces.

(3) On August 16 the Department of Justice replied to a request from us for an opinion on the validity of the Netherlands-Nova Scotia Agreement and the right of the Nova Scotia Government to enter into such an agreement. The Deputy Minister of Justice advised us his Department considered that the agreement was not valid because the Nova Scotia Government "has not the capacity to conclude such an agreement".

(4) After Mr. Winters, at our request, had informally advised the then Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Hicks, of the opinion of the Department of Justice on the validity of the Netherlands-Nova Scotia Agreement, Mr. Hicks sent Mr. Winters a copy of a memorandum† prepared by the Senior Solicitor of the Nova Scotia Attorney General's Department refuting the Opinion of the Department of Justice and maintaining that Nova Scotia had the constitutional authority to enter into an agreement with the Netherlands Government.

(5) On December 18 the Netherlands Embassy replied officially to our Aide Mémoire of May 16.† A copy of the Netherlands Aide Mémoire† is attached as it is relevant to the situation that has arisen in regard to New Brunswick. You will note that the Netherlands Government had taken the view that the agreement with the Nova Scotia Government did not enter the field of international or public law but was restricted to the sphere of private law.

(6) On January 18 officials of the Netherlands Embassy and this Department attended a meeting in the office of the Director of Immigration to discuss the contents of the Netherlands Aide Mémoire of December 18. The Director of Immigration told the Embassy representatives that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration was opposed, in principle, to any extension of direct participation by the Netherlands Government in farm financing in Canada because the Canadian Immigration authorities wished to see our Federal Government assume responsibility in this field and any intervention by foreign governments reduced the arguments in favour of the type of assistance our Immigration Department has been urging on the Department of Finance since the end of the last war. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration would not have the same objections to agreements between private financial agencies in Canada and the Netherlands, even if, as was possible, the Netherlands Government provided Netherlands companies with guarantees against losses. At the conclusion of the meeting the Embassy representatives disclosed they had been approached by the New Brunswick Government which had expressed interest in concluding an agreement with the Netherlands Government similar to the Netherlands-Nova Scotia agreement.

(7) On January 22 the Netherlands Embassy agreed to withhold a substantive reply to the letter it had received from the New Brunswick Government until we had had an opportunity to consult you.

2. I think we would be within our rights if we asked the Netherlands Embassy to ignore the request from the New Brunswick Government and to withdraw from its agreement with the Nova Scotia Government. This course, however, might be resisted by the Nova Scotia Government — perhaps supported by the New Brunswick Government — and a complex court action could follow. I would prefer to recommend another course which has been suggested indirectly by the Netherlands Embassy's Aide Mémoire of December 18 and which has received the concurrence of officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. This would involve telling the Netherlands Embassy that we would have no objection to an agreement being entered into with the New Brunswick Government which could provide the same benefits for Netherlands settlers as their counterparts in Nova Scotia were receiving, providing the New Brunswick Government dealt with private financial agencies in the Netherlands — which in turn might receive guarantees from the Netherlands Government — rather than directly with the Netherlands Government through the Netherlands Embassy.

3. If it were considered desirable to attempt to remove the precedent created by the Nova Scotia agreement, this might be done in several ways:

(a) An approach might be made to the Nova Scotia Government with a suggestion that some alternative way of achieving the same result as their agreement with the Netherlands be worked out. One possibility is that the Federal Government itself might enter into an agreement with the Netherlands and then, subsequently, enter into an agreement with Nova Scotia.

(b) The Netherlands Government might be asked to suggest to the Nova Scotia Government that the agreement be renegotiated between Nova Scotia and private parties in the Netherlands.

(c) The Canadian Government might pass legislation under the "Peace, Order and Good Government Clause" of the B.N.A. Act, either prohibiting all transactions between Provincial Governments and foreign governments, or, alternatively, specifying subjects on which the provinces might make contracts with foreign governments. As an alternative to legislation, an advisory opinion could be sought from the Supreme Court on the contractual powers of the Provinces in relation to foreign governments.

4. It is not a certainty that any of these courses would succeed. All of them could lead to a reference by Nova Scotia to the Courts. In view of the opinion passed on by Premier Hicks to Mr. Winters that the Provinces have a share in the treaty-making power, Course (a) might well lead to a proposal that a reference be made. Course (b) could conceivably lead to Nova Scotia deciding to refer the case to the Courts since the intervention of the Federal Government would be quite apparent. However, this course would be more likely to succeed, particularly if the Netherlands Government "requested" revision on the lines suggested in the case of the New Brunswick request. Course (c) might also lead to a reference. Apart from the legal feasibility of this last course of possible action, it has, as you will realize, important political implications. Its premise is that the Provinces have not the capacity to contract with foreign governments at all, except perhaps in respect of matters which the Federal Government might decide. My own view would be that such a definitive settlement as is involved in Course (c) being linked as it is with the whole question of the distribution of authority between the Federal and Provincial Governments might better await the consideration of the whole question of constitutional amendment. With the possible consequences of the courses of action suggested in paragraph 3 above in mind, we asked the Department of Justice informally for its opinion of their merits. Beyond saying that he was not prepared to advise that the Canadian Parliament had power to pass legislation along the lines suggested in 3(c), Mr. Varcoe declined to comment without giving further serious study to the problem. I would suggest, therefore, that no effort be made to disturb the existing agreement between the Netherlands Government and the Nova Scotia Land Settlement Board until we have further advice from the Department of Justice. If you agree, a formal opinion on the legal capacity of Provincial Governments to make contracts with foreign governments will be sought from the Department of Justice immediately. Some time is likely to elapse before Justice's formal views are available.

5. Your views on the following suggested immediate courses of action will be appreciated:

(1) That as a first step the Netherlands Ambassador should be called in, given some knowledge of the problems that have arisen for us in connection with the Netherlands-Nova Scotia agreement and told that the only basis on which we could consider a Netherlands-New Brunswick agreement would require participation by private agencies in the Netherlands rather than the Netherlands Government. We would, of course, have no objection to the Netherlands Government providing guarantees for the private agencies. In view of Justice's current indecision, we would not wish the Netherlands Government to take any steps at this time to re-negotiate its agreement with the Nova Scotia Land Settlement Board.[56]

(2) The Ambassador should be reminded of the opposition of our Department of Citizenship and Immigration and this Department to the Netherlands Government dealing directly with Provincial Governments in Canada with a view to making agreements with them on farm loan financing.[57]

(3) The Department of Justice should be asked for a formal opinion on the legal capacity of the provinces to make contracts with foreign governments and, in particular, whether a distinction can be drawn between an agreement made by a province in its business or private capacity such as, for instance, a contract for the sale of goods or for the renting of premises, and a political agreement negotiated in its public capacity.[58]

6. Depending on the opinion received from the Department of Justice in connection with 5(3) above, you might wish to consider the desirability of informing foreign governments that contractual relations between them and the provinces when political implications are involved should not be undertaken without the prior knowledge and approval of the Federal Government and that the Federal Government would wish to be in a position to determine beforehand whether there are such implications. This might be done informally, when suitable opportunities arise or depending upon Justice's opinion, we might even consider a more formal approach to foreign missions, or, alternatively, and perhaps preferably, we might decide we would be in a position to instruct our missions abroad to advise other governments confidentially of the situation. It would remain to be determined whether we should approach all governments or only those which would be more likely to have contractual relations with the provinces.[59] In the case of governments which might conceivably take advantage of our difficulties we might be better advised not to advertise them.

7. In view of the circumstances under which the Netherlands-Nova Scotia Agreement was negotiated and the difficulties for us that have resulted, a firm line[60] with the Netherlands Ambassador to impress him with the seriousness of the situation from our

AIR TRANSPORT: BOAC SCHEDULE

The Ministry of Transport and Civil Aviation have asked for the reaction of the Air Transport Board to the following proposal of BOAC. Please refer this message also to the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

2. As you know, the immigrant fare from the UK to Montreal has been extended to June 30. BOAC propose to operate three additional flights one in each of March, April and May. In order to extend their scheduled service further in May and June, they have arranged to charter aircraft from Air France, KLM and possibly SAS. In addition to the three additional flights using their own aircraft, the Air France aircraft would be used for two flights in May and seven in June; the KLM aircraft for one flight in May and three in June, with SAS still an unknown quantity. The planes would be Constellation 749s. BOAC maintain that they are legally entitled to increase their scheduled services in this way. It was divulged that the Air France return trips are covered by charters from the USA.

3. While we would not suggest that this plan should be rejected because up-lift rights for the ABC flights in April have not yet been granted, MTCA have still not approved ABC flights after the end of this month pending further discussion of the possibility of including Air Charter Limited in the ABC programme. An ICEM representative is discussing this with Air Charter today and we will put pressure on MTCA tomorrow morning to clear pending applications for up-lift rights on ABC flights.

4. As you may know, the first two ABC flight are leaving London and Prestwick tomorrow each more than half filled with Hungarian refugees largely due to insufficient time for ticket sales. The BOAC plan suggests significant competition for ABC and they are exploring the possibility of extending it throughout the summer.

NETHERLANDS-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS ON FARM LOAN GUARANTEES FOR SETTLERS FROM THE NETHERLANDS

In accordance with your instructions we discussed this matter with Mr. Lovink who was accompanied by Mr. Pieters his expert in this field.

2. First we explained that agreement between foreign and provincial governments created difficult constitutional problems for us; we pointed out also that political implications might arise. For these reasons it was emphasized that the Departments of External Affairs and of Citizenship and Immigration remained opposed to direct contractual relationships between foreign and provincial governments. We indicated that the matter had been submitted to you and that we were speaking on your instructions.

3. While we did not wish to suggest that the Netherlands-Nova Scotia Land Settlement Board Agreement should be disturbed for the present, we indicated that we would be prepared to agree to an extension of such an arrangement only in the case of New Brunswick and this on the understanding that the Netherlands Government would not be involved directly. We recalled the suggestion that private financial agencies in the Netherlands might intervene if necessary with guarantees provided by the Netherlands Government.

4. As to the future, we made it clear that the Departments concerned were opposed to the extension of direct participation by the Netherlands Government in farm financing in the provinces and that we expected to be kept fully informed of any future negotiations with the provincial governments.

5. The Ambassador and his official accepted readily our suggestions. They made the following points:

(a) The agreement with the Nova Scotia Land Settlement Board had been concluded on the assumption that only private law was involved. All concerned had acted in good faith.

(b) Intervention by private firms as we suggest will involve additional costs.

(c) If private agencies in the Netherlands contact provincial authorities direct, the Embassy here may not be in a position to intervene.

6. It was agreed that Mr. Pieters would keep Mr. Malone directly informed of any developments in this field and that if the opportunity presented itself he would advise private agencies confidentially of the attitude of the Canadian authorities.

7. The Embassy now appreciates our position and I am confident that it will avoid further embarrassing moves.

AIR TRANSPORT BOAC SCHEDULE

Immigration today gave us the following message for you, begins:

"The Director of Immigration has today discussed this matter fully with the Air Transport Board officials. The Air Transport Board will approve BOAC's request to extend their schedules provided the aircraft are leased. The leasing arrangements would require that BOAC operate the aircraft with their own facilities and their own crews.

"It is understood also from the Air Transport Board that Air France have made application to operate chartered flights to Montreal, P.Q. The Air Transport Board have no objection to the operation of chartered flights to Montreal by Air France if they use their own facilities and crews." Ends.

AIR TRANSPORT: BOAC SCHEDULE

MTCA and CRO have expressed strong disappointment with — and urge reconsideration of — Air Transport Board's reaction to BOAC proposal. It was not BOAC intention to operate other line's aircraft with their crews and it is not, repeat not, practicable for them to do so.

2. MTCA have pointed to the sentence in Mr. Pickersgill's letter to Mr. Butler dated March 16† (which latter has referred to MTCA urging immediate action on penultimate paragraph), which says "I can assure you that we will take advantage of any transport available at reasonable rates to speed up the arrival both of Hungarian refugees and British immigrants .....". They also point out that they cooperated in the ABC arrangements by giving approval in principle overnight to 350 flights whereas it has taken ten days or so to produce what is in effect a refusal of BOAC's proposal covering about 20 flights. Having failed to obtain inclusion of any British operators in ABC flights they are pressing hard to get something for BOAC and consider that Mr. Pickersgill's letter leads them to expect a favourable response. In view of this perhaps you could also refer this message immediately to Mr. Pickersgill.

3. Indications are that we may expect high level representations on this matter here. BOAC have obtained extension of charter options until Saturday morning March 30.

4. If there is no possibility of approving BOAC plan we would appreciate full explanation of position. We may also expect further irritating difficulties over ABC arrangements. Uplift rights for April only have been approved.

AIR TRANSPORT — BOAC SCHEDULE

The following message from Mr. Fortier is being sent with an Immediate priority rather than Most Immediate as we have been assured by communications that it should reach you with the Immediate priority at 9 a.m. Friday March 29. Message begins:

Your cable of March 27 was discussed today with the Air Transport Board and on representation by Department Citizenship and Immigration the Air Transport Board agreed to the following. They agreed in principle to grant landing rights to carriers that is to say Air France, KLM and SAS who should apply directly to the Air Board in the ordinary way for these landing rights.

2. The chartering by BOAC of aircraft from Air France, KLM and SAS to be on an agency basis and for the carriage of immigrants only and the number of flights to be limited to a maximum of twenty.

3. The Air Board reached this decision in view of your quotation from Mr. Pickersgill's letter to Mr. Butler dated March 16 giving assurance that we would take advantage of any transport available at reasonable rates to speed up the arrival both of Hungarian refugees and British immigrants. If it had not been for the assurance given by Mr. Pickersgill, the Board would not have agreed to the proposal of BOAC, which it is considered could have serious repercussions in the administration of scheduled air flights for authorized commercial carriers. However, as Mr. Pickersgill had stated we would take advantage of any transport available at reasonable rates to speed up arrival of Hungarian refugees and British immigrants, the Board agreed to the compromise that BOAC on an agency basis could charter these additional flights for the transportation of immigrants.

4. It should be brought to the attention of MTCA and CRO that Canada is very disappointed that notwithstanding the fact that approval was given in principle to the 350 flights of ABC, so far they have granted uplift rights only for March and April — these decisions being made only a few days before the scheduled operation. Air Transport Board having agreed as above to BOAC proposal it is now expected that MTCA and CRO will give approval for the whole ABC scheme, which would allow us to plan our operation and obtain better results.

5. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration have also under consideration reducing the rates of ABC to Toronto, to an amount of about $10 less than the immigrant rates from Prestwick or London to Toronto. The reason for considering such a reduction is that ABC is not using pressurized aircraft; also, passengers of ABC are allowed only 44 pounds baggage while (contrary to the usual practice) the commercial lines are now allowing the immigrants 66 pounds, and finally for the reason that too much immigrant traffic is now being flown through the U.S. route which causes lots of difficulties and problems upon the arrival of the immigrants in Canada. The Canadian Air Transport Board have no objection to Immigration reducing ABC rates and you have indicated that you did not foresee any difficulties with the British authorities. When decision is reached one way or the other you will be duly informed.

6. The reason why the number of flights was limited to twenty is that this was within the limit of the request by BOAC and in addition, we have been informed that if the Air Board was granting this privilege to BOAC, TCA will also request a similar privilege. We are still optimistic that the flow of immigrants from UK justifies additional transportation, but a review of the situation and the bookings made so far by ABC would indicate that there is more transport available than applications for transportation for the time being. It is not during the spring period that additional transportation appeared to be needed, in view of the ABC flights; there will be more need for additional transportation during July and August, for immigrants.

7. If the above proposal is not agreeable to BOAC, MTCA and CRO, we would, to our regret, have to consider leaving the responsibility of discontinuing the ABC scheme to the British authorities by refusing uplift rights for May, June, July and August. Message ends.

AIR TRANSPORT — BOAC SCHEDULE

Following from Robertson for the Minister and for Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

1. As a result of mechanical trouble in our Communications Department, your message did not reach me until late this afternoon. Its gist was communicated at once to CRO and MTCA, and we expect to get their reply some time this evening.

2. I did not transmit the threat implicit in the final paragraph of your message because I hope it will be possible to find some mutually acceptable way out of the present tangle.

3. Though the subject of emigration from this country to Canada was not on the agenda for the Bermuda talks, in my judgment it is and will be for the next few months the most important and the most sensitive question that could trouble good feelings between the UK and Canada. It has to be handled pretty carefully and quietly both here and in Ottawa, because it can touch and inflame very sensitive political nerves in both countries.

4. There is no doubt that a good many responsible people in this country are puzzled and disturbed by the sharp and substantial increase in interest in emigration in recent months. It has been variously related to Suez policy, prospects of employment in the motor industry, renewed worry about this island's vulnerability in another war, etc, etc. This widespread tendency to think and talk about the possibility of emigrating is not unnaturally linked pretty closely with the prospect of Canada, which is envied its oil and admired for its foreign policy. UK Ministers are in an awkward position. They put the best face they can on the movement of people toward other Commonwealth countries and they welcome it in principle (see my telegram 597 March 28†), and continue to cooperate closely with the countries of immigration. They take comfort from what are expected to be the long-run social and economic effects of this movement, but they are undoubtedly concerned about what may be the short-run political effects at home.

5. Against this general background I am very disturbed lest a wrangle about supplementary landing rights in Canada requested by BOAC blow up into a public controversy in which the UK would be put under pressure to withhold further uplift rights for the ABC charter service. I am not familiar enough with the history and details of the original chartering arrangements made by ICEM to know whether there is much substance in the feeling of UK air lines and charter services that they were treated rather cavalierly, nor can I form an opinion of the reasonableness of the conditions imposed by our Air Transport Board in granting supplementary landing rights for BOAC. What I am sure of, however, is that we should not let what seems to boil down to a conflict between the special interests of our chosen instruments land the two governments in a public difference of views which could lead to real political trouble in both countries through its repercussions on general migration policy.

AIR TRANSPORT — BOAC SCHEDULE

The Chairman of the Air Transport Board has provided the following comment on your telegram under reference, Begins:

"With respect to the request of BOAC for authority to charter aircraft from Air France, KLM and SAS for the carriage of extra traffic including immigrants to Canada, I have had discussions with Mr. McDougall of BOAC and have informed him that the Air Transport Board is prepared to authorize 7 charter flights to be operated by Air France in June and to be integrated as extra sections of BOAC operation. It will be necessary for Air France to apply to the Board for authority for these flights in accordance with our usual procedure. Mr. McDougall has stated that this arrangement is satisfactory to BOAC and that there will be no further difficulty in the matter."

2. Since our Air Transport Board has been in touch with the BOAC representative in Montreal directly no further action by you appears necessary beyond informing MTCA of the contents of the message from the Air Transport Board quoted above and requesting final approval for entire ABC schedule.

3. With reference to paragraph 3 of your message ABC rate to Toronto is remaining unchanged.

AIR TRANSPORT, BOAC SCHEDULE, AND AIR BRIDGE TO CANADA

In a letter† summing up the discussions on the above two subjects, the Ministry of Transport and Civil Aviation have confirmed that they are proceeding with granting up-lift rights on application for ABC flights although they comment that this is being done on the basis of their understanding that the BOAC plans will be completed.

2. This letter brings to our attention that there has been a certain amount of difficulty at London Airport arising out of the irregular departure times of some of the ABC flights. There has been some improvement in this respect but in any case the point has been brought to the attention of the Air Bridge to Canada organization.

3. M.T.C.A.'s letter also asks us to bring to the attention of the appropriate Canadian authorities two further points in connection with the ABC arrangements. These points are as follows:

"The first is that we have not been at all happy about the entrusting of this movement to ICEM. It is of course entirely a Canadian affair and we have gone along with it accordingly, but we would have expected the established channel for immigrant movement, operated by TCA and BOAC, at least to be given "first option" on the task, and think that if this had been done a number of difficulties would have been avoided. We are comforted as to the future by the assurances to this effect which Mr. A.H. Wilson received on his recent visit to Canada.

"The second point arises out of the proposal to handle the BOAC participation by stepping up their scheduled services with chartered aircraft. You will recall that we have throughout regarded this as within BOAC's rights under the bilateral agreement between our two countries, and we asked that it be put to Ottawa more as a courtesy and as a precaution than with any expectation that it would encounter difficulty. We were therefore at a loss to understand the way in which the proposal was initially handled by the Air Transport Board, and I should make it clear that we adhere to the view that BOAC are entitled to operate extra-to-schedule flights, such as those now to take place in June, merely on notification".

In acknowledging the letter we have mentioned that these matters had already been discussed and that our views on the former at least had been adequately set out. If you have any comments you would like us to pass on to M.T.C.A. on either of these points, we shall be glad to do so.

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE FOR EUROPEAN MIGRATION

At this time when the question of Canada's continued membership in the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration is presumably to be reviewed, I thought it might be helpful to you if we were to submit some of the thoughts which have been developing in our minds as a result of the close experience we in this Mission have had with ICEM Headquarters in Geneva.

2. First, I would say that it cannot be an easy exercise to assess the value, both to Canada and to countries friendly to us, of our participation in ICEM's work as a member of the Committee. This of course is mainly because there are other than merely material or technical aspects involved in this question; some factors must be taken into account before coming to a decision which, because they are in the nature of imponderables cannot be as easily assessed. The relative importance and weight given to those factors is also bound to lead to different interpretation and conclusions depending on the initial approach taken.

3. We have been aware that from time to time for the past two or three years, a number of arguments have been marshalled for and against Canadian membership in ICEM. Perhaps if we were to review some of these arguments in the light of our experience in Geneva, it might be useful for you in coming to a final decision on the matter.

4. To begin with, I wish to emphasize that whatever the Canadian Government may decide with regard to its membership in ICEM, we are convinced that, with continued strong United States support, the Committee will carry on its activities. It is well-known that ICEM is, in many ways, a policy instrument used by the United States to divert pressure exercised on them to relax the restrictionist quotas of their immigration legislation. This, of course, is not a healthy phenomenon and the fact that the United States contribute so extensively to the financial support of the Organization in no way improves the situation which has slowly transformed the Organization into what one could almost call a United States agency. For these reasons, our departure from the Organization would be all the more distressing to some of our friends, and in particular to the Australians, since it would increase the imbalance already existing.

5. As I understand it, the chief reasons which prompted the Cabinet to reach its June 1955 decision to leave ICEM at the end of 1957, were (a) that ICEM was considered as no longer offering any advantages not only to Canada but generally to other member countries, (b) that it was a means whereby Australia was able to compete more easily with Canada in the migration field and (c) that, on balance, it would be preferable if ICEM were to disband completely since it had, for all practical purposes, completed the tasks assigned to it when it was set up in 1951. Indeed, the main reason for Canadian participation in the Organization in the first place was that ICEM was in a position to provide the necessary shipping to move migrants from Europe to Canadian shores. This situation held during the first years of operation and, I believe, even up to 1954. While there occurred a decrease in migrant intake during 1955, the year 1956 again saw Canada make use of ICEM transportation facilities for farm workers who had to be recruited and transported urgently to Canada. We did not, however, call on ICEM for assistance in transporting the "normal" flow of migrants during 1956, but I understand that that year was nevertheless a difficult or "tight" one during which all available transportation was being used. Finally, as far as the present year is concerned, we are all aware of the large-scale ICEM-managed operation nick-named the "ABC" airlift set up for the purpose of moving to Canada upwards of 25,000 United Kingdom immigrants. You will of course be in a better position than we to determine how essential it was to involve ICEM in this airlift. In other words, we do not know whether ICEM was a necessity or a mere convenience.

6. When looking retrospectively, therefore, it strikes one that on the whole, Canada has in fact made use, to a fairly large extent (except in 1955) of ICEM transportation facilities ever since 1951. Indeed, it now seems that, with the important movements now taking place for 1957, we have come full circle and that we are at present appealing to ICEM for increased assistance, in any case as much if not more than five or six years ago. It can of course be argued that 1957 is a special year and that the migration flow is unlikely to be as considerable in successive years. We are not certain, however, to what extent it can be predicted that "special" years no longer lie ahead of us which would require outside assistance. No doubt when the recommendation to Cabinet was drafted in 1955, it was considered that Canada would no longer need these ICEM services. However, due to unexpected developments, it has turned out that ICEM is now being asked to arrange for the movement across the Atlantic of very substantial numbers of migrants from the United Kingdom. This should obviously provide food for thought when reaching a further decision this year, for it seems to us that the art of forecasting in immigration matters is a very difficult exercise which can hardly be usefully performed for many years ahead. Planning on a yearly basis appears to be the procedure likely to offer the best results in view of the numerous factors both domestic and foreign, such as economic development, recession, unemployment, pressure of population, political circumstances, etc., which must all be taken into account.

7. In this connection, it also seems to me that we are witnessing in the migration fields new trends which must also be weighed before a final decision is taken. I refer particularly to the refuge influx and movements of which we have seen a very sharp increase since Cabinet's decision in 1955. These developments have entailed additional work which has superimposed itself on ICEM's normal operations. In this connection, you will see from the attached Table† (MC/INF/43) that, excluding the Hungarian Refugee Programme amounting to 42,085 movements, ICEM has transported, in 1956, 36,531 refugees falling under the High Commissioner's mandate. This figure is higher than in any previous year of the Committee's existence. I doubt whether any one would argue that it was improper for the Committee to take on these new assignments as they presented themselves. Refugee movements are the result of political events, and he would be very sanguine who would claim to predict that in the next few years the situation will improve. It seems to me that ICEM's performance all through the Hungarian crisis, and its availability to assist those who are now fleeing Egypt once they have reached Europe, is proof enough of the Committee's usefulness and supports the argument of those who claim that the Committee's tasks are not yet completed.

8. In other words, it would be difficult to imagine how the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees could fulfil its functions as satisfactorily as it is now doing, if ICEM were not there to assist it in this field. Those members of the UNHCR whom we have approached have a very high regard for the Committee and have emphatically told us that ICEM's disappearance would require the establishment of some other body able to cope with the movement of refugees. Mr. Lindt himself makes this point very forcefully when he states in document A/AC.39/75 of May 6, 1957, to be considered by the UNREF Executive Committee at its Fifth Session, that in order for him to deal with any large-scale refugee emergency, it is necessary for him to be supported by, inter alia, the League of Red Cross Societies and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration. Consequently, if Canada wishes to continue contributing its share in solving refugee problems, it is an argument against dissociating ourselves from ICEM. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has established very close working cooperation with ICEM and relies heavily on it for the performance of the numerous practical arrangements associated with the movement of refugees, such as selection, placement facilities, providing of data on openings for settlement in various countries, Hungarian movements out of Austria and Yugoslavia, etc. This close cooperation is particularly true since the Hungarian influx began although it is by no means a new development. I think, therefore, that it would be correct to say that if Canada were to leave ICEM, such a gesture would not be conducive to a fruitful Canadian contribution in finding solutions to refugee problems. In other words, the reliance being placed on ICEM facilities by the High Commissioner for Refugees to assist him in his refugee operations in Austria, Yugoslavia, the Far East and from the Middle East, must be considered as an important aspect of the whole picture.

9. Thus, recent trends, the permanency of which would be difficult to predict, have obviously modified the work of ICEM in recent months. The Organization which was set up to transport a flow of "normal" migration from Europe to overseas countries, is now preoccupying itself with a type of work reminiscent of IRO days. These talks have been imposed on the Committee by circumstances beyond its control and how long they might last would be very difficult to say. They are the facts of life with which we have to deal and any persistence in the argument that ICEM's mission is terminated is, in my view, mistaken.

10. Even if one does not take into account the very necessary operations performed on behalf of refugees, there nevertheless remains the long standing problems created by the population pressures which are still being felt in many European countries. In this field there appears to be no outlook for improvement in the next few years and the question is thus raised as to what alternative would exist if ICEM were to disappear from the international scene. The Committee is in my view the only organization capable of pursuing, in a consistent and effective manner, the purposes which the situation requires i.e. insuring a steady stream of migrants from the overpopulated areas of Europe to the still to be settled overseas countries. If one believes that Canada should contribute its share in insuring a more stable, economic and social order in the Western world, it is hard to see how we could wash our hands of the whole problem, leaving those of our friends in more difficult straits to fend for themselves. In this connection, the Australian representative in Geneva has repeatedly emphasized to us how badly his country needs the Committee in order to meet the aims of their immigration programme which is meant to strengthen Australia against the whole of Asia lying to the North. The only way for the Australian Government to obtain the necessary shipping to carry the migrants is through ICEM to which they are giving increasing financial and moral support. In consequence, the Australians here have told us how concerned they are at the prospect of Canada leaving the Committee. Our presence at their side in the Organization strengthens their hand in the face of the anti-immigration elements in Australia who remain opposed to the principle of accepting immigrants from certain areas of Europe. Granted that the Australian appeal to us is being made on humanitarian and altruistic grounds; this does not make it any less important. Actually, if the Cabinet decision were to stand, Canada would be leaving the Committee when more governments have come to be more interested in its work than ever before i.e. Spain, South Africa, Luxembourg. The reason behind this increase in interest may well be the realization that ICEM provides the only machinery designed to supplement national efforts in the field of migration. Another advantage is that the Committee is strictly Western in its membership, thus allowing us to cope more effectively with problems which are, after all, strictly of Western concern.

11. To end, I should like to refer briefly to the problems of a financial and organizational nature which face ICEM. As you know, the last sessions of the Executive Committee and Council failed to come to grips with these perennial problems which have been afflicting the Organization almost since its inception. (See my despatch No. 325 of May 1, 1957†). On the very item of the agenda (Future activities of the Committee and Methods of Financing) which would have allowed for a worthwhile airing of views and discussion of possible solutions, the Committee's action was, in our view, unsatisfactory in the sense that the decisions taken will not be sufficient to meet the needs and solve the Committee's difficulties by providing a sounder financial structure. The Council did little else but to refer the matter anew to the Administration (i.e. the staff), which is expected to obtain from member countries more substantial contributions in order to ensure a continued high level of movements. I think that the Committee was overly optimistic in so doing, since the Director will again have to approach Governments who appear either unable or unwilling to agree to the basic principle that movements must be self-financing and that those countries having the greatest interest in certain operational budgets must ensure, by their own means, that resources are available to feed those budgets.

12. However, the present unsatisfactory situation should not detract from the fact that the new budgetary structure may provide a definite improvement over past practices in this respect. In my view, the new arrangements whereby budgets are divided into three parts should facilitate our placing on the record any Canadian intention of contributing only to those budgets from which we derive the greatest benefits or to those operations which we might consider as meriting our assistance.

13. You may wish to send a copy of this to our Embassy in Washington.

COMMON IMPORT QUOTAS IN BENELUX CUSTOMS UNION

The Benelux countries have informed the USA of certain common quotas which they are introducing as of January this year. According to Weiss and Corse, the initial State Department reactions expressed to the representatives of Benelux were "strongly adverse". The Benelux note stated that these new arrangements would "in general" give fuller access to the markets of the three countries. The recipient of the note in the State Department queried what was meant by the apparently limiting words "in general". He also inquired how the Benelux authorities had arrived at the specific items included in the common quotas. He went on to ask the Belgian representative to what extent his country had in fact been observing such quotas before the introduction of this system. The State Department official pointed out that there appeared to be no balance of payments justification for such restrictions and most of them (for example, automobiles) were not covered by the hard-core waiver. Finally, he questioned whether the common quota system for the Benelux countries was consistent with Article XXIV of the GATT.

2. Weiss and Corse expect that the USA will be making more considered and vigorous representations in the three capitals, possibly next week. They may also raise the matter in the GATT consultations involving these countries.

3. The State Department concern over this development relates not only to the obligations of these particular countries under the GATT and to the effect which this action might have on USA access to their markets, but also to the consequences which acceptance of this device might have for the Messina Customs Union which would undoubtedly profit from the experience of Benelux.

COMMON IMPORT QUOTAS FOR BENELUX

We think it important not to let this occasion pass without making our views known to the countries concerned and it would no doubt be desirable for us to try to co-ordinate our representations with the United States.

2. We realize that the Belgians and the UK may regard these restrictions on the part of Belgium as being simply an attempt to protect The Netherlands from imports through the Belgian back door; nevertheless we cannot assume that this is all that the real effect will be and we would regard this as a very dangerous precedent in present circumstances. Moreover, quite apart from the precedent that would be created, we would find it disturbing to see restrictions introduced for reasons not relating to the balance of payments of the country imposing them. As you know, the legal position is that the Belgians are not entitled to impose restrictions on any products not listed in the Belgian waiver.

3. We would be grateful if you would follow this up with the State Department letting them know that we share their concern and try to find out what they propose to say and whether we could co-ordinate our approach.

4. Please make it clear that we think this strikes at one of our basic positions in respect of customs unions. We would not therefore think it wise to approach this problem with a presumption that Belgium should be given a waiver in the GATT to make this legal. We think our position should be that a waiver in such circumstances would be quite improper.

COMMON BENELUX IMPORT QUOTAS

We were advised informally February 19 that Netherlands Embassy Ottawa would shortly inform our authorities on this subject and that the advance info given to us here should be regarded as a friendly tip until it was possible to furnish us with an official statement.

2. It was explained that in the past each Benelux country had prepared its own import quotas by individual countries of origin and that the new quotas to be announced shortly would be "global" both with respect to the three Benelux countries and to countries of origin.

3. As Benelux countries have liberalized imports to the extent of about 95 percent, it was understood, of course, that these quotas would relate only to those few items remaining under import quota control. While not at liberty to hand us the full list our informant indicated that the new quotas would include the following: carbonic acid 240 tons; methyl chloride 40 tons; penicillin 2000 milliard oxford units; wooden packing cases 1,050,000 guilders; fishnets 48 tons; television sets and cabinets 50,000 pieces; motor cars 40,000 pieces; bicycle coaster brakes 410,000 pieces.

4. We questioned our informant as to the position of this new system under GATT rules. He assured us that this point had been carefully considered and that in the Benelux view the change would be in no way at variance with their GATT undertakings.

5. The informal manner in which this information reached us and the request that we regard it as strictly confidential until we receive the official statement leads one to suspect that the Dutch are not entirely easy in their own minds as to their GATT obligations with respect to this new system of quotas. However, it was a little difficult for us to enquire further without embarrassing our informant and we would appreciate instructions as a basis for such further enquiries if these are considered desirable in the circumstances. We will, of course, be at complete liberty to make enquiries here if you advise that The Netherlands Ambassador has presented a statement on this subject to you.

COMMON IMPORT QUOTAS FOR BENELUX

Ryss of the State Department's Trade Agreements Division gave us this morning a copy of a draft USA note concerning the common Benelux import quotas (the text of which is contained in my telegram 450 February 26†). He explained that the State Department officials concerned were inclined to have representations on this matter made in the form of such a note to Benelux embassies here, rather than through USA missions in the three Benelux capitals. It is hoped that the note will be ready for delivery in final form in the course of next week. In this regard, Ryss cautioned us about the preliminary and tentative character of the draft which has not so far been cleared with the other USA departments concerned.

2. We told Ryss we shared the USA concern over this development and would no doubt make our views known to the Benelux governments. We also questioned him on the possibility of a joint or coordinated approach. He said that it was his impression that USA officials were now disinclined to have joint representations made. On the other hand, they would keep us informed of the timing of the USA representations, and our own views and comments would certainly be welcome. In these circumstances since the USA representations seem likely to be made here, we assume that you will consider making separate representations in Ottawa or the various capitals although no doubt along somewhat similar lines and about the same time.

3. Incidentally, we gathered from Ryss that the lack of any advance notice from, or consultations by, Benelux countries before the introduction of their common import quotas has added to the annoyance of USA authorities; a fact which might have some bearing on the rather strong wording of their draft note.

BENELUX GLOBAL QUOTAS

The Commercial Counsellor had an opportunity yesterday to discuss this subject with Teppema, who has just returned from the round of conferences in Paris and a fortnight holiday.

2. Teppema explained that the new global quotas result from months of negotiation. He described the operation as a necessary part of the whole Benelux plan to achieve closer integration of the economies of the three countries. The representatives of each country started the negotiations by tabling their separate lists of remaining quota items. Then by a process described by Teppema as "horse trading" they gradually eliminated a number of products from all lists and agreed upon those which would be retained in common.

3. Every item on the new global list has a story behind it, but briefly each appears to represent the insistent demands of industry in one or other country for continued protection. For example, the motor vehicles are to satisfy Belgian interests; the penicillin and coaster brakes to satisfy Dutch. In every case Teppema insists the quantities are more than generous and should in no way result in restriction of trade or discrimination.

4. Because they believe firmly that this is true the Dutch do not appear to be concerned over the GATT judgment of these Benelux quotas. Teppema concedes that there could be some objections of an academic or technical nature but he can see no reason to object over their practical effects.

5. In reply to a question Teppema stated that it would be quite impossible to provide us with copies of the control lists in existence before the negotiations started for the preparation of the new global list. He added that this would be particularly impossible as far as Belgium is concerned as the Belgians claimed that they had completely liberated their trade and had practically no quota controls despite the fact that everyone knows that some such controls were in existence as licences to import were required and were frequently refused. However, we will secure from Teppema a complete list of the Dutch quotas in existence prior to the new global quotas and shall send this as soon as it is prepared as it might assist in checking your records and in comparing the pre-global position with what has now been introduced.

Note du Ministère des Affaires extérieures à l'Ambassade de Belgique

Note from the Department of External Affairs to the Embassy of Belgium

NOTE NO. 22 Ottawa, April 25, 1957

Le Ministère des Affaires Extérieures présente ses compliments à l'Ambassade de Belgique et a l'honneur de se référer à la Note nº 439 de l'Ambassade, en date du 20 février 1957,† concernant l'établissement de certains contingents d'importation communs aux pays du Benelux. Les autorités canadiennes croient savoir qu'en plus des contingents communs visant d'autres produits ont été instaurés dernièrement par les pays du Benelux à la suite de la négociation d'accords de commerce bilatéraux avec le Danemark et le Royaume-Uni. En outre, divers produits qui jusqu'à récemment pouvaient entrer librement en Belgique et au Luxembourg sur la base de déclarations bancaires ont été soumis aux exigences de licences d'importation.

L'Ambassade le sait, les relations commerciales entre la Belgique et le Canada sont régies par les dispositions de l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce. Le Gouvernement canadien attache de l'importance à l'intégrité des principes et des dispositions de cet accord, en vertu duquel le commerce des deux pays bénéficie de plusieurs avantages. Or l'Accord ne permet l'application de restrictions quantitatives à l'importation que dans des circonstances exceptionnelles déterminées avec soin. Le Gouvernement canadien estime qu'une Partie contractante à l'Accord général ne peut appliquer de telles restrictions qu'en cas de nécessité déterminée par sa position financière extérieure et, qu'en outre, de telles restrictions ne peuvent être appliquées d'une manière discriminatoire que dans la mesure où le justifient certaines dispositions relatives à la position de cette Partie contractante en matière de change étranger. Les autorités canadiennes ne voient pas clairement quelle justification on peut faire valoir, d'après les dispositions pertinentes de l'Accord général, pour maintenir des contingents d'importation communs. De plus, les autorités belges ont déclaré qu'elles ne maintiennent actuellement aucune restriction pour des motifs de balance de paiements. Elles sont autorisées, en vertu d'une décision du GATT du 3 décembre 1955, à maintenir des restrictions provisoires non discriminatoires à l'égard d'un certain nombre de produits agricoles. Toutefois, les contingents communs mentionnés dans la Note de l'Ambassade sont nettement discriminatoires en faveur des Pays-Bas; en outre ils s'appliquent à des produits que ne mentionne pas la décision du 3 décembre 1955.

Les autorités canadiennes ont étudié avec soin les dispositions de l'article XXIV de l'Accord général qui a trait aux unions douanières et aux zones de libre échange, ainsi que la décision du 3 décembre 1955, afin de s'assurer si ces dispositions fournissent une justification au maintien de contingents communs par les membres d'une union douanière qui n'ont pas une balance commune de paiements avec le monde extérieur. De l'avis des autorités canadiennes, toutefois, il est clair que ces dispositions ne reconnaissent pas que le fait d'être membre d'une union douanière justifie l'application commune de restrictions discriminatoires destinées essentiellement à protéger la balance des paiements de l'un des membres constitutifs de l'union.

Le Gouvernement canadien estime que les contingents d'importation communs instaurent des restrictions nouvelles en établissant une limite au delà de laquelle le développement normal du commerce ne serait pas permis et en faisant intervenir un élément de contrôle administratif. Il en serait ainsi même si l'on pouvait démontrer que les contingents effectivement établis à un moment donné étaient tels qu'ils ne feraient pas baisser les importations au-dessous des niveaux antérieurs.

Dans toutes ces circonstances, le Gouvernement canadien s'inquiète de l'établissement de contingents d'importation communs par les membres du Benelux, qui ne peut manquer de soulever des problèmes dans les relations commerciales entre le Canada et ces pays et pourrait entraîner des complications malheureuses pour la structure générale du commerce multilatéral. Le Gouvernement canadien espère donc que les Gouvernements de Belgique, du Luxembourg et des Pays-Bas trouveront moyen d'examiner de nouveau ces mesures en vue de les supprimer, conformément à la politique et aux principes qui lient le Canada et ces pays.[63]

AUSTRIAN STATE TREATY — CANADIAN ACCESSION

In making his first call on the Head of the European Division yesterday, Dr. Waldheim, the new Austrian Minister, made a formal request for the Canadian Government to give favourable consideration to acceding to the Austrian State Treaty. With apologies for discussing business on his first call, he said that he had received instructions, two days after his arrival, to make this formal request. Mr. Ford replied that we would certainly consider it and that he would notify you before Dr. Waldheim calls on you, as he hopes to do shortly.

2. Dr. Waldheim said he realized that his Government had been very slow in deciding to make an official request for Canadian accession and he understood that we might be reluctant to accede before other Western countries closer to Austria had done so. Our position was, he thought, perfectly understandable, but he wanted us to know that his Government, in an attempt to balance the accessions of Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and now of Poland, were making similar representations to two or three countries of Western Europe, to New Zealand, Australia, South Africa[64] and one or two of the South American countries, in addition to Canada as a North American country.

3. We had already heard from both Washington and Vienna that the Austrians are showing renewed interest in securing the accessions of some Western States to balance the Eastern European accessions. According to the State Department the French have agreed to support Austrian representations in the Benelux countries, the United States in Greece, and the United Kingdom in Canada.

4. So long as we had no clear political interest in acceding to the Austrian State Treaty, and since the Austrians had done little more than mention the matter informally, we had, as you know, been waiting not only for other Western countries to take the lead but for some progress to be made by the Austrians in settling the principal Canadian claims in Austria. Recently Mr. Bentley of the Woodcot Estates has been appointed one of the three public administrators of the Bruck Sugar Factory. So far, however, there has been no progress in settling the claims of Mr. Van Sickle's oil interests, although the Austrian State Secretary has promised that something will be done after next month's elections. Mr. Cox has, as you know, consistently recommended that further progress on these claims should be made before Canada acceded to the Austrian State Treaty. (A copy of Mr. Cox's latest despatch† on this subject is attached.)[65] If, however, we were to decide that for political reasons it was desirable for Canada to accede, I rather doubt that the failure of the Austrians to settle these claims should stand in the way and I would not put the case for postponing action on these grounds, particularly as the connections of both Van Sickle and the Bentley estates to Canada are, to say the least, rather tenuous.

5. When Dr. Waldheim comes to see you, I suggest, if you agree, you might reply along the following lines:

(a) Canada has no objection in principle to acceding to the Austrian State Treaty.

(b) We have not done so because until recently the Austrians showed no great interest in securing our accession, nor were there any Canadian interests to be served by acceding.

(c) It would seem to us more appropriate that the accessions of Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia should be balanced by the accessions of Western countries closer to Austria than Canada; in any case we see no particular reason for "leading the parade" but remain open to the possibility of acceding later, if some of the Western European powers decide to do so.[66]

THE AUSTRIAN STATE TREATY — CANADIAN ACCESSION

While you were away, Mr. Ronning reported that the Norwegian Government had apparently changed their minds and were no longer intending to accede to the Austrian State Treaty before settling their claims questions bilaterally with the Austrians. As you will recall, we had, on the basis of Mr. Ronning's earlier report, been discussing with the New Zealand High Commissioner's Office the possibility of Canada and New Zealand (and perhaps South Africa and Australia as well) acceding simultaneously to the Austrian State Treaty after the Norwegian accession. In accordance with your instructions, following the Austrian Minister's formal request on April 24 for Canadian accession (to balance the accessions of Poland, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia), we had also taken soundings in other Western capitals. Our enquiries have yielded the following results:

(a) Belgium—planning to accede as soon as Belgian-Austrian agreement on claims (which was reached on May 28) has been approved by both parliaments;

(b) Netherlands—does not wish to accede until their larger but related question of German assets in the Netherlands has been settled;

(c) Greece—no major obstacle to accession but does not anticipate early action until a few other countries of Western Europe have acceded;

(d) Australia—has not been asked to accede by the Austrian Government and would in any case probably wish to conclude a Money and Property Agreement first;

(e) South Africa—has not been asked to accede by the Austrian Government but might be ready to consider simultaneous accession with Canada and New Zealand.

Now that Norway has decided to negotiate on claims before acceding, it looks as if Belgium would probably be the first country of Western Europe to accede. I suggest, if you agree, that Canada should defer accession until Belgium has acceded and at least one other Western country is ready to do so. Canada might then accede either alone or at the same time as New Zealand, if they were then ready. In the meantime Mr. Cox will continue to remind the Austrian authorities of our interest in reaching a satisfactory settlement of the only major Canadian claim on which very little progress has been made, the oil interests of Mr. Van Sickle. Apart from this claim, it is the opinion of the Department, after consulting the Custodian's Office and the Department of Finance, that the claims and counter-claims which might arise between Canada and Austria are so small that they would not justify prior bilateral negotiations with the Austrians on the pattern of other countries with substantial claims problems. Do you agree?[69]

FRANCE: VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER GUY MOLLET, MARCH 2-4, 1957

444. DEA/12515-40

Note

Memorandum

SECRET [Ottawa], February 26, 1957

INTRODUCTION TO THE PRIME MINISTER'S BRIEF
VISIT OF PREMIER GUY MOLLET AND FOREIGN MINISTER PINEAU,
OTTAWA, MARCH 2-4, 1957

The tentative agenda for the Ministerial discussions with the Premier and Foreign Minister of France this weekend reflects M. Mollet's desire to devote his time with you to a general tour d'horizon on most of the major international questions affecting France and Canada. Fortunately, there are at present hardly any controversial questions directly affecting Franco-Canadian relations, and we have had no indication from French official sources that their Ministers wish to raise such questions with the Canadian Government at this time, on what is essentially a mission of friendship and goodwill.

Most of the topics so far suggested for discussion have come from the French side. They are dealt with in greater (though we hope not too great) detail in the various annexes† to this brief. It is of course understood that the agenda should in no way confine the scope of the talks. It does, however, afford a framework which we have followed in the preparation of the brief. In addition, we have added some background notes† on certain topics (such as our anti-dumping duty exemption and the sale of uranium on special terms)[70] which might well come up since they are of considerable interest to the French Government, although French officials have disclaimed any knowledge of their Ministers' intentions in this regard.

During the past few years, France has been passing through a difficult but extremely interesting period of transition. When M. Mendès-France was here as Premier in November 1954, he was hopeful that he would be given the time and authority needed to set the French economy in order, modernize industry and agriculture, and curtail the traditional and often wholly irrational French protectionism, while applying to North Africa the vigorous methods of conciliation with which he had — at a price — bought peace in Indo-

China. His positive methods and aggressive personality brought about his downfall; and since that time French Governments have tended to revert to the immobilisme which has kept so many post war coalitions in power because inaction ranged fewer forces against them than action.

This statement, however, cannot, in all fairness, be applied to the Mollet Government which, within a few days will have held power for longer than any French Government since the war. First and foremost, it has been a European and a Socialist Government, although (with its Radical Party component) it has not been able to be as socialist as it would have wished in North Africa, nor as European as it would have wished in its negotiations on the common market.

At the heart of French politics throughout M. Mollet's period in office has been Algeria. One of M. Mollet's first official actions was his visit to Algeria. As the conflict deepened, France's position, both internationally and internally, deteriorated. With right wing support M. Mollet sent 60% of French troops under NATO command to deal with the rebellion. At the same time his Government has elaborated a plan for the political and administrative reorganization of Algeria which is a good deal more liberal than the French settlers in Algeria and the right wing in France would like.

Even France's tragic Suez venture has its roots in Algeria. M. Mollet saw in Egypt a serious threat in terms of political and material assistance to the Algerian rebels. In Colonel Nasser he saw another Hitler whose removal would permit France to reassert herself as an African power — a position she lost very largely following the independence so generously granted to Tunisia and Morocco by the Mollet Government, on the foundations laid by M. Mendès-France.

But while the French public has had its attention focussed on outside developments, within France a very serious economic situation has been coming to a head. This too, to a large extent, can be attributed to the Algerian conflict. The expenditure of $5 million per day on the endless pursuit of Algerian terrorists, coupled with a serious spring crop failure in 1956 have done much to turn the French trade, balance of payments and budgetary position from highly satisfactory in 1955 to thoroughly alarming in 1957.

It had been thought that the present Government would stand or fail on its Algerian policy. It seems successfully to have weathered that storm — at least for the time being. However as attention drifts away from France's external problems which have had a unifying influence on the parties from which M. Mollet has drawn most of his support, there is likely to be serious criticism of the financial measures that M. Mollet and M. Ramadier will have to take to prevent either a state of external bankruptcy or serious internal inflation. It would seem therefore that it is on economic and financial policy that the Government will face its most severe test in the not too distant future.

It is as a "good European", however, that M. Mollet would like to be remembered. If, as is now confidently expected, the common market and Euratom treaties are signed in Rome about mid-March, the Mollet Government can claim a good deal of credit for the achievement. It must also bear the responsibility for having put more water in the wine of the original conception of a Western European customs union than history may judge wise for the ultimate success of that venture. But any French Government faced with the almost insuperable problem of getting such treaties ratified would have been compelled to do the same, and it is doubtful whether any other French Government could have carried the scheme so near to a successful launching as has the Government of M. Mollet.

Now that he is within sight of this objective, M. Mollet has already outlined an imaginative next step which may lead to a partnership among the common market countries for the more rapid development of their African territories, with the assistance of Germany's important investment resources. It remains to be seen, however, how the Africans themselves — and particularly the North Africans — will react to this idea. One Moroccan official, in private conversation with Mr. Robertson in London, has recently dubbed the scheme "collective colonialism". But it could be made into something more promising for the future relations of Western Europe and the emerging countries of "Black Africa", as well as of North Africa, which will have to find vast sums for their economic development if they are to become viable independent countries.

It is precisely because M. Mollet's heart is in the European idea that those on this side of the Atlantic must temper their praise for his accomplishments by some sober stock-taking of where "Europeanization" of the Mollet brand may take us. It cannot but have a profound effect on NATO, one way or the other. If it is genuinely conceived and developed as a movement within the framework of the Atlantic idea, it could lead to that strengthening of the Western European nucleus of NATO that we hope for. But, should it take a different course, under the impact of Middle Eastern differences and misunderstandings, it could conceivably provide the Europeans with what might seem to them a plausible alternative to NATO as the main pillar of their policy, if not of their final security in the event of a major war.

The visit of M. Mollet and of Pineau gives us an opportunity to take the measure both of these opportunities and their possible dangers. We may expect that our distinguished visitors will be most unmindful of the shadows for the future inherent in any reversion to Continentalism on either side of the Atlantic. Presumably they have not embarked on their visit to North America only to explain or excuse or justify their Middle Eastern and North African policies — to patch up the damage done by Suez. It is to be hoped that they have also the more basic aim of keeping the Atlantic idea not only alive but growing, to keep pace with the growth they have done so much to foster in the European integration.

For our part, we can see little hope for Western Europe as an independent force between the United States and the Soviet Union. There is no reason to doubt that M. Mollet remains convinced that Western Europe must of necessity continue to rely on the military power of the United States and therefore on NATO. Whatever assessment we make of Soviet intentions, and whatever degree of confidence we may place in the renunciation of major war by the Soviet leadership, it is surely axiomatic for us that Western Europe should develop and integrate as part of the Atlantic community, not only militarily but in every major field of policy. For an Atlantic basis of military security can hardly be expected to endure if every other main aspect of policy is fundamentally European. This does not mean that a Western Europe relatively more independent of the United States is undesirable. It does mean that the consequences of the drying up or withering of the Atlantic idea would probably be as damaging to M. Mollet's objectives as they would be to those of the Canadian Government. The problem is much bigger than the risk of military continentalism.

The French side have not raised the related question of European security and the future of Germany, and we have not sought to add this topic to the agenda. There may, however, be an opportunity for some exchange of views on this question, possibly in the context of the review of Soviet policy or of the work of the Disarmament Sub-Committee which is to meet in London on March 18.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour la Direction européenne

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], March 4, 1957

The conversations held at the Prime Minister's residence on Saturday afternoon, March 2, were attended by Messrs. St-Laurent, Mollet, Pineau, Pearson, Joxe and Lacoste, and myself.

2. The Prime Minister opened the discussions by outlining the general problem of Canadian security. He stated that public opinion in Canada is now ready to accept responsibilities on a continuing basis to share in the common defence of the free world. He added that this had not always been the case but he was satisfied that at least under present conditions, no change should be expected in this respect. He thought that the attitude adopted by the United States in retaining world leadership and responsibilities made it easier for Canadians generally to accept similar responsibilities but naturally on a smaller scale.

3. After having thanked the Prime Minister for the understanding shown by Canada during the debate on Algeria at the United Nations,[71] Mr. Mollet pointed out that Canada had assumed a very important role during the last few years and was exercising a strong moral leadership in the world. He was concerned, however, lest such leadership was becoming more and more difficult to exercise as a result of recent developments at the United Nations.

The United Nations

4. Mr. Pineau then took over and developed this theme with very strong feelings. He was seriously disturbed by the divergencies of view on the future role of the United Nations which were developing in the United States on the one hand and France and other Western European countries on the other. He said that his own country — and he thought he was also speaking for the United Kingdom — could not much longer continue to support or abide by the double standard type of policy which was emerging from recent debates and resolutions. In his view no country should suggest, as the United States have done of late, that there should be a United Nations policy on any given issue. The role of the United Nations was not to create policies but to reconcile as much as possible national policies. The difficulty was that if present trends were continued, they would play against democratic countries generally and favour the Communist world. There was a very serious danger under such circumstances for the United Nations to become thoroughly discredited in public opinion in certain countries. Mr. Mollet added at this point that it was only because his Government was deeply attached to international cooperation generally that it had been possible for them not to withdraw from the United Nations during the recent crisis. He added that such a move would have been very popular in France. Mr. Mollet then gave it as his view that in the United Nations "le monde libre a perdu tout moyen d'action" since it could never muster a two-thirds majority for any positive course of action, whereas it was very easy for non-friendly countries to obtain the one-third number of votes to prevent any positive action from being taken. Mr. Pineau went on to say that France could not accept the principle that the United Nations could turn itself into an international tribunal when so many of its members were committing within their own territories the very type of actions which they were asked to judge.

[71] Voir volume 22, chapitre II, première partie, section (a), subdivision (iv).

5. Mr. Pearson thought that United States policy on the Middle East as developed of late in the United Nations should not be described "a policy" but rather as "an experiment". Washington had been taken by surprise as a result of the crisis in the Middle East and they followed a line "which suited them last autumn but which might not last long". Even on such related issues as the withdrawal of Israel and the clearance of the Canal, Washington had already realized that those problems had to be discussed and, if possible, solved outside the United Nations context. He agreed with Mr. Pineau that the United Nations could be discredited in the eyes of many if it made recommendations which it was not in a position to enforce. Specifically, he referred to the problem of sanctions against Israel as falling within this category.

Middle East

6. The discussion on the withdrawal of Israeli forces was rather confused because of the lack of information as to the implication of the announcement made by Mrs. Meir that the Israelis were willing to withdraw.[72] During the discussions the following points emerged:

(i) Mr. Pineau believed that there was a strong likelihood that the Government of Ben-Gurion might fall as a result of the present crisis. This would but add to the present many complicating factors.

(ii) Mr. Pineau made the further point that he believed the Israelis would never accept the return in Gaza of Egyptian civil administration. It might be possible to have some Egyptians on the United Nations team but this should be done gradually.

(iii) Mr. Pineau very much hoped that Mr. Pearson would return to New York as soon as possible and use his great influence with the Secretary-General in the hope that some formula could be found whereby the withdrawal would be followed by steps which would be acceptable to the parties directly concerned.

7. In discussing the Suez Canal, Mr. St-Laurent underlined the fact that the Egyptian Government was in a very strong position since no decision could be reached without the cooperation of Nasser. Mr. Mollet agreed that this was the "tragic aspect of the situation". He said that Western Europe had come to realize more than ever before, as a result of the present crisis, that their whole economies could be upset by the unilateral decision of one man. As a result of this experience they had all come to realize that they must find alternative facilities which would reduce Western dependence on the waterway for the transport of oil. This would have to be done by diversifying the routes as well as the type of energy to be used in future. He added that the defence of Europe was also to a considerable extent based on the use of oil coming from the Middle East and that Nasser's decision had been as damaging to European defence as it was to European economy.

8. Mr. Pineau thought that the immediate problem was to try to devise a formula for the payment of dues under the six rules agreed to by the Security Council.

9. Throughout these discussions on the Middle East Messrs. Mollet and Pineau made it quite clear that they had no confidence in Mr. Nasser and that they feared that he would continue to be in a position to prevent the normal flow of oil whenever it suited his own purposes.

NATO

10. The Prime Minister introduced this subject by asking Messrs. Mollet and Pineau for their views on the military aspects of NATO. Mr. Pearson pointed to the rather unique position in which the Canadian military contribution to NATO should be regarded, since on the one hand Canadian troops and squadrons of the R.C.A.F. were stationed in Europe, whereas on the other we were being pressed by the Americans to accept the stationing on Canadian territory of more and more U.S.A.F. personnel and equipment "to defend the North American Continent". Canadian public opinion might not always understand such a position.

11. Mr. Pineau first dealt with the problem posed by the United Kingdom's proposed troop reductions and intention to withdraw part of their forces from the Continent. He said that the reaction had been very strong, particularly in France and Western Germany. He thought that in view of the forthcoming German elections and the difficulties Chancellor Adenauer had with the problem of German rearmament, the timing of the United Kingdom decision was very bad. As far as the substance of the matter was concerned, while not opposed in principle to reductions, he thought that they should be studied within the NATO context. This applied not only to the proposed reductions but also to the change in structure which was being contemplated and which would affect the military contributions of other NATO countries. He repeated the argument already referred to in Washington telegram no. 497 of March 1† to the effect that the concept of reducing the number of troops, even though their fire power would be either maintained or increased, was dangerous since the Kremlin might indulge in frontier incidents or greater subversive activities in the knowledge that the Americans would never permit the use of atomic weapons to prevent such developments.

12. Neither Mr. Mollet nor Mr. Pineau thought that there would be a general war in Europe in the foreseeable future. Their view was that the U.S.S.R. would never attack the United States nor take a decision which indirectly might lead to a war with the United States. In this respect the European front was probably the strongest one as between the free world and the Communists. We should foresee, however, a very important political offensive which Moscow could launch in the very near future which could place the United States and all its allies in an embarrassing position.

13. Mr. Pearson emphasized that in such circumstances it would be essential for all NATO countries further to consult on this and related issues. He was afraid that "consultation" was being replaced by "information" within the NATO context and this did not make for harmonious developments in the respective foreign policies of NATO members.

14. Mr. St-Laurent concluded this part of the discussion by saying that there does not seem to be any basic difference in appreciation between the French and Canadian positions on these issues and that further discussions should be held through regular channels.

Common Market

15. Messrs. St-Laurent and Pearson raised this issue. They referred to the position adopted by the Canadian Government as expressed in the Prime Minister's statement of November 13,[73] whereby the Government strongly supported these proposals since they would strengthen the European economy, but at the same time expressed concern lest the European arrangements led to increased restrictions and discrimination in trade with other countries. Mr. St-Laurent specifically referred to the continuation of agricultural protectionism in Europe. This would create serious problems for exports of Canadian wheat and other grains to the important and traditional European markets.

16. Mr. Pineau replied that while he understood the concern expressed by the Prime Minister, he did not share it as regards export of wheat and other grains, and wished to reassure him on this score. The main problem was that of the export of wheat from France to Germany. This, however, was more of a problem for France than for Canada since France could not compete with countries like Canada in the sale of wheat and her prices would always be above the world price. It was therefore in their interest not to produce more wheat than need be.

See Document 364, footnote 30.

17. Mr. Mollet then referred to a decision adopted by the French Cabinet before their departure for North America whereby France would purchase some wheat from Canada in the immediate future.[74]

CONFIDENTIAL Bonn, February 18, 1957

Dear Mr. Pearson,

In preparation for the impending descent of Mr. Ollenhauer, the German SPD leader, on Ottawa, I thought the following observations might not be out of place as Herr Ollenhauer's visit to the States and to Canada may be of some considerable importance for the future evolution of Socialist policy in Germany which in turn might have a quite decisive effect on the prospects of the North Atlantic alliance.

So far as Herr Ollenhauer's visit to Washington is concerned, there are perhaps two ways of looking at it. One is the short-term electoral aspect. This has its comic side. It is common gossip in Bonn that no sooner had Ollenhauer decided to go to the States when the Government sent von Echardt, head of the Federal Press Office and at present the Chancellor's closest personal adviser, scurrying over to Washington ostensibly to make arrangements for President Heuss' visit to the United States (and no doubt the Chancellor's own later visit) but also to counteract the effects of Ollenhauer's visit. Moreover, hardly had Ollenhauer set foot on American soil when he encountered one of his principal CDU rivals in the Bundestag, Herr Kiesinger, whose visit to the United States had been timed to coincide with Ollenhauer's and no doubt to offset it. This sort of thing is all rather undignified. The general impression caused by this migration of German politicians to the United States before the elections in order to gain reflected credit from their close association with Washington is a remarkably candid demonstration of the German desire to get on the bandwagon. Angry comments and counter-comments in the German party press about Ollenhauer's statements in the United States make a rather strident echo.

Looking at Ollenhauer's visit from a more long term point of view and in relation to the North Atlantic Treaty, I think it may serve a good purpose. Anyone in Washington who meets and talks to Ollenhauer will speedily be convinced that he is not a neutralist or crypto-Communist which some people in the States have considered him to be. This in turn will be a good thing because wholesale mistrust of the German Socialists in Washington would be a poor prospect for the future in which the Socialists may form part of the German Government or even control it. When I saw von Welck in the Foreign Office on Thursday, of last week, I expressed to him this view of Ollenhauer's visit to North America and he agreed with me. At the same time he added that Ollenhauer, in the course of convincing people in Washington and Ottawa of his sincere pro-Western views, might find himself more deeply involved in assurances regarding the basically Western orientation of Socialist policy. This in itself he felt would be desirable. I asked von Welck whether out of all the hazy and shifting statements which Ollenhauer has made about the policy which a German Socialist Government would pursue towards Germany's membership in NATO he could sort out any coherent picture of Socialist future over this question. He said that he understood Ollenhauer as having said that he would only consider Germany's departure from NATO "in the general framework of agreement with Germany's Western allies". In other words, he has bound himself to consult the NATO allies, but not to accept a NATO veto on Germany's departure from the alliance. Von Welck went on to say that as he understood the Socialist position, they would not in any event leave NATO until Soviet troops had been withdrawn from Eastern Germany and American troops from the Federal Republic; until substantial progress had been made over disarmament and until a satisfactory European security system guaranteed by the Soviet Union and the United States was set up. Von Welck said that these conditions were hardly likely to be fulfilled in the foreseeable future so that the risk of German departure from NATO looked fairly remote.

Ollenhauer for his part spoke to me the other day specifically of prior consultation with Germany's allies, "including Canada", before Germany left NATO. At the same time my efforts to interest him in the non-military aspects of NATO and the possibility of the alliance evolving along these lines, particularly if the military pressure becomes less, met with a pretty tepid response. Ollenhauer said that the NATO label symbolized for many people a military alliance. He emphasized the undesirability of this from the point of view of relations between the Western nations and those of Asia and the Middle East and said that in the long term the essential question of the future was this relationship. I told him that nowhere more than in Ottawa would he find a lively awareness of this whole problem and tried to set before him the policy which the Canadian Government has followed in relation to Asian and Middle East questions. I think you will find him very interested in this relationship.

In general, apart from narrow German domestic politics, I believe you may be struck by the similarity in Ollenhauer's thinking to that of, for example, Mr. Coldwell. Ollenhauer is a middle-of-the-road Socialist, not at all unlike his Anglo-Saxon opposite numbers. Personally he is an agreeable if not particularly impressive man of quick footwork in debate in the Bundestag, some humour, no fanaticism.

I fear, however, that Ollenhauer's very niceness and middle-of-the-road moderation make him very unlikely ever to obtain a real hold over the German people. I should fear that if he came to power his inexperience of wielding power and his relatively light-weight quality would lead to a certain unreliability in the conduct of German affairs rather than to any active disloyalty to the Western connection. I doubt if he has or ever would have the authority to be an effective Chancellor in a country where authority is still taken with deadly seriousness.

There is one other rather baffling side of Ollenhauer, and indeed of most German Socialists, and that is their incredible capacity for "double talk". Really the German Socialists have an unholy capacity for talking on the highest level and acting out of purest opportunism. With the old Chancellor and his Ministers one often comes across a pretty unattractive bedrock Germanism but with the Socialists you do have a feeling of quicksands under you.

Ollenhauer will be accompanied by Heine, his adviser from the SPD party headquarters (and a member of the party's Executive Committee), a clever and likeable little fellow who is very quick on the uptake. Mide Handler, the New York Times correspondent who is rather pro-Socialist in outlook was lamenting to me that they had not taken with them a few of the more picturesque, local Socialist politicians with a touch of proletarian bluntness about them and a fondness for drinking with the boys. He thought these would have made a better team to meet the press and Congressmen in Washington.

In any event, I really believe that Ollenhauer's visit to Ottawa has got positive value and that this opportunity to talk to you is very worthwhile as I think he is susceptible to influence and will find that the point of view he meets with in Ottawa is a good deal more understanding than that in Washington.

Yours ever,
C.S.A. RITCHIE

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 21, 1957

MR. OLLENHAUER'S VISIT TO CANADA

You may find it useful to have some information on Herr Erich Ollenhauer and his party's programme, in preparation for your conversation with him next Monday, February 25. Enclosed is a profile of Dr. Ollenhauer which appeared recently in the New York Times.[75]

2. As leader of the Social Democratic or Socialist Party (the second largest party in the Bundestag or German Lower House), Dr. Ollenhauer is in effect the "leader of the Opposition" in Germany. The German general elections next September may bring to power a coalition, or even a Socialist government, headed by Herr Ollenhauer. According to recent estimates, his party's popularity (approximately 40% of the voters) would now be about equal to that of Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic Party. Dr. Adenauer has, however, recently been recovering some of his lost popularity, and the formation of the future German government will also depend on the type of alliance which may develop between the two large parties and some of the smaller ones, particularly the Free Democrats (about 10% of the voters) whose position, it appears, will be determined chiefly by considerations of political opportunism.

3. The formation of a Socialist-led government in Germany may have major consequences for the future of the NATO alliance and the general political situation in Europe, in view of the foreign policy and defence programme of the Socialists. In particular, the Socialists propose that, in consultation with Germany's NATO allies, the West Germans should be prepared to trade with the USSR their membership in NATO for the reunification of Germany, and that at the same time a general European security system should replace the present Western and Eastern military pacts. In order to encourage Soviet concessions on the reunification issue, the Socialists would also apparently intend, once in power, to abolish conscription and to reduce Germany's military commitments to NATO. Obviously for electoral considerations — since reunification is likely to be the main electoral issue — several aspects of the Socialist programme are still ambiguous, particularly with respect to the methods the Socialists propose to use to achieve their foreign policy programme, and with respect to the concessions they eventually might make to the USSR, the Soviet régime in Eastern Germany and the Satellites, in order to obtain the reunification of Germany. Several aspects of their European security plan, such as the disarmament measures involved, the military guarantees and the possible neutralization of Germany, are also still obscure.

4. Although the coming to power of the Socialists in Bonn may constitute, at least in theory, a real danger for the future of the NATO alliance, there are several factors which in practice would temper the policies of a Socialist-led government in a way favourable to the West. First, there would be the pressure of the minority parties of conservative tendencies, with whom the Socialists would necessarily have to associate themselves. More important perhaps, are Germany's strong economic, political and cultural ties with the West and, above all, the intense German fear and distrust of the USSR, which could deter any Socialist government from going too far in abandoning Bonn's commitments to the West, even as part of an otherwise satisfactory reunification arrangement. In any event, the Socialists have made it quite clear that they consider the reunification question essentially as a Four-Power responsibility and that they will not themselves enter into direct negotiations with either Moscow or the East German régime, with a view to concluding a deal on this question, without the approval and participation of the West. In Washington on February 19, Mr. Ollenhauer insisted that he favoured a reunification plan on terms agreeable to Germany's Western allies. Curiously enough on the same day in Bonn, and contrary to the position consistently followed until now by the German government, the German Defence Minister suggested as a "theoretical possibility" a reunified neutral Germany on the Austrian pattern.

5. In the circumstances, although the Socialists take the electoral view that "For Germany, NATO membership and reunification are mutually exclusive", it would probably be politically unwise, as pointed out by Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Wilgress, for Germany's NATO allies to give the impression that they consider Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democrats as the sole German supporters of NATO. Such an attitude might possibly induce the Socialists to adopt a more extreme position and might make more difficult, if they came to power, their adherence to Germany's present policies towards NATO.

6. Enclosed are copies of three recent letters† from our Ambassador in Bonn analyzing in fuller detail the German Socialist party's programme on defence, foreign policy and European security. I also attach copies of a recent departmental paper† on the problem of German reunification, of the Annual Review of Events for Germany in 1956,† and of a telegram† from our Embassy in Washington reporting on Mr. Ollenhauer's visit to the United States, in case you would also be interested to glance through these papers. I should mention the latest developments on the problem of reunification which are not dealt with in these papers, namely the Bulganin Note of February 8th to the German government and the recent creation of a Four-Power Working Group on reunification. The Bulganin Note is simply a rehash of the previous Soviet position on reunification, emphasizing again that the prerequisite is direct negotiations between Bonn and the Soviet-sponsored government in Eastern Germany. As indicated in the attached Aide-Mémoire† left with me by the German Chargé d'Affaires on February 19, the German Government proposes to reply in the near future to the Soviet note. The German reply will serve chiefly, it appears, to convince German public opinion that contrary to current Socialist accusations the German Government does not forget the subject. The United States, United Kingdom, French and German Governments agreed a few days ago to form a special working group, whose first meeting will take place in Washington early in March, to examine the inter-related problems of the reunification of Germany and of European security, and the possibilities of achieving some progress in eventual negotiations with the USSR on these questions. The results of the working group's meetings are to be submitted to the NATO Council for consideration, and it is our hope that the four Western governments will also keep us informed through diplomatic channels.

OLLENHAUER VISIT

Ollenhauer Canadian tour successfully completed this afternoon according to programme outlined in our telegram under reference. Only changes were that as Minister was in New York Ollenhauer called instead on Mr. Martin who also acted as host at government luncheon. In addition, Ollenhauer met informally this morning some forty senators and members of House at annual meeting of Canadian Branch of NATO Parliamentary Association. Ollenhauer is calling on Minister tomorrow morning in New York enroute to see President Eisenhower in Washington on Thursday.

2. As in Washington he did not seem to open up much more in private than he did in public and in all his public statements it was most apparent that the German electorate were foremost in his thoughts. The following summary covers the main points which he made in public and private while in Ottawa, although it may be incomplete since we have not yet heard what was said between Ollenhauer and the Prime Minister and Acting Minister.

3. In speaking to officials of the Department yesterday afternoon, Ollenhauer expanded on what he said at his press conference yesterday morning and in his Canadian Club speech at lunch today about European security and German reunification. Security was, he said, the primary preoccupation of the USSR. It could not contemplate a united Germany allied with the West militarily. The only road to reunification therefore lay through the creation of a European security system which would fill the vacuum created by the prerequisite of a reunified Germany belonging to neither military block. Such a regional security system under the United Nations would fix the force levels of the participating countries, include a mutual security guarantee of the Kellogg type and be underwritten by both the USA and the USSR.

4. Pending such an agreement, the SPD, whether in or out of the German government, would support Germany's NATO connection and present defence obligations. Moreover, they would not attempt to negotiate with the Soviet Union without proper consultation with the Western allies and would prefer the subsequent negotiations to be conducted by the Western allies with the Soviet Union. At any rate there was no point in the two Germanies attempting negotiations since the problem could only be solved by eventual agreement between the USSR and USA.

5. It would be premature to discuss Germany's eastern frontier until after reunification.

6. A reunified Germany fitted into a European Security System could and should still participate in non-military Western organizations including Euratom and the Common Market. The USSR would no more object to this type of association than they would to Austria's right to join the European Coal and Steel Community, should they wish to do so.

7. On UN questions, Ollenhauer said at the Canadian Club that the world owed Canada a special debt of gratitude for the stand taken in the Suez crisis. He added that he was in favour of the creation of a permanent UN Emergency Force.

8. He has obviously been greatly impressed by his recent Asian tour and the necessity for Western Europe to abandon colonialism if it is to recover its pre-Suez position among the under-developed countries.

VISIT TO CANADA OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY,
SIGNOR GIOVANNI GRONCHI

I am attaching for your signature, if you approve, a memorandum for the Prime Minister recommending that the President of Italy be invited to visit Canada immediately before or after his visit to Washington, February 28, 29 and March 1. In view of the increasing burden of these visits and of the importance of extending this particular invitation, I have gone to some length to set out the reasons for your recommendation.

2. Our Ambassador in Rome has reported that two Italian newspapers have already published despatches from their Washington correspondents stating that President Gronchi will visit Canada as well as the United States. In the absence of any indication of our intentions these newspaper reports are causing our Ambassador some embarrassment. We refrained from raising this question at an earlier date because our invitation could not anticipate one from the United States, because the United States had not decided on a date for the visit there and because it did not seem desirable for a Canadian invitation to appear as an automatic echo of United States initiative. We are preparing a telegram† instructing our Ambassador in Rome to approach President Gronchi's Chief of Protocol in order to find out whether an invitation would be welcomed. This telegram will be forwarded for your consideration if you and the Prime Minister approve this proposal.[76]

Projet d'une note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre[77]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 3, 1956

VISIT TO CANADA OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY, SIGNOR GIOVANNI GRONCHI

It has been announced that the President of Italy will pay a state visit to Washington on February 28, 29 and March 1, 1956. Our Ambassador in Rome has suggested that there would be political advantages to be gained by extending an invitation to Signor Gronchi to visit Canada. He has pointed out that President Gronchi has frequently been reported as leaning to the left and the Soviet Union is said to have made discreet soundings in Rome to find out whether Signor Gronchi would accept an invitation to visit Moscow. Our Ambassador has suggested that it would be wise if, before going to Russia, the President were to visit a few NATO capitals.

2. Although I recognize the desirability of curtailing the number of official visits to Ottawa, particularly during the very busy winter season, there are a number of compelling reasons for extending an invitation to President Gronchi:

(a) A visit to Canada as well as to the United States by the President of Italy would be in line with our efforts to achieve closer political consultation among NATO countries. Moreover, the Italian Government has been insisting on a voice in Western consultations concerning such problems as negotiations with the Soviet Union, disarmament and the Middle Eastern situation. A visit to Canada by President Gronchi would probably be interpreted in Italy as recognition here of the importance of Italy in Western planning and of close international political co-ordination with a NATO ally.

The PM has agreed to the visit L.B. P[earson]

Not sent. Mr. Pearson spoke to P[rime] M[inister] [auteur inconnu/author unknown] Jan 6/56

(b) Italy is exposed to strong external and internal pressures to adopt a more neutral foreign policy. Externally, Italy has many close neighbours who follow a policy of neutrality and some of whom proclaim that their neutrality is the key to an East-West détente and international peace. Internally, the powerful Italian Communist Party is striving to persuade the electorate that a more neutral foreign policy would be advantageous. The President's visit to the United States and Canada would provide the Italian Government with further evidence of close collaboration with Italy's NATO allies which could be used to counteract these neutralist forces.

(c) General elections will be held in Italy during 1956 and the precarious political position of the present center coalition Government under Prime Minister Segni would be bolstered by evidence that its foreign policies have enhanced Italy's prestige and given her recognition as a first-rate international power. Recently the Italian Communists and their left-wing Socialist allies have been taking full advantage of the more fluid international situation to win domestic support. They have been voting with the Government on many issues in an attempt to acquire an appearance of respectability and to persuade left-of-centre Christian Democrats to rely on their support rather than that of the right-of-centre members of the coalition Government. President Gronchi's visit may be one of the very few opportunities to influence the Italian political situation without appearing to intervene in that country's internal affairs.

(d) Signor Gronchi has considerable political influence in Italy and he is known to favour an "opening to the left" in order to attract the left wing "Nenni" Socialists into a Government coalition. Undoubtedly considerable pressure will be exerted in the United States to persuade him that there would be dangerous international repercussions to any domestic policies that might alienate Italy's Western allies, particularly if this involved any weakening of Italian support for NATO. A visit to Canada following the visit to Washington might take the edge off this pressure while at the same time reinforcing the underlying argument.

(e) If President Gronchi were to visit the United States and not be invited to Canada there would be speculation concerning the reasons for our reticence. Speculation of this kind might have an undesirable affect on our relations with both Italy and the United States. On the other hand, President Gronchi would probably be welcomed in Canada with the same enthusiasm that was shown when the former Prime Minister of Italy, Signor Mario Scelba, visited Canada in March, 1955.

3. For all of these reasons I would strongly recommend that the President of Italy be invited to visit Canada either before or after his visit to the United States depending on the most convenient date. So far as I know, there are no other events which would conflict with a state visit on the proposed dates. If you agree, I will instruct our Ambassador in Rome to find out whether a visit would be feasible.

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY

Our Ambassador in Rome has emphasized the importance of giving President Gronchi a warm welcome in the hope that this might help to offset some of the unfortunate effects of the suspicion which has been expressed in the United States concerning Signor Gronchi's leftist leanings on domestic and foreign affairs. In fact, President Gronchi is staunchly anti-Communist, but some of his statements on foreign policy reflect his inexperience in this field and they have been exploited by the political forces of the extreme left. Our Ambassador suggested that we might remind President Gronchi of some of the hard facts of international life.

President Gronchi occasionally takes it upon himself to speak out on behalf of the Italian people, although he has not overstepped the constitutional limitations of his office which do not vest in the President any final authority. Our Ambassador in Rome has suggested that President Gronchi's views should not be given the same weight as those of an elected head of government. Though his visit will be brief and most of his talks with us will be formal and official, I hope President Gronchi will feel free to raise with us any subjects he wishes, for he is said to be a stimulating person.

President Gronchi has not proposed any specific subjects for discussion here and has said that he will be satisfied with a tour d'horizon. The Italian Foreign Ministry has informed the United States State Department that during his conversations with President Eisenhower, Signor Gronchi wishes to discuss Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, European integration and Italy's need for economic assistance. These subjects were covered in the background papers† which were forwarded to you during the past week, but I am attaching some notes and suggestions which may be useful for quick reference on possible topics of conversation.

I am also attaching a copy of Telegram No. 34, February 24† from our Ambassador in Rome concerning distress in Italy caused by the severe weather. You will notice that our Ambassador did not recommend any specific action and says that although there is hardship, the situation cannot be considered a major catastrophe.

VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF ITALY, MARCH 3-5
POSSIBLE SUBJECTS FOR DISCUSSION

The following brief notes and suggestions supplementing the background papers for this visit may be useful for purposes of immediate reference during the conversations with President Gronchi and the Italian Foreign Minister, Signor Martino:

Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty

The Italian attitude toward the "implementation" of Article 2 was outlined by Signor Martino at the North Atlantic Council Ministerial Meeting in December, 1955. He suggested a bold reconsideration of NATO cooperation on economic, social and cultural matters and the development of a common political and economic strategy to combat Soviet penetration in Asia, the Middle East and Africa. Signor Martino said in part:

".... Je crois qu'il est indispensable de pouvoir répondre au dogme communiste de l'inéluctabilité de l'effondrement du régime économique du monde prétendu capitaliste par la preuve concrète inverse du développement de nos économies à travers la coopération réciproque."

"Afin que ce développement se produise, il faut agir en deux directions:

(1) Compte tenu que le continent européen représente le point faible à cet égard, il faut que les pays les plus intéressés travaillent pour arriver le plus tôt possible à un accord sur un marché commun européen, en tant qu'étape dans le chemin de l'unification politique de l'Europe, et je me réfère ici à ce que j'ai dit sur la nécessité, du point de vue politique, de reprendre le mouvement d'unification européen.

(2) Il faut entreprendre, par tous les moyens à notre disposition, une action collective pour le développement des zones économiquement faibles qui se trouvent au sein de l'Alliance...."

Signor Martino also advocated the coordination of technical, financial and manpower resources of NATO countries in order to assist underdeveloped and uncommitted countries in other parts of the world.

At the same meeting, the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada expressed satisfaction with the progress in political consultation that had been achieved in NATO, and he suggested still closer consultation. He urged that this should be augmented by consultation "when appropriate" on the international economic situation "in order to develop a better understanding of each others policies and to avoid conflict between these policies in the interests of the broader international community." Commenting on the specific suggestions of the Italian Foreign Minister, he said in part:

"... We do fully appreciate ... the cogent arguments for promoting political stability and unity in Europe, and we welcome any genuine move to this end. On the other hand, it is also our view that this desirable end would not be attained. I'm sure no-one has this in mind, or the interests of the European countries themselves, be advanced, through the development of any discriminatory trading group. This is a danger which we are, I am sure, all fully aware of and it can be avoided. With regard to the second view relating to collective action for the development of certain economically weak regions within the Alliance, it's difficult at this moment to comment on our Italian colleagues' proposal before we have had a chance to study it, but it is something which should be studied...."

On the question of assistance to underdeveloped countries, Canada has favoured a somewhat slower but broader approach than that advocated by Italy. This policy is similar to the recommendation which the United Kingdom made to the North Atlantic Council proposing a thorough examination of the current activities of NATO countries as a prelude to action in this field.[78]

European Integration

The following is a very tentative and unconfirmed summary of the views expressed on this subject during a recent interdepartmental meeting at the official level:

(a) EURATOM—It was agreed that effective cooperation among European countries in the development of atomic energy could only be beneficial. However, support for EURATOM should depend on its readiness to cooperate in strengthening the economic base of Western Europe and contributing to the unity and well-being of the whole.

(b) The European Common Market—This project would be more difficult of attainment than EURATOM. A limited reduction of tariffs and restrictions between the six countries concerned — Italy, France, West Germany, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg — might only distract attention from the need for a major forward movement, while the possibility of a fairly effective insulated trading bloc being created might tend to reverse the trend toward a freer world-wide multilateral trading system. On the other hand, the common market has a very considerable significance in the political field as a rallying point for Western Europeans. Moreover, the project might be the last chance of binding Germany firmly to the West and of giving Europe a fresh start toward economic health and balance. It was the general consensus of the meeting that Canada should not oppose European integration along the lines outlined at the last conference of the six powers concerned at Messina, Italy.

The Italian Government places very few reservations on its support for initiatives toward European integration, because Italy stands to gain a great deal and has very little to lose in any pooling of resources, production, manpower, living standards, etc. However it would be interesting to find out how Italy envisages the reconciliation of European integration with the future of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation and the objectives of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Immigration

President Gronchi or Signor Martino may urge increased immigration to Canada as a means of assisting in the application of Italy's ten-year plan (Vanoni Plan) for economic reconstruction. Sincere appreciation of Italy's efforts to obtain economic stability might be expressed, but the Canadian immigration authorities are not willing to commit the Government to accept a substantially larger number of Italian immigrants. The difficulties encountered by immigrants from Italy, and particularly those from the south of Italy, in adapting themselves to the rigorous climate, large-scale mechanized agriculture and other conditions might be described to the visitors. Changes in the immigration regulations whereby Canadian visa officials have been given more discretion and in the Assisted Passage Loan

[78] Voir aussi volume 21, le document 239.
See also Volume 21, Document 239.

Scheme which now enables families to travel as a unit or be reunited quickly in Canada, may be some satisfaction to the Italian Government.

Economic and Commercial Relations

(a) Trade—If the problem of Italy's adverse balance of trade with Canada should be raised the Italian visitors could be informed that we would like to see it improve its position in the Canadian market. However, there is little that the Canadian Government can do and much depends on the ability of Italian firms to promote their products vigorously and sell them at competitive prices. Appreciation might be expressed for the Italian allocation of foreign exchange for purchases from Canada of salt codfish and canned salmon. They could be informed that the stability which Italy has been able to maintain in its balance of payments is encouraging and that we hope Italy will soon be able to make further dollar liberalization moves which we are confident would be of benefit to Italy as well as Canada.

(b) Other questions—If possible, it is desirable to avoid discussing the unsuccessful civil aviation negotiations with Italy and the problem of German assets in Italy. On the latter question, it appears likely that a compromise formula proposed by the United Kingdom will be accepted, but the Italian Government has not yet been informed of this proposal.

Cultural Relations

The Italian Government attaches considerable importance to cultural relations, and in view of the fact that the Cultural Agreement between Canada and Italy which was concluded in 1954 has not come into force yet, questions may be asked about our delay in fulfilling a treaty obligation. The visitors might be informed that operation of the cultural agreement will be one of the functions of the proposed Canadian Council and that although the Government has announced that it intends to recommend to Parliament the establishment of the Canadian Council, certain difficulties have been encountered, and it has not been possible to present the necessary legislation yet.

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY — MARCH 3-5

I am attaching two memoranda outlining the conversations on March 5 between President Gronchi and the Prime Minister and between Signor Martino and Mr. Pearson. Appended to the latter memorandum are some general conclusions concerning the conversations and their significance. You will notice that when he addressed Parliament President Gronchi omitted a paragraph which appeared in the text of his speech that was distributed to the press before delivery. The deleted paragraph was included in the original text immediately before the paragraph of the attached Hansard translation of President Gronchi's speech which commences: "But it is evidently in the general interest of Western solidarity

The visit of the President of Italy who, as you know, was accompanied by Mrs. Gronchi and by the Italian Foreign Minister, Signor Gaetano Martino and Mrs. Martino was successful from every point of view. The Presidential party arrived on March 3 and was welcomed with full ceremonial honours by His Excellency the Governor General, the Prime Minister and Mrs. St. Laurent, members of the Cabinet and of the Diplomatic Corps. Following a luncheon at Government House, President Gronchi laid a wreath at the National War Memorial. The President and members of his party attended an afternoon reception given by the Speakers of the Senate and of the House of Commons and an evening reception at Government House.

On March 4, the visitors attended mass at St. Anthony's Church where they met members of the local Italian community. Following a luncheon at the Italian Embassy the President received delegations from the Italian communities of Montreal and Toronto. He was host at dinner to the Governor General and held a reception at the Country Club in the evening.

On March 5, President Gronchi and Signor Martino held conversations with the Prime Minister and the Minister. Following the luncheon given by the Prime Minister and Mrs. St. Laurent, President Gronchi addressed the Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons. The Presidential party then left Ottawa by train for Detroit.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 6, 1956

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY
SUMMARY OF PRESIDENT GRONCHI'S CONVERSATIONS WITH THE PRIME MINISTER, MARCH 5, 1956

The talk between President Gronchi and the Prime Minister took place in Mr. St. Laurent's office in the House of Commons at 11:30 Monday, March 5. Also present were Dr. Martino and Mr. Pearson, Signor Fenoaltea, Signor Luciolli, Mr. Léger and Mr. Ignatieff.

2. The talk which was informal touched upon the following subjects:

NATO,
European Integration,
World Trouble spots.

NATO

3. Signor Gronchi, referring to the speech which he was going to make to the Members of the Senate and Members of the House of Commons later in the day, said that he intended laying emphasis on the need for NATO to be better able to meet the challenge of current Soviet tactics, through better consultation and increased solidarity between the members of the organization. In particular, he would like to say that the Big Three should consult other members of the organization concerned before negotiating with the Soviet Union on matters which were of direct concern to them. He also believed that the NATO Council should hold more frequent consultations both on political and economic matters. The Prime Minister in reply said that generally speaking such views were in accord with the attitude which the Government had taken on the question of consultation between members of NATO and on Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

4. Signor Gronchi said that Italy intended to play its full role also in the NATO defence effort. He pointed out that Italy planned to maintain the same rate of military expenditure next year as they had this year. He was seriously concerned, however, that this rate of expenditure would prove insufficient to equip Italian troops with the expensive weapons required for modern war. He thought that the point may have been reached when it was unreal for NATO to insist on a contribution of 15 divisions to be fielded by Italy if they were so ill-equipped that they were unable to make an appropriate contribution under modern warfare conditions. He thought that the whole situation should be reviewed by NATO. In his opinion, it seemed that only very wealthy countries like the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. could afford the weapons of modern war. Even the U.S.S.R. might be anxious to reduce the economic burden of armaments. The Prime Minister recalled that the Soviet Government had means of compulsion open to it to maintain its military effort which is not open to democratic countries.

5. Mr. Pearson recalled that just a few days ago NATO concluded a series of multilateral discussions on defence planning which had considered the kind of problems which Signor Gronchi had alluded to. What puzzled him, however, was that it was found possible to devote so much time to a thoroughgoing examination of military problems and yet when Ministers assemble for purposes of political consultation only one or two meetings seemed to be spared for this purpose. Mr. Pearson said that in the present phase of international affairs, non-military types of defence must be considered as important, or even in some respects, more important than the military. He hoped, therefore, that the next NATO Ministerial meeting would be devoted wholly, or at least mostly, to the non-military activities of NATO. Mr. Pearson said that Dr. Martino and he had talked about this earlier in the morning and had emphasized this point when speaking to the press.

European Integration

6. Dr. Martino, explaining the Italian attitude to the question of European integration, said that Italy particularly attached importance to the plan to establish a common market between the six members of the Coal and Steel Community. This was regarded, however, not as an end in itself, but as a means to attaining the objective of political integration in Europe. Present suspicions and antipathies, particularly between France and Germany, could not be overcome in the political sphere he thought; it was therefore hoped that by establishing a common market with a common monetary system, the way would be open automatically to the attainment of political integration between the six countries. Mr. Pearson, in explaining the Canadian approach to the problem of European integration, noted that sometimes the United Kingdom attributed its reluctance to support this movement on the grounds that the aims of European integration were not acceptable to the Commonwealth. As far as Canada was concerned, both public opinion and the Canadian Government were strongly in support of political integration in Europe especially as a means of finding a solution for traditional Franco-German conflicts. Possible developments on the economic side, however, cause some misgivings in Canada because it was thought that the common market may provide justification for raising tariff protection by the governments participating in this movement against trade with the rest of the outside world. The Canadian Government, therefore, would hesitate to approve any policy which would tend to set Europe against the rest of the world in the matter of trade through the creation of an autarchic system. Dr. Martino said that the Italians were not aiming at an autarchy or continental economic bloc.

Trouble Spots

7. Mr. Pearson said that the two most dangerous trouble spots in the world were in the Middle East where Arab and Israeli forces were deployed against one another, and in the off-shore islands off the coast of China, where opposing Chinese forces were deployed. In the Middle East Canada is making a contribution through General Burns who is trying to keep the two opposing forces from fighting one another; in the Far East Canada is making its contribution in trying to maintain the armistice in Indochina, where 170 Canadians were on duty.

8. At the conclusion of the talk, Signor Gronchi asked whether the Prime Minister might wish to have a formal press communiqué issued. The Prime Minister thought this was unnecessary. In answer to questions, it could be said that the two of them had discussed international problems of common interest, had exchanged impressions and had found agreement on the objectives being pursued by the two governments, and the desirability of coordination of methods to reach these objectives.

Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 6, 1956

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF ITALY
SUMMARY OF THE CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN SIGNOR MARTINO, FOREIGN MINISTER OF ITALY AND MR. PEARSON, MARCH 5, 1956 TOGETHER WITH SOME GENERAL CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE CONVERSATIONS

Middle East

Mr. Pearson expressed grave concern over the situation developing in the Middle East. He thought that it was one of the most explosive situations in the world today. Mr. Martino shared this concern.

Mr. Pearson suggested that Italy might help bring the parties closer together. Mr. Martino said that they had tried, particularly during discussions he had with Mr. Sharrett a few weeks ago, but had found him in an uncompromising mood, particularly as regards territorial concessions. Mr. Pearson said that the only possible solution was for the Arabs and Israelis to come to an agreement based on the recognition of the State of Israel by the Arabs and by the acceptance by Israel that certain boundary adjustments were necessary as well as some settlement of the refugee problem. It was difficult to say when that would happen since the extremists in either country were totally unwilling to compromise.

China

Mr. Martino referred to statements made by Mr. Pearson lately on this subject and asked him if he would care to amplify.[80] Mr. Pearson said that the situation was serious because of the United States' support of the Chinese Nationalist position on the off-shore islands. In the event of an attack on the islands, their policy could only lead either to open hostilities on the mainland if the United States decided to support the Nationalists or to a complete loss of face by Washington if they did not come to the assistance of their allies. Further, this placed the West in a most unfavourable light in the eyes of countries such as India.

Mr. Martino pointed out that the recognition of Communist China by Italy would create serious internal problems. He was not, however, so much concerned about recognition as he was about the admission of Peking at the United Nations.

Both Ministers agreed that there was little that could be done before the United States elections and immediately thereafter although this could not very well be publicly stated.

Mr. Pearson thought that like-minded countries such as Belgium, Australia, Italy and Canada should keep in touch with one another on this so as to concert their action. Mr. Martino said that he would welcome this and hoped that Mr. Pearson would keep him informed of his views.

NATO

Mr. Martino said that the new phase in which NATO had entered emphasized the importance of developing the non-military aspects of the Treaty. He agreed with Mr. Pearson that it was difficult to suggest a definite course of action leading towards implementation of Article II but thought that in view of the present world situation something should be done in the very near future. Mr. Pearson then made the following suggestions which might be followed up:

(a) that the agenda of the next NATO Ministerial Meeting consist mainly if not solely of discussions on the non-military defence problems and that at least interim reports on the various studies in the Article II field initiated at the last Ministerial Meeting should be ready in time for the May meeting;

(b) that political and economic consultation should become a permanent feature of the discussions among permanent delegates; and

(c) that the Messina group powers keep their Atlantic partners informed of the progress made among themselves leading towards European integration.

In the long run a more imaginative approach would have to be taken in the field of economic assistance to under-developed countries. This could be done more usefully through the U.N. than through NATO. The Colombo Plan was an example of what could be done in this field without creating any ill feeling among the recipient countries. Mr. Martino referred to technical assistance through the U.N.; Mr. Pearson agreed that this should be further expanded although he did not believe that the West should be thinking of "hundreds of millions more for Dr. Keenleyside". The U.N. might, however, undertake to give more publicity to assistance given to under-developed countries either bilaterally, through the Colombo Plan and other similar agencies, as well as under technical assistance programmes. This would form a very impressive list when compared with what the Communists were doing in the same field. He added that now that Italy was in the U.N. she would naturally become more interested in these developments.

Some General Conclusions

Our general impression of the visit is that the President of Italy and his Foreign Minister were satisfied that the Canadian Government was generally sympathetic to the Italian views on such subjects as the common market, European integration, East-West contacts and the future of NATO in non-military fields. There was a common desire to coordinate the activities of the alliance in this new phase of the cold war and both countries wished to put the NATO machinery to better use for this purpose by fuller exchange of information on economic and political as well as military matters.

Throughout the discussions, the President emphasized the importance which his country attached to NATO and the willingness of his Government to continue to cooperate in all fields although the military expenditures proved a serious drain on Italian resources. There was no contradiction in his mind between support for NATO and the policy of European integration which his Government was pursuing.

A certain restlessness could, however, be detected in Signor Gronchi's remarks on the inertia of NATO in non-military fields. He also gave the impression that he hoped to use the NATO forum to force the Western Big Three more fully to take Italy into their confidence in discussing European questions. This was quite apparent in a paragraph of his address to Parliament which he decided to strike out at the last minute but which was already in the text given to the press and which read as follows:

> "Allow me to add that another obstacle to a more coherent and efficient functioning of the Atlantic Community and therefore to the success of Western policy is to be found in that mental attitude which even now appears to be persistent in some of our major friendly and allied nations: according to this mental attitude the most appropriate forum in which to examine major problems — whether they be European or world problems — should be that kind of directory of three powers which have up to now assumed the responsibility of discussions with the Soviet Union. It is certainly true that last year a new method of consultation was inaugurated between the members of the Western Community; and it is also true that the existence of various degrees of responsibility must objectively be admitted."

This restlessness, however, does not seem to be accompanied by positive recommendations except possibly in the field of European integration. NATO is seen as an all-embracing institution while the Italians do not seem to have given much thought to the role their country could play at the United Nations.

All told, we had the impression that Signor Gronchi and his Foreign Minister were good Europeans, sincere in their desire to cooperate with their NATO partners and believing that the centre of gravitation of the world was still the Mediterranean with all its past grandeur which they hoped we would share.

HUNGARIAN SITUATION AND THE U.N.

1. As State Department has unfortunately already announced, USA has consulted us and others about feasibility of taking Hungarian situation to United Nations. USA Minister asked us this morning for our reactions to two possible courses of action which might be taken collectively by as many of the signatories of the Hungarian peace treaty as wish to do so:

(a) A letter might be sent to Security Council to invite attention to situation created in Hungary by employment of Soviet forces against Hungarian people to repress demands to enjoy human rights and freedom affirmed in Charter and guaranteed by peace treaty; letter would urge Council members to keep situation under review to determine whether it is liable to endanger peace and security, and if so what constructive steps Council might take;

(b) Alternatively Security Council resolution could be submitted provided for establishment of committee to determine facts and report results of findings to the Council.

2. We are interested in this idea especially if India and Yugoslavia take an active part and would see some advantages in inviting USSR to join in sponsoring this or amended proposal although they would probably reject it. If they did by any chance accept, it might provide only foreseeable context in which Hungarian leaders could talk officially to the West.

3. In any case we would hope U.N. action might facilitate an end to the fighting on terms which would be better than mere repression of anti-Soviet rioters. Rebels are reported this morning to have appealed to U.K. (and perhaps others) to take Security Council action. In circumstances a letter to Security Council is probably all Western group of peace treaty signatories can do. However, if USSR would participate fact finding committee might have more than propaganda value.

4. Grateful for your comments and (except for Washington) those of your Foreign Office on USA suggestion.

5. (Belgrade only) Your USA colleague has authority to approach Yugoslav government at his discretion but may have decided not repeat not to do so.

HUNGARIAN SITUATION AND THE U.N.

Following is the text of the letter[1] addressed today by our Permanent Representative in New York to the Secretary General of the UN. Text begins. In accordance with instructions from my government, I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada fully approves of the initiative taken by the Governments of France, the UK and the US in requesting on October 27/56 that the Security Council should concern itself urgently with the situation in Hungary arising out of foreign armed intervention. In this connection I should like to draw your attention to a statement made on October 27 by the Honourable L.B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, a copy of which is annexed. Text ends.

2. Following is the relevant portion of the Minister's speech on Saturday communicated by Dr. MacKay to the Secretary General. Text begins. The view of the Canadian Government is that the United Nations should immediately be seized of the Hungarian situation in order to prevent further bloodshed and to enable Hungary freely to choose its own course as a new member of the United Nations.

3. It will be the duty and the responsibility of the Soviet Union as well as any other member of the United Nations to work towards such a solution.

4. The forces of world opinion must be mobilized in favour of the forces of national freedom in these countries and against foreign armed intervention and foreign domination. The United Nations is where this should be and can be done. Text ends.

5. Please inform the Government to which you are accredited.

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

We had a discussion this morning with Brimelow, Head of the Foreign Office Northern Department, about recent developments in Hungary. Brimelow is more than ever impressed with the contrast between Nagy and Gomulka. Reports from the UK Legation in Budapest, which the Foreign Office fully accept, suggest that Nagy's own position has become increasingly, and is now perhaps almost exclusively, dependent on the support of Russian armed forces. Brimelow suggested that if these forces were really withdrawn Nagy and his government might well be lynched. He expects that the Russians will continue to try to shore Nagy up, mainly by armed force, but thinks the Russians probably under-estimate the political difficulties of this.

2. According to UK reports the overwhelming majority of Hungarians have rejected not merely Russian domination but also communism itself. The UK Legation in Budapest seems to have little, if any, confidence in Nagy's honesty, and reports that his government have repeatedly tried to trick the nationalists into surrendering by false reports of surrenders and of the conclusion of truce agreements.

3. The picture of last week's events is now somewhat clarified. Apparently it was the Hungarian security police which started shooting at the beginning and thereby turned the demonstrations into a popular uprising. By now, according to the British Legation, virtually all Hungarians excepting top communists and the security police, but including some of the latter, are bitterly anti-Russian and pro-nationalist.

4. Nagy's efforts to broaden his government have been largely unsuccessful. The UK Legation are skeptical about the extent to which Bela Kovacs is in fact voluntarily participating in the new government. Apparently Nagy did carry out negotiations with "genuine social democrats" for a real coalition government but these broke down because the social democrats stood firm on the conditions of free elections and the withdrawal of Russian troops.

5. The Nagy Government is, however, going to great lengths in its efforts to get some nationalist support. Thus the Prime Minister is reported to have stated in a broadcast that "a great national movement has taken shape of which the government approves". Moreover in an article entitled "A Reply to Pravda", the Hungarian Communist Party Organ Szabad Nep, specifically says that "What happened was not anti-democratic, was not an adventure and did not collapse" and states that "The tragic yet uplifting struggle has not been the outcome of some undermining activity but alas had been brought about by our own errors and crimes, primarily by our failing to protect the sacred flame inherited from our ancestors — that is our national independence". This paper puts the blame explicitly on "the criminal clique of Gero".

6. The British Legation reported that Mikoyan arrived in Budapest on Saturday.

7. Both the USA and the UK representatives in Hungary took the early initiative of urging that their governments take action in the UN. The British representative, though he apparently started with a rather more cautious view than his American colleague, has during the past few days come to attach very great importance to action or statements which would encourage the Hungarian nationalists, who seem to have surprised everyone by showing some prospect of winning out in the end.

8. When we saw Brimelow this morning no decision had been taken about the instructions to be sent to Sir Pierson Dixon at the UN, where the Hungarian situation is expected to be discussed tomorrow, Wednesday October 31. As you will appreciate there was some confusion and uncertainly in view of the overnight developments in the Middle East. In New York Lodge had apparently suggested introducing a draft substantive resolution on Hungary asking that Russian troops be withdrawn, but it was recognised that this would almost certainly invoke a Soviet veto, and might also conceivably create an awkward precedent for other areas. Its legal basis might also be complicated in view of the Warsaw Treaty. The Foreign Office officials were inclined to approve an alternative suggestion of Pierson Dixon's that a good first stage in the Security Council might be to introduce a procedural resolution taking note of Nagy's public promise to ask the Russians to withdraw their troops from all of Hungary, and deciding to leave the question on the agenda to see how these negotiations come out. This, it is thought, might give an opportunity for non-Communist representatives to make helpful statements on the record while avoiding a Soviet veto and yet taking some formal action to pin Nagy down and to encourage the liberalization processes in Hungary. In any case, however, in view of the importance of speed and of agreement of the USA and France the widest discretion will almost certainly be left to the missions in New York.

HUNGARY; SERVICE OF CANADIANS IN HUNGARIAN FORCES; FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there had been a number of requests from persons of Hungarian extraction for information on the possibility of going to Hungary to fight against the Russians. Under the Foreign Enlistment Act, passed in 1937, it was an offence for a Canadian to enlist in the forces of a foreign state at war with a friendly nation. It was not an offence to take part in a civil conflict in another country unless an order in council were passed under that statute, specifically prohibiting it. The minister had said no such order had been passed in regard to this Hungarian war nor was one contemplated. Legally, therefore, Canadians could go to Hungary to join the Hungarian liberation forces. Of course, persons with Hungarian citizenship might have difficulty returning to Canada, and even people of Hungarian origin with Canadian citizenship might also find it difficult to travel without a passport.

The number of requests would probably slacken off as the Russians withdrew from Hungary. Meanwhile, it was proposed to explain the legal situation and to mention that it was not proposed to pass the type of order referred to above.

2. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the legal position with regard to persons in Canada joining the liberation forces in Hungary.

HUNGARIAN SITUATION AND THE U.N.

Our two aims in supporting the discussion of this question in the U.N. were to put an end to the bloodshed and to try to reach a satisfactory solution. From reports reaching us the first seems to have been accomplished, at least temporarily, and it may be that the Hungarians themselves can work out a satisfactory arrangement for the future government of their country. Latest reports of the changing Soviet attitude towards the satellites indeed are so encouraging, it seems to me that it may be advisable, in the circumstances, to postpone further discussion of this question in the Security Council until the situation becomes a little more clear, and certainly until the new Hungarian Delegation reaches New York.[2] It may well be in any case that Middle East developments will prevent early discussion in any event. I hope when discussion is resumed that the Western Powers can avoid the temptation to score a propaganda victory over the Russians. Depending on the course of events a good first stage could well be that suggested to you by the Foreign Office.

2. To London only: Could you please outline these views to the Foreign Office.

To Washington and Paris only: Please discuss with the State Department (Quai d'Orsay) along these lines.

To New York only: It would be useful to discuss this with your UK, French, US and Australian colleagues.

A press despatch just received carries the story of Indian condemnation of the Israeli attack on Egypt. INDIA'S SILENCE OVER HUNGARY

I saw Pillai at noon November 1. I began by saying that when I had requested this interview a few days ago it was to give him a memorandum† on the Hungarian situation and the UN. I then gave him this memorandum which embodied the text of the documents given in your telegram SS-222 October 29. I went on to say that when we had seen Dutt on October 30 on the question of the Indo-Canadian immigration agreement he had asked me to stay on for a few minutes alone. He had then expressed India's concern over the newspaper reports of the Israeli invasion of Egypt.

2. At that time I had said to Dutt speaking personally that he had no doubt seen that there was already criticism in North America over the silence of Nehru over Hungary. It was impossible to conceive of any situation affecting a Western power which would parallel that which had arisen in Hungary. Suppose however there had been a popular revolution in Spain against Franco and USA troops had at Franco's request participated in quelling the revolution. I was sure that if that had occurred there would have been an outcry in the Indian press.

3. I said to Pillai that not repeat not only had there been silence by Nehru over Soviet armed intervention in Hungary but there had been a statement by Krishna Menon on October 28 that developments in Hungary were internal matters for the Hungarian people.

4. My fear that Indian silence on the Hungarian situation would cause criticism in North America had been confirmed by the message that I had received this morning from you. I then read your message making clear that I had not repeat not been instructed to transmit it to him but that I felt that he ought to have it. I said that I would draw to your attention the fact that there had been no repeat no separate Indian condemnation on the Israeli attack on Egypt and that you must be referring to the statement of the official Indian spokesman on October 31 condemning the Israeli attack on Egypt and the Anglo-French invasion of Egypt.

5. Pillai at first took strong exception to my remarks. There was no repeat no parallel between what was happening in Egypt and what had happened in Hungary. Because of the Warsaw Pact and the request by the Hungarian government for Soviet assistance in quelling the revolution a cloak of legality had been cast over the Soviet action. I replied that that cloak had been cast aside when Nagy had denied that the Hungarian government had requested Soviet intervention. Pillai said that if Canada criticized India for not repeat not having come out strongly on Soviet action in Hungary he might similarly criticize Canada for not repeat not having yet issued a strong public denunciation of the aggression of Israel, France and the UK against Egypt.

6. I said I would not repeat not have spoken to him about your message to me if the question was one of recrimination. The discussion of the question of Hungary was however still pending before the Security Council. Would it not repeat not be possible for Nehru in the course of the next few days to make his position clear. The people of Hungary had put on one of the most gallant demonstrations of courage which the world had seen in many years. They had been fighting for national freedom against foreign domination. I could if I wanted to quote statements made by Nehru during the course of the Indian struggle for freedom which could be applied unchanged to the Hungarian struggle.

7. Pillai said that I was the only diplomatic representative here who had expressed to him criticism of Indian inaction in relation to Soviet aggression in Hungary. The Prime Minister's time was so occupied that it would be impossible for Pillai to speak to him about what I had said. We felt that if he were to report in a memorandum it would have an unfortunate effect. He suggested that the next time a convenient opportunity arose when I was talking to Nehru I might raise the matter with him delicately perhaps not repeat not in reference to Hungary but in reference to what might happen in another country e.g. Roumania.

8. I had hoped that by raising this issue I might evoke from Pillai the reply that though India had remained silent in public it had brought pressure to bear on the USSR through diplomatic channels. Unfortunately no repeat no such approach was made to the USSR. The only action which the Prime Minister did take to show his sympathy for the revolutionaries in Hungary was to give orders that the telegrams which he had received from Hungarian emigrés imploring his assistance should be published since he wanted the people of India to know that he was in touch with these emigrés.

9. From my experience in the past in dealing with Pillai I think that what I have said to him of your views may encourage him to urge Nehru if not repeat not to say something about Hungary soon at least to speak quickly if another situation on the Hungarian pattern arises.

10. I should be glad to know if you wish me to pursue the matter with Nehru the next time I see him.

HUNGARIAN SITUATION

Under present plans there will be a Security Council meeting on the Hungarian situation at five pm today called at the request of UK, USA and France. A resolution will be presented and the USSR is expected to veto it. The USA will then move that the question be considered by the Emergency Special Session of the General Assembly under the Uniting for Peace Resolution.

2. According to the UK delegation it is most unlikely that the General Assembly would meet on this item today. It is expected however that it will meet to take this up tomorrow assuming that the procedure in the Council goes as expected.

3. The USA, UK and French delegations have not yet agreed on the draft resolution to be introduced in the Council. They are meeting at three pm and we shall forward this resolution to be introduced later in the Assembly.

4. Apparently no new Hungarian representative has presented his credentials although there are confused stories to the effect that a new Hungarian representative may be available by the time the meeting is called.

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

Our telegrams yesterday may have given the impression that the USA, the UK and France were in agreement on the tactics and purposes of the treatment of the Hungarian item. Our info now, confirmed by the statements and attitudes taken at yesterday's Security Council meeting, is that only the UK and France were actively seeking a Soviet veto in order to have a General Assembly meeting on the Hungarian question. The USA was apparently determined to proceed more cautiously, to await clarification of the situation in Hungary, and was not prepared to rush a resolution into the Security Council designed chiefly to reap a Soviet veto. Statements made by both Dixon and Guiringaud in the Council yesterday were much more sharply anti-Soviet than Lodge's statement. The keynote of Lodge's statement was his assertion that "We must now get all the facts so that whatever we do will be done in a sure-footed way and will be really helpful." Guiringaud on the other hand said his government had instructed him "To ask for an urgent meeting of the Security Council so that the Council may adopt an appropriate resolution. If that resolution were to prove impossible of achievement because of a veto we would have to envisage the immediate convening of a meeting of the Emergency Special Session of the General Assembly."

2. In the course of the meeting the Hungarian Permanent Mission in New York, whose First Secretary had been allowed to sit but not speak at the meeting, circulated a note to the Secretary-General transmitting a further letter dated November 2 from Nagy to the effect that large Soviet military units had crossed the border of the country marching toward Budapest. The text of the letters from Nagy of November 1 and November 2 to the SecretaryGeneral are given in a following telegram.[3]

3. The Council adjourned until 3.00 p.m. today. We have learned from the USA delegation that a resolution has been approved in Washington which is not as strong as the UK and France would want it. The USA is now prepared to put this resolution forward by itself if it cannot get UK and French agreement. The USA hope that the resolution would not come to a vote today so that the situation created by a probable Soviet veto can be delayed. In some circumstances they would be prepared to transfer this question to the Assembly but "the present circumstances are not the right ones". Their concern is no doubt partly the desire to have all the facts and not to take hasty action on Hungary but also, we believe, a desire to keep the emergency session of the General Assembly free of other issues until it has dealt fully with the Middle East crisis.

4. The UK and French delegations on the other hand are still pressing for the early moving of a resolution calculated to get a veto followed by immediate action to take the question up in the Assembly.

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

The information from Hungary is contradictory and confusing. We are dependent almost entirely on newspaper reports, and I understand that even the missions in Budapest itself can only get a partial idea of the situation. Nevertheless, the following preliminary comments on what is happening there might be of use over the weekend.

2. There seems to be little doubt that the Soviet troops, under pressure from the almost universal revolt against Soviet domination, did withdraw from Budapest. The entire Hungarian army and air force went over to the rebels and only remnants of the secret police sided with the Russians. The present government is a coalition, still headed by Nagy. The old Communist Party of Hungary has been dissolved and reformed as the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party of which Janos Kadar, the closest equivalent to a Hungarian Tito, is First Secretary. Four other parties are now represented in the government. The most important are the Smallholders Party and the Social Democratic Party. Public pressure is continuing for the resignation of three former Stalinists from the key portfolios of the Interior, Iron and Steel, and Coal and Electricity.

3. It is still uncertain how much prestige or authority this government has, since revolutionary committees, both civilian and military, appear to have been set up in other cities of Hungary, and their aims and ideas concerning tactics vary enormously. The main thing they all seem to have in common is their violent anti-Russian and anti-Communist feeling.

4. With regard to the military situation, it is reported that Soviet armoured columns have entered from the U.S.S.R. and Roumania. Our military intelligence estimates Soviet strength in Hungary has increased to at least three divisions. Armoured columns have closed off the Austro-Hungarian border and telephone communications between Vienna and Budapest appear to have been cut. The main airports, railways and highways are said to be controlled by Soviet forces.

5. Radio Budapest has announced that the Hungarian government has communicated three notes to the Soviet Ambassador in Hungary concerning a protest about the entry of new Soviet troops into the country; the immediate withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Hungary; and the commencement of immediate negotiations to determine the relations between the U.S.S.R. and Hungary on the basis of equality and independence.

6. Nagy has also sent a message to the United Nations Security Council announcing Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact and Hungary's permanent neutrality, calling on the United Nations for support. Our information is that the Warsaw Pact has no provision for withdrawal of any State before the expiration of the twenty year period under which it is valid. We have not yet secured the text of the resolution which the United States delegation intends to submit to the Security Council.

7. The vacillation of the Soviet authorities over the Hungarian situation are due, in my opinion, to the following factors:

(a) The speed with which the Titoist movement in Hungary spread into a violent anti-Russian and anti-Communist revolt;

(b) Probable divisions of opinion in Moscow as to the course of action to be followed by the U.S.S.R.;

(c) The diversion caused by the Suez crisis, giving time and excuse for the Soviet leaders to return to a policy of force in Hungary;

(d) The strongly anti-Soviet attitude adopted by the Hungarian government, probably under strong popular pressure;

(e) Fear of western intervention in Hungary, accentuated by the willingness of the British and French to risk war by actually attacking an important member of the United Nations.

8. Our latest reports are that the Russians have commenced negotiations with the Hungarians in Budapest. We have no more information than that, but I would suspect that the Russians will now demand as a minimum the stationing of Soviet troops in Hungary and the formation of a government which maintains at least the pretence of being partially Communist. The Anglo-French defiance of the United Nations presumably will make them feel in a stronger position to resist United Nations demands and to insist with the Hungarians on a measure of Soviet control. In my view, one of the most disastrous consequences of the Middle East adventure is the excuse now given to the Russians to regain at least partial control of their satellites. The whole aim of NATO and the Western Alliance was to maintain the strength of the West in the hope that some day the Russians could be persuaded to agree to a more permanent type of peace for Europe. It was in our hands to see the Russian threat to Europe brought back right to the borders of the U.S.S.R. It is now quite possible that we have thrown this away.

9. The Russians are nevertheless still faced with a dreadful dilemma in Hungary. They can, if they wish, destroy the present government and the Hungarian Nationalists. The remnants of the Hungarian Communists are completely discredited, but they have escaped to Moscow. They could be restored in Budapest, but there can be little doubt in the Soviet mind that they would have to be maintained by force. In view of the complete lack of success of the Hungarian Communists in maintaining control of the country and a reasonable economic standard, and in view of the complete opposition throughout the country in every sector of national life to both Communism and the U.S.S.R., it seems doubtful that the Soviet leaders who have shown a willingness to accept the realities in Poland, would be foolish enough to think that such a situation would be permanently possible or profitable.

10. The Soviet leaders must equally, however, have been appalled at the speed with which the Hungarian Nationalists were prepared to withdraw their country from the Soviet orbit and the violence of the anti-Russian sentiments displayed. I do not think that they can tolerate the division of their Satellite empire into a northern and southern tier by the loss of Hungary, or permit the possibility of this country being built up as an anti-Soviet base, something they must undoubtedly fear. They probably suspect, therefore, that the Hungarian government's request for neutrality is simply the first step in bringing Hungary completely over into the Western camp.

11. It is not in the interests of the Western powers to attempt to push things too fast in Eastern Europe, though in all truth we have been completely passive in the events played out in Budapest. The Hungarians have set the pace from the beginning. The Russians themselves have announced their willingness to renegotiate the basis of their relations with the Eastern European countries, and indeed they are now talking of a Commonwealth of Socialist States. Before the Suez crisis really broke on us, they had also announced their willingness to negotiate the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Poland. Czechoslovakia and Roumania. If it had been possible for the West to take a diplomatic initiative at this time, this would have been the best possible moment to announce our willingness to negotiate the withdrawal of Western forces from Germany in return for the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Eastern Germany and all of Eastern Europe. The collapse of the Soviet empire in Eastern Europe would have followed almost immediately with the withdrawal of Soviet forces. The effect on the military strength of NATO could hardly have been greater than the effect on the military strength of the U.S.S.R. On the other hand, the West would have gained a tremendous political victory, but as it is the unity and military effectiveness of NATO is sadly shaken without any commensurate political gain.

12. One last thought is that unless the West gives some expression of its solidarity with and sympathy for the Hungarians, we will have lost the last remnants of our prestige in all of Eastern Europe. We can hardly expect that the Roumanians and Czechs will attempt to shake off the dominance of Moscow if the Hungarian battle is lost. I am not suggesting material aid, which is clearly impossible. But some kind of political initiative and support would clearly have been of great moral and political aid to the Hungarians.

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

In view of the increasing seriousness of the reports from Hungary of Soviet military intervention, the Security Council met again on the Hungarian question at 3 am today and voted on a US resolution calling upon the USSR to desist from any form of intervention and deploring the use of Soviet military forces. This resolution was defeated by the Soviet veto. The representative of Yugoslavia said that he could not take part in the vote since he had no instructions. A second US resolution referring the question to the General Assembly under the "Uniting for Peace" procedure was then adopted by ten (including Yugoslavia) in favour and one against (USSR).[5]

2. The second Emergency Special Session of the Assembly was then convened at 4 pm today. The agenda item on Hungary was adopted by 53 votes in favour, 7 against (Soviet Bloc) and 7 abstentions. There was no Hungarian representative at the meeting since the Hungarian Mission here had notified the Secretary General that they had no credentials valid for this second Emergency Special Session. On the vote to adopt the agenda all members of the Afro-Asian group except Pakistan, Iran, Turkey, Cambodia, Ethiopia, Liberia and Thailand either abstained or were absent. Yugoslavia abstained.

3. Early in the debate the USA delegation put forward a draft resolution (text follows in separate telegram)[6] which condemns the use of Soviet military forces to suppress the efforts of the Hungarian people to reassert their rights and requests the Secretary General to investigate the situation caused by foreign intervention in Hungary and to report as soon as possible to the General Assembly. My statement supporting this resolution has already gone forward.[7] After about ten speakers had been heard it was proposed, although there were still many names on the speakers' list, that a vote be taken immediately and that the remaining speakers be heard later. With the exceptions noted above, no member of the Afro-Asian group was inscribed on the speakers' list.

4. In the vote 8 members of the Soviet Bloc (including Poland) voted against the USA draft resolution (Hungary was not represented). The following 15 countries (Arab-Asian members plus Yugoslavia and Finland) abstained: Libya, India, Ceylon, Indonesia, Iraq, Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Jordan, Nepal, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia and Finland. The remaining delegations (including Pakistan, Iran, Liberia, Turkey, Thailand, Cambodia and Ethiopia) voted in favour. Laos and Lebanon were absent.

5. The Assembly will meet again on this item, probably tomorrow, to hear the remaining speakers and explanations of vote. The latter, from the Afro-Asian group, should be interesting, if indeed any explanations are made. Lall told me at the beginning of the meeting that he could not take any part in the proceedings because he had no instructions. Since this no doubt seemed pretty lame, he added that in any case it was not proper to consider an item entitled "the Hungarian question" in the absence of properly accredited representatives of Hungary.

6. There is no need to underline the significance for the UN and for the relations between Western and Asian countries of this vote.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], November 7, 1956

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

To clear our minds before attempting any interpretation of the events of the last month in Hungary, it is necessary to set forth as clearly as possible, from a welter of sometimes contradictory reports, a chronology of events.

2. In 1953, after Stalin's death, Imre Nagy became premier and sought to shift emphasis somewhat away from heavy industry and in favour of consumer goods production. Early in 1955, after Khrushchev and Bulganin came to power, Nagy went out and Rakosi reassumed the dominant position as Party First Secretary. He sought to re-assert the primacy of heavy industry and to re-establish the political controls which had been loosened slightly under Nagy's régime. In July 1955, under mounting pressure from intellectuals and the people at large, and as a result of the logical development of Titoism, he resigned. He was replaced as Party First Secretary by Geroe, a Stalinist associate; and Hegedus, another "tough line" man, became premier.

3. Early in October, as if in response to the ferment in Poland, there was further unrest among students and intellectuals. Budapest was the scene of a mass march of 200,000 for the re-burial of Rajk who had just been "re-habilitated" after his execution for Titoism in 1949. Rakosi fled the country, but Geroe remained at the helm and attended the Black Sea talks with Khrushchev and Tito.

4. On October 23, student demonstrations in Budapest erupted into violence involving both the Hungarian security police and Soviet troops. Geroe is credited with asking for or condoning the use of Soviet forces in an attempt to suppress the initial uprising. On October 24, Nagy, known as a national deviationist and regarded as the most popular of the Hungarian Titoists, replaced Geroe. The Communist Party of Hungary was dissolved and re-formed as the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party with Kadar still First Secretary. The government was re-formed as a coalition, including members from other parties of which the most important were the Smallholders Party and the Social Democratic Party.

5. The governmental shuffles were not enough to avert a week of violence and confusion. It is impossible to sort out the aims of the various rebel groups which sprang up, for they ranged from national communist across the political spectrum to democratic socialist, peasant and possibly even farther right. They seemed to have no concrete or integrated plan or policy. Initially they demanded a representative government, the resignation of Rakosi associates, economic reforms, freedom of speech and assembly, democratic elections and withdrawal of all Soviet forces. As the shaky government yielded on these initial demands, violently anti-Russian and anti-communist elements among the rebel groups eclipsed the Titoists. Nagy was pushed further and further in his attempts to accommodate the ever-increasing demands of the rebel groups. He announced the end of collectivization of agriculture. He demanded and temporarily obtained the evacuation of Soviet forces from Budapest. He sought the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Hungary and, after new Soviet units began to move into Hungary, he announced, on November 1 and 2, Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact and called on the United Nations to support Hungary's "permanent neutrality".

6. The deployment of Soviet troops is of some significance. Our best information — although it cannot be regarded as entirely firm — is that when the revolt began on October 23, Soviet forces in Hungary consisted of two divisions totalling 32,600 men. As the rebels gained strength, the Russians began a military build-up on October 25. Between October 25-27, one division of 15,000 men was moved in from the USSR and, on the latter date, 10,000 men were transferred to Hungary from Roumania. By this time there were four Soviet divisions of 60,000 men in the country. On October 29, the Soviet forces began to withdraw from Budapest at the insistence of the insurgents and Nagy and in accordance with the promises of Zhukov and Shepilov.

7. On October 30 came the statement from Moscow defining Soviet policy towards Eastern Europe. We do not know whether the terms of this declaration encouraged Nagy and the rebel leaders with whom he was beginning to identify himself to go still further to satisfy the anti-communist and anti-Russian elements in the uprising, or whether Nagy's realization that the USSR had reinforced their military position in Hungary caused him to denounce the Warsaw Pact on November 1 and demand publicly the withdrawal of Soviet forces. His appeal to the United Nations on November 2 to support Hungarian neutrality suggests that fear was stronger than an attempt to placate the anti-communists. By denouncing the Pact he may also have wished to destroy the legal basis for the presence of Soviet troops. Whatever Nagy's motives the immediate Soviet reaction was to send three more divisions into Hungary from the USSR between November 1 and 3 (thus increasing their total strength in Hungary to seven divisions totalling about 200,000 men) and attack Budapest with three divisions on November 4. They clearly were not prepared to permit

Nagy to take Hungary out of the Warsaw Pact and align it with Austria outside the Soviet security system. As the United States representative pointed out to the NATO Council, the Soviet's declaration of October 30 could be interpreted as not applying to a non-communist Government.

8. The first Soviet statements about their readiness to negotiate for the withdrawal of Soviet troops were made before Nagy's declaration of Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact. Even after this declaration, as additional troops were being moved into Hungary, the Russians agreed to a meeting between the Soviet and Hungarian military commands on November 3 to discuss withdrawal. The seizure of Nagy, allegedly for condoning the counter-revolution, at the time negotiations were actually in progress, must be seen as an act of duplicity comparable only to the imprisonment of the sixteen Polish leaders who were asked to come to Moscow in 1945 to discuss the future government of Poland.

9. A new puppet government of "workers and peasants" has been set up, headed by Kadar, who has accommodated himself to the new situation. It includes Apro, a supporter of the Nagy programme; Munnich, a former Rakosi associate (Defence and Internal Security); three former socialists and left-wing syndicalists, compromised by long collaboration with Nagy; and Horvath, dropped by Nagy as Foreign Minister and now restored to the post. The stated aims of the puppet régime set up by then Soviet high command, as announced by Radio Moscow on November 4, are given in an annex† to this memorandum. They appear designed to persuade the Hungarians that "democratization" will continue, but the phrases about national independence will seem very hollow to a people subjected to ruthless military repression for going too far and too fast. At the time of writing the rebellion was almost over though pockets of resistance were still holding out.

10. With this chronology of events before us, we must try to analyse the significance of the drastic measures to which the Soviet Union resorted in order to impose its will on a rebellious Hungary.

11. The first important thing to be kept in mind is that the Soviet Union is experiencing grave difficulties in its control in Eastern Europe. These difficulties stem from the Soviet rapprochement with Tito, the doctrine on "differing paths to socialism" adopted by the Twentieth Party Congress, the strong nationalism of the countries of Eastern Europe, the failure of ten years of Soviet control to improve the standard of living of the satellite peoples, and in most of these countries the disastrous failure of the economic programmes. For a wide variety of reasons, the Soviet Union would probably still like to work out a new relationship, based on the declaration of October 30, which would maintain the close relationship between the USSR and its satellites but would leave the satellites with a greater measure of independence at least as to internal policy. But this will depend in large measure on their estimate of the military situation.

12. The Soviet interest in the satellites is political, economic and strategic. It must be recognized that the Soviet Union considers it essential:

(a) that the satellite régimes be at minimum well-disposed to a close or at least friendly relationship with the USSR;

(b) that the Eastern European economies continue to be closely linked with that of the Soviet Union; and

(c) that, either through the presence of Soviet forces or the maintenance of effective satellite military forces willing to align themselves with the Soviet Union in the event of war, the satellites continue to provide defence in depth to the USSR.

It was only when these three essentials seemed to be threatened, i.e. that Hungary might break completely with the Soviet bloc, that the Soviet Union resorted to full-scale force to impose its will.

13. The mistake of the rebels, and of Nagy for trying to keep pace with their demands, was in trying to go too far and too fast. The pattern of the whole operation suggests that, while prepared to use force, the Russians would have preferred to have avoided military action as they did in Poland. The ambivalent approach to Nagy and the Hungarian revolt in the course of the critical week may well be a further reflection of differences of opinion within the Soviet leadership as to how best to handle their problems of imperial control. Mr. Johnson has reported some evidence in Moscow that the army leaders seemed depressed by the Soviet policies in Poland and Hungary, and elated when the attack on the Hungarian rebels was decided on. If strategic arguments were paramount in reaching this decision, then it seems logical to expect an increase in the influence of the military. As of this date, Johnson reports no real sign of a decrease in the influence or importance of Khrushchev. The Soviet Union probably decided reluctantly upon its drastic action, only when the potential defection of Hungary threatened to divide the Soviet Empire into a northern and southern tier. The Soviet leaders must have anticipated the extremely adverse reaction of world public opinion, but this was less important than the possible loss of Hungary and the fear that, if they did not take a firm stand in Hungary, the revolt might spread to other satellites.

14. The chronology of events and the assessment of the probable Soviet reasons for full-scale armed intervention cast some light on the relationship between the Soviet action in Hungary and the Anglo-French action in Egypt. The Anglo-French action and the United Nations discussion of it undoubtedly created a sensational diversion of international public attention and probably helped relieve the anxieties the Russians must have had about reaction abroad. But the fact that troop movements began three or four days before the Israeli attack on Egypt and the fact that three additional divisions were ready to move in immediately Nagy denounced the Warsaw Pact suggests that the Anglo-French action was not the dominant factor in determining the ultimate course of Soviet action, which was determined primarily by military necessity. The scale and timing of their action and the logistic preparations obviously required for mounting such an operation suggest that the decision to deal with Nagy by force if necessary was not directly related to Anglo-French action in Egypt.

15. It is conceivable, however, that the Russians might have been deterred from taking this drastic action if the attention of the world had been fully concentrated on Hungary, and if the Western powers had been firmly united, but the facts tend to disprove this. Nevertheless, had the West not been pre-occupied with the Middle East, we might then have been able to take diplomatic initiative to guarantee Soviet security interests in Eastern Europe, or possibly to take advantage of the declared Soviet willingness to discuss the withdrawal of troops from Hungary, Roumania and Poland.

16. In addition the readiness of the British and French to use force in Egypt might have re-inforced the military argument that the USSR could not at that moment afford to risk that Hungary would not only be separated from the Soviet bloc, but might also be used as a spring-board for western incursions against the USSR.

17. But the Soviet dilemma has by no means been solved by their intervention by force to suppress a revolution which they themselves must recognize represented the vast majority of the Hungarian population. In the first place they have to all intents and purposes lost one of the satellite armies. The Kadar government, in spite of its announced programme, will be loathed by most Hungarians and will be able to stay in power only with the support of Soviet troops. Hungary will certainly for some time to come be a political and economic liability.

18. Armed intervention in Hungary and its brutality have dealt the international prestige of the USSR a severe blow, though its impact on Asian-Arab opinions has been largely lost because of the diversion of opinion in the East and the Middle East crisis. Its effect on Soviet policies in general will be very great, but it is too early to tell in exactly what direction the Russians will now move.

19. In subsequent papers I shall submit some suggestions as to the policies we might consider in the light of the developments in Hungary. I am also preparing papers on Soviet policy in the satellites in the light of the Hungarian revolt,[8] and the situation in Poland.[9]

RELIEF FOR HUNGARY

22. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, considered that a substantial effort would be required to relieve, even in a small degree, the distress of the Hungarian population and to make them feel they had not been deserted by their friends in the west. Whether relief supplies would continue to be allowed into the country was uncertain, but large amounts would be needed in any event to sustain the 15,000 or more refugees who had already escaped. A considerable amount of assistance was already reaching Vienna but much more would be needed.

The Canadian Red Cross had so far devoted some $28,000 for Hungarian relief and it could draw on the $600,000 remaining in the old European Flood Relief Fund. However, it was not anxious to exhaust this fund since other emergencies would likely arise for which it would be needed. To supplement existing resources, a campaign was being organized by

Hungarian groups in Canada to secure voluntary contributions which would be paid to, and administered by, the Red Cross. These activities would not likely meet the situation and a material gesture by the Canadian government appeared desirable, not only to meet the needs of the Hungarians, but also to encourage Canadians to contribute to the campaign being organized. Such action would also be in accord with recent U.N. resolutions urging member governments to assist.

The Minister recommended that Canada offer assistance through the Red Cross either by donating 2,000 tons of butter or, preferably, by contributing $1 million for relief purposes in Hungary or among Hungarians who had left their country since the uprising began. If the latter proposal were acceptable, a portion of the funds might be turned over at once to the High Commissioner for Refugees. The money involved in both cases might be met from the vote for unforeseen expenditures or by Governor General's warrant, or a combination of both methods.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Acting Minister's memorandum, Nov. 5, 1956; Cab. Doc. 219-56)†

23. The Minister of Finance said he preferred the second form of assistance. However, the vote for unforeseen expenditures was not adequate and he would not like to use a Governor General's warrant. Perhaps, an immediate contribution of $100,000 as an earnest of the government's intentions would suffice for the moment and the Red Cross could arrange to finance the remainder on a temporary basis. The full amount might be voted at the special session to be called as a result of the contribution to the U.N. police force.

24. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Should any of the proposed contribution not be used for purposes described, it should be returned to the Receiver General and not be retained by the Red Cross for other purposes.

(b) Although one could not be sure that Canadian supplies would not reach people in Hungary, it would be undesirable for any contribution to be made at this time for relief purposes in Hungary itself. Austria was faced with a serious problem in dealing with the refugees, especially as there had been a poor crop and a food shortage was possible.

(c) A request had been made to permit exemptions for income tax on contributions to a fund being organized in Montreal. The law would appear to allow exemptions in these circumstances, but the Department of National Revenue had ruled in the past that to claim them, the organization concerned had to conduct the whole operation for which it was established and not just collect funds to pass on to others. It would be preferable if those wishing to help Hungarian refugees were to make their contributions to the Red Cross and exemptions could then be granted in the usual way.

(d) Before reaching a decision on the proposal, the Department of External Affairs should make it clear to the Red Cross that the money should be used for refugees outside of Hungary and ascertain also if part of any grant should be paid direct to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

25. Mr. Martin reported later that the Red Cross would use any grant for assistance to refugees not in Hungary, and also that the High Commissioner for Refugees needed funds urgently. He suggested that one grant of $100,000 to the Red Cross and another of the same size to the High Commissioner be approved in principle now for use in assisting refugees, to be paid when funds were available.

26. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on relief for Hungary and agreed,

(a) that $100,000 be contributed to the Canadian Red Cross for the relief of refugees who had left Hungary since the recent uprising in that country began, on the understanding that as much materials and supplies be procured in Canada as possible, and that any portion of the grant not used for the purposes specified be returned to the Receiver General;

(b) that $100,000 be contributed to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for the same relief purposes; and,

(c) that detailed financing arrangements be settled subsequently by the Treasury Board, but that, as an earnest of the government's intentions, $50,000 be made available immediately from the unforeseen expenses vote of the Department of Finance.

HUNGARIAN SITUATION

1. The following are the summary conclusions of a longer departmental paper on events in Hungary. It has not yet had ministerial approval and must necessarily still be considered somewhat speculative.

(1) The Soviet Union probably decided to quell the Hungarian rebellion by force (a possible necessity which it had prepared for at the first signs of serious trouble) only when it became clear that Nagy had lost control of the situation and was merely riding the crest of the rebels' ever increasing demands. His concessions and demands meant the end of Communist control and the withdrawal of Hungary from the Soviet Bloc. For political, economic and, most important, strategic reasons, the Soviet Union could not permit this. It would have preferred the maintenance of essential control by less violent means but felt forced to intervene to prevent Hungary's total defection.

(2) The duplicity of the Russians in this action should be noted. During the week when Soviet troops were being moved into Hungary, Bulganin and Zhukov were consistently denying these movements to Western diplomats in Moscow. Moreover, the Russians were actually mounting their full-scale assault on Hungary at the same time as they were offering to negotiate and holding discussions with the Hungarians for the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops.

(3) By its action in Hungary, the Soviet Union has seriously impaired its line of peaceful co-existence and the possibilities for better relations, in all fields, with the West. Unfortunately, the impact on Asia-Arab opinion has been largely dissipated because of diversion of attention to the Middle East.

(4) The timing and pattern of troop movements into Hungary, and the necessary logistical preparation for those movements, show that the Soviet Union was prepared to take drastic action to cope with the Hungarian situation, if it got out of hand, before the Israeli attack on Egypt and before the Anglo-French action in Egypt. While the latter offered a sensational diversion of international public opinion for action which the Russians decided was necessary for them to take, and thus minimized for the West a great political and propaganda advantage, it cannot be considered as the primary motivating factor for the Russians.

2. As you know, both the Prime Minister and the Minister have condemned the Soviet action in Hungary in forthright terms, and Canada voted for the USA resolution on Hungary at the Special Session of the General Assembly.

3. (For NATO Paris only) You may use this analysis in discussions in the NATO Council.

4. (For other missions) You may use this analysis at your discretion with the Foreign Ministry and with diplomatic colleagues.

My dear Colleague:

I am most grateful to you for the very prompt action which you took to give priority in selection to Hungarian refugees and to extend the assisted passage loan scheme to them. I know this offer by Canada, as well as the grants of $100,000 each to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and the Canadian Red Cross, is greatly appreciated by all who are concerned with the plight of these unfortunate people. I see in this morning's paper that wide publicity is being given in Austria to our offer.[10]

[10] Le 6 novembre 1956, J. W. Pickersgill a publié le communiqué suivant :
"With the approval of the Prime Minister and in accordance with the general policy of the Government respecting refugees, the Canadian Immigration Office in Vienna has been instructed to give priority to applications from refugees from Hungary. Assisted Passage Loans will be available to such immigrants on the same terms as to other immigrants from Europe." Des instructions semblables ont été communiquées aux agents d'immigration en poste à Londres, à Paris, à La Haye, à Cologne, à Copenhague, à Rome, à Bruxelles, à Stockholm, à Oslo et à Berne. En outre, Pickersgill a annoncé que les réfugiés hongrois n'avaient pas besoin de parrains canadiens ou de répondre aux exigences professionnelles habituelles. Voir Canada, ministère des Affaires extérieures, Affaires Extérieures, vol. 8, N° 11, p. 337.

On November 6, 1956, J.W. Pickersgill issued the following statement:
"With the approval of the Prime Minister and in accordance with the general policy of the Government respecting refugees, the Canadian Immigration Office in Vienna has been instructed to give priority to applications from refugees from Hungary. Assisted Passage Loans will be available to such immigrants on the same terms as to other immigrants from Europe." Similar instructions were issued to immigration officers in London, Paris, The Hague, Cologne, Copenhagen, Rome, Brussels, Stockholm, Oslo and Berne. In addition, Pickersgill announced that Hungarian refugees did not need to have Canadian sponsors or meet the normal occupational requirements. See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 8, No. 11, p. 325.

I should like to raise with you the possibility that, in the case of Hungarian refugees, we might adopt a more liberal policy than would be applicable to a regular immigration operation. I am afraid that, if we stick rigidly to the usual health and job training requirements, Canada's offer to give priority will seem a rather meagre one compared with what I understand are unconditional quota offers by a number of other countries. If the word gets around, as it is bound to, that we are willing to take only the hale and the hearty and that we are leaving those whose need for help is greater to other countries, then it is bound to reflect adversely on Canadian willingness to help.

You are no doubt aware that a number of outstanding applications from Hungarians have already been approved by your Department. They concern persons with close relatives in Canada who had been denied exit permits by the Hungarian authorities. It is conceivable that some of these applicants may have fled Hungary along with other refugees. If any in this category should present themselves to Canadian immigration officials along with other refugees I think it would be desirable that they be given special consideration in view of the fact that their applications have already been approved.

I need not emphasize the domestic and international political desirability of making it clear that Canada is taking an unselfish interest in the plight of the Hungarian refugees. I hope, therefore, that it may be possible to waive for the present purposes some of the conditions which, while admirably suited to normal immigration, do not fully meet the requirements of the present urgent situation.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

HUNGARY

I am grateful for your prompt and effective efforts to bring to Mr. Nehru's attention the apparent discrepancy between his attitude to the situation in the Middle East and that in Hungary. His UNESCO statement was perhaps all that we could have hoped for and Menon's statement at the UN on the same issue has been welcome.

2. In view of Menon's cooperative and not unreasonable attitude so far in New York, we should not, I think, press further at the risk of turning the Indians sour. You must protect your excellent position in Delhi and not endanger it too much on the Hungarian question. It would be preferable, I think, if your note to Nehru remained unofficial and personal, since it has in any case achieved its purpose.

SITUATION IN HUNGARY

If you wish to show my SS-245 to any members of the Indian government you may wish to expand verbally on the conclusions of its paragraph 4.

2. The Soviet military build-up from two divisions began at least as early as October 25 and reached a total in Hungary of four divisions by October 27 and of possibly nine divisions by November 3. The Russians attacked Budapest on November 4 with three divisions and set up a puppet communist government under Kadar which promises only a limited number of the rebel demands.

3. The timing and pattern of Soviet troop movements into Hungary, which required extensive logistical planning, show that the USSR was ready to take drastic action before the Israeli and Anglo-French action in Egypt. The latter action has diverted foreign and Soviet public opinion from a resort to brutality, the only course of which the Soviet leadership is capable when its vital interests are threatened by a genuinely nationalist movement, and cannot be considered as the primary motivating factor for the Russians.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 12, 1956

SOVIET INTERVENTION IN HUNGARY

Soviet armed intervention in Hungary cannot help but have a profound effect throughout the world and upon relations between Canada and the Soviet Union. Here, and in New York, we have been engaged in efforts to determine what we can best do to stop the bloodshed in Hungary and to take advantage of the difficulties which the Soviet Union is facing in its European empire.

2. For the moment, I think the best thing we can do, apart from extending material assistance to the Hungarian people and the Hungarian refugees, is to give whole-hearted moral support to the condemnatory resolutions which the General Assembly has passed. We voted on November 4 for the first resolution, and on November 10 for the supplementary

Italian, U.S. and Austrian resolutions.[11] To my mind, the most important thing is to bring it in upon the Russians that, by their own actions, they have shattered whatever confidence in their intentions the world had begun to entertain, and that they stand alone and isolated before world public opinion. At the same time I think we must not go so far that we nullify whatever chances may remain of moderating to some extent the severity of Soviet repression by a genuine humanitarian appeal.

3. With this in mind, I have drafted for your consideration the attached message to Premier Bulganin. If you agree, I propose transmitting it through our Ambassador in Moscow. It might later be published.

4. I would also like to suggest that you call in the Soviet Ambassador, Mr. Chuvahin, to impress upon him the extremely unfavourable reaction which Soviet actions in Hungary have caused in this country. You might tell him that, if the Soviet Union persists in this course of action, it is idle to speak of improving relations in any field between Canada and the Soviet Union. You might also read out to him the message which you have sent to Premier Bulganin to impress upon him the seriousness with which the Canadian Government and people view the events of the last few days.

5. The attached message was shown to Mr. Pearson before he left again for New York. He was in two minds about sending it and suggested that another way of coping with the matter would be for you to call the Soviet Ambassador in and give him orally the substance of the message. Mr. Pearson said he would like to leave it to you to decide which you thought was the better course of action.

Ottawa, November 13, 1956

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I consider it my urgent duty to let you know that the people and the Government of Canada have been profoundly shocked by the reports we have received of the actions your Government has taken in Hungary during the last few weeks. We have made our attitude clear in the position taken by Canada in voting for the United Nations resolutions on this subject. I wish to add my plea not only for rapid compliance on the part of the Soviet Government with these resolutions, but for a display even at this late date of moderation towards the unfortunate victims of these tragic events.

I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I speak for the whole people of Canada in expressing our horror at the suffering of the Hungarian people as a result of their efforts to obtain the freedom to choose their own type of Government. It is not, however, my present purpose to attempt to pass judgment on the actions that have been taken but to ask you, in the name of humanity, to use your influence to alleviate the sufferings of the Hungarian people and to permit competent international agencies and organizations to help in the urgent work of distributing food and caring for the sick. In this humanitarian work the Canadian Government and people are already giving material support wherever it is within their power to do so.

The Government and people of Canada have no desire to influence the form of Government chosen by the peoples of Eastern Europe. Our only aim is that they should be free to do so, and that the Governments so chosen should steer their own independent courses, respecting the equal rights of all their neighbours and bearing in mind only the needs and wishes of their own people in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations Charter.

Yours sincerely,

NEHRU AND HUNGARY

This morning November 13 I had a 25 minute conversation with Nehru in his office just before the opening of the Colombo Prime Minister's meeting at 9:30.

2. I began by thanking him for granting me an interview at a time when I knew he was even more pressed than usual. I had reported to you that it was expected he would be making a considered statement on Indian foreign policy in Parliament November 14. You knew that he was receiving information about events in Hungary from India's own missions abroad and from friendly governments. Canada had some information which you wished me to give him. Normally I would have given the information to Pillai for transmission to him but I was under instructions that the information contained in one of the documents was not repeat not to be committed to writing but was to be given orally (meaning your SS-252 November 9).

3. I then handed him a memorandum embodying your SS-245 November 8. Before I had a chance to go on with the oral expansion of paragraph 4 of the memorandum Nehru said that the essential charge in the Departmental paper was of "duplicity" against the Russians, that their statement of October 30 was "eyewash". However both Russia and China keep striking forces always ready. It is therefore possible that the decision to move into Hungary had been taken after October 30.

4. I said that another telegram which I had received from you demonstrated that the Soviet build-up had begun as early as October 25 and had reached a total in Hungary of four divisions by October 27 and of possibly nine divisions by November 3. Thus by October 30 when the Soviet statement was issued the number of Soviet troops in Hungary was already somewhere between four divisions and nine divisions. I then read to him slowly the operative paragraphs of SS-252.

5. Nehru said we had to go back beyond the actual Anglo-French invasion of Egypt. UK and France had been moving troops in the Mediterranean from August on. The implications of this would make it necessary for the USSR to begin to make its own troop dispositions.

6. I said that I had nothing to go on except the information [in] your 252, but I failed to follow Nehru in his reference to a connection between the Anglo-French military build-up in the Mediterranean and the Soviet mobilization against Hungary beginning on October 25.

7. Nehru said that what we were both doing was trying to make logical deductions from the information in the telegram I had read to him. It was clear and here he mentioned the Yugoslav interpretation of events in Russia that for some months there had been 2 groups within the Russian government pulling in different directions. One group was prepared to allow the trends towards liberalization in Poland and other Eastern European countries to continue; the other considered it dangerous to let these get out of hand. We must remember the mentality of the Russians in respect of Eastern Europe. They consider that the USA by various means is "constantly inciting the people of Eastern Europe to revolt".

8. The mere fact that the Soviet military buildup against Hungary had begun at least as early as October 25 did not repeat not necessarily mean that the tougher group in the Soviet government had won out by that time. When on a critical issue opinion within a government is divided it is often necessary for a government to authorize preparations for the action which would have to be taken in the event the Government finally comes down in favour of one side or the other. Thus the fact that by October 25 the Soviet government had authorized a military buildup against Hungary did not repeat not necessarily mean the Soviet government had then decided on a tough policy against Hungary. It could mean merely that the Soviet government had authorized the buildup in case the government finally accepted the views of the tougher faction.

9. I agreed that undoubtedly what he had said of the way any government would act was correct. I drew his attention however to an article in the Hindustan Times this morning on the genesis of the Hungarian revolution which referred to the initial spark being the huge student demonstrations on October 23. I said it was surely significant that the other faction in the Soviet government was strong enough only 2 days after the first student demonstration to get authority for what amounted to partial mobilization against Hungary.

10. Nehru said that just as there had been indications for some days ahead of the launching of the attack that Israel was going to attack Egypt — indications so strong that Eisenhower had made representations to the Israel government — so also there could have been indications to Russia even before the student demonstration of October 23 in Budapest that the Soviet position in Hungary was going to be threatened. I said that so far as I could recall the only public advance notice had been a statement about 2 days before October 23 that the students of Budapest were going to put on a peaceful demonstration.

11. Nehru said that what he was thinking of was the process of liberalization which had started in Poland a good deal earlier and which the Russians must have known would affect Hungary.

12. (Group corrupt) to Nehru's remarks about conflicts between 2 groups in Moscow. I said that I had a copy of a telegram of November 5 from our Ambassador in Moscow which gave his interpretation of what had been happening there. I then handed Nehru a memorandum embodying Moscow's telegram 367 November 5.† Since it was now about 9:20 I went on immediately to say that the only other document I had to give him was one containing extracts from a statement you had made at a press conference on November 9 on the rejection by the USSR of the UN resolution to send supplies to Hungary.[12] I gave him a memorandum embodying the information in your telegram YY-606 November 10.†

13. Without giving him a chance to comment I went on to say that there (was?) one pleasant matter I would like to bring up. I spoke about the International Police Force along the lines of my telegram 763 November 13† and we then had a few minutes talk about Nehru's hope that he would be able to visit Canada.[13] On this I am also reporting separately.

14. At the end of our talk Nehru said that while the agenda for Parliament for November 14 did state that he was going to give a speech on international affairs it would not repeat not be possible for him to do so because of being tied up with the meetings of the Colombo Prime Ministers. Consequently the speech had had to be postponed to November 16. I said I was looking forward to hearing him that day.

15. My conversation with Nehru was most depressing example of his willingness to find the least blameworthy explanation of every step the USSR has taken in respect of Hungary.

IMMIGRATION; HUNGARIAN REFUGEES

21. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reported that he had had an opportunity, when recently in Toronto, of explaining at a private meeting of the heads of organizations representing new Canadians from European countries behind the "Iron Curtain", what the plans of the Canadian government were to help Hungarian refugees wishing to emigrate to Canada. This had been a timely opportunity as there had been considerable misrepresentation in Toronto as to these plans and views had been advanced that the proposed priorities for such refugees were mere talk and would be nullified by immigration red tape.

[12] Voir/See The Globe and Mail, November 10, 1956, p. 2.

He had explained that orders had been given to immigration offices that all Hungarian cases were to be given first priority, that no application by a Hungarian was to be turned down on account of any technicality, and that the ordinary rules of sponsorship would not apply so that a request from anybody reasonably able to look after a refugee would be considered and dealt with promptly.

22. Mr. Pickersgill added that, so far, there had been very few cases coming forward. The reason was, no doubt, that the refugees in Austria were mainly women, children and old men who were in too dazed a condition to think about emigration and were only concerned with keeping alive. This situation might well alter in the future, however. He felt the immigration officials in Toronto were doing a good job and were making Hungarian Canadians and others concerned realize that the Federal government was interested and sympathetic at this time of difficulty. The United States proposals to admit an additional 5,000 Hungarians had received considerable publicity but it was not realized that it was merely a proposal to place a bill to this effect before Congress. At the moment it meant nothing. Also, in his opinion, it would be inadvisable to contemplate establishment of any refugee camp in Canada. Only those refugees should be taken who could take employment or who could be looked after by others. The equivalent expenditure would provide direct relief for far more persons in Europe than in Canada.

23. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on the explanation he had given in Toronto about the immigration proposals to assist Hungarian refugees.

CANADIAN AID FOR HUNGARIAN REFUGEES

In my memorandum of November 9, 1956,† I pointed out that our contribution to this problem was not as generous as it first appeared and that we ought to try to liberalize our regulations with regard to the admittance of Hungarian refugees unless we were to be exposed to considerable criticism. This has already commenced as can be seen from the attached editorials in the Toronto Telegram[14] and the Globe and Mail,[15] among others, which refer to the attitude of the Immigration Department as double-talk with little practical significance. The Montreal Gazette of this morning also suggests that Mr. Pickersgill will face criticism in Parliament for the policy he announced respecting the entry to Canada of Hungarian refugees.[16] Annexed are a few excerpts from the press, and some typical editorials.

[14] Voir/See Toronto Telegram, November 12, 1956, "Let Hungarian Refugees In," p. 8.
[15] Voir/See The Globe and Mail, November 12, 1956, "The Gains," p. 6.

2. I attach a telegram of November 13† from the Canadian Delegation in New York which indicates that other countries have agreed to admit Hungarian refugees as follows:

Argentine	–	3,000 children
Australia	–	3,000
Belgium	–	4,000
France	–	as many as wish to go
Netherlands	–	1,000
New Zealand	–	500
Sweden	–	1,000
Switzerland	–	2,000
United Kingdom	–	2,500
United States	–	5,000
Germany	–	3,000
Italy	–	2,000
Israel	–	all Jewish refugees

In addition, it would appear that the United States administration is making a special effort to cut through the red tape in order to admit the refugees immediately.

3. Dr. Stanbury, of the Red Cross, phoned me this morning to give me a report on the interview which the Head of the Hungarian-Canadian Federation had had on Monday with Mr. Pickersgill in which an attempt had been made by the Hungarians to secure details of what our immigration policy really is. The delegation, according to Dr. Stanbury, is extremely dissatisfied as they were not able to get any clarification on what the immigration policy means in regard to the following points:

(a) sponsorship — financial aid is apparently still required; and

(b) health — Mr. Pickersgill said that they were prepared to accept some substandard health risks but that it was up to the sponsors to secure the approval of the provinces. If this were not forthcoming all the refugees would be required to meet medical standards and other normal immigration requirements.

4. Dr. Stanbury told me that the Red Cross has had in the past, in a few humanitarian cases, been required to deposit bonds with the provinces accepting immigrants with a risk of T.B. He added that the tragedy of it seemed to be that there were many empty T.B. beds all across Canada but he saw little hope of cutting through red tape. He did add, however, that he was worried about the reaction of the Hungarian-Canadians when it became entirely clear to them that in fact Canada was not proposing to give any assistance to the refugees in the way of admitting them to this country except in cases which would be obviously profitable to Canada.

[16] Voir/See Arthur Blakely, Montreal Gazette, November 14, 1956, "Ottawa Day by Day," p. 8.

5. As this question has internal political, as well as international, implications, you may wish to let the Minister know. So far as I am aware Mr. Pickersgill has not yet replied to Mr. Pearson's letter on the subject.[17]

RELIEF FOR HUNGARY

It will be recalled that on November 7 the decision was taken to make available the amount of $200,000 for the relief of Hungarian refugees. One half of this amount is to be assigned to the United Nations Refugees Fund, the other half to the Canadian Red Cross Society for emergency relief of refugees from Hungary.

The decision concerning those relief arrangements for refugees from Hungary (who are mainly in Austria, where their number has been estimated at some 15,000 (now reported as increased to 21,000)) was taken at a time when it appeared that the Red Cross might be prevented from bringing effective assistance to the tens of thousands of people suffering acute distress in Hungary. Although reports are far from complete, it is clear that shortages of food, medical supplies and shelter are critical in Budapest and other parts of Hungary. Red Cross authorities in Vienna have informed the Canadian Red Cross Society that shipments of butter, wheat, flour and dried milk would be particularly welcome.

On November 9 the General Assembly resolved by 67 votes in favour (including Canada), none against and 8 abstentions "to undertake on a large scale immediate aid for the affected territories by furnishing medical supplies, foodstuffs and clothes", and called upon all Member States "to participate to the greatest extent possible in this relief action".

Despite opposition from Soviet sources the Red Cross has now been able to begin effective relief operations within Hungary, and it is believed by Red Cross authorities that they will be able to maintain and expand the relief services which have begun with the arrival of the first two convoys. In view of the large number of people in acute distress, and the extent of the physical damage to the city of Budapest, it seems clear that the relief required will be on a massive scale.

As the original contribution approved last week was to be limited to the relief of refugees, and as effective relief activities on what will undoubtedly prove a substantially larger scale are now being undertaken by the Red Cross within Hungary, the Government will no doubt wish to consider whether a contribution should be made to the support of this latter relief programme.

Please have telegram prepared to minister. It could take the form of a draft telegram he could send from N.Y. to Mr. Pickersgill. J. L[éger]

The political arguments in favour of such a contribution are obviously powerful. The entire world has been stirred with admiration for the heroism and determination of the Hungarian people in their bitter opposition to their Soviet oppressors. Their struggle has been a lonely one, since the risks of causing a greater catastrophe in the form of a general war have, amongst other reasons, prevented the western countries from providing any military assistance. We must nevertheless welcome the persistence of Hungarian opposition, even though it may be passive rather than military from now on, for it will make more difficult that Soviet control of Eastern Europe which it is our objective to diminish. The Hungarian revolt has been the first major proof that Soviet indoctrination and methods of control have not been successful, despite ten years of Soviet effort, and we must assume that opposition will continue in one form or other. As the Hungarian opposition is striving for the goals we consider desirable, we should give it whatever help we can. This opposition will be less effective if the people of Hungary come to consider themselves deserted or neglected in their hour of need. It is to be hoped that they will understand why western countries could not intervene militarily, but they would find it very difficult to understand a failure to assist them in the ways that are open. Emergency relief assistance is their most immediate need, and one which Canada and other western countries can meet.

Information on action being taken or contemplated by other governments is far from complete, but the latest reports will be made available for the discussion of this memorandum by the Cabinet. It is perhaps appropriate to mention here, however, that the Government of the United States has already offered to provide relief assistance to a total of twenty million dollars, and President Eisenhower stated on November 14: "We should — try — to get into Hungary as much as we can to help out these unfortunate people". The Soviet Government has announced that it will provide relief supplies of various types to Hungary, in at least some cases free of charge. This no doubt will have some effect in relieving distress, even though distribution of these supplies is unlikely to be impartial and present indications are that the scale of Soviet relief, though substantial, will not be adequate to meet the requirements. Poland, having itself recently asserted a measure of independence from Soviet control, has announced that voluntary contributions from the Polish people for Hungarian relief have been provided to the extent of $2 million. This is of course desirable. Nevertheless it is important on humanitarian as well as political grounds that the western countries should extend substantial aid to be distributed impartially to those in distress in Hungary.

In view of the urgent need, the political considerations mentioned, the desirability of balancing aid to those Hungarians who have stayed in their country with that already provided for those who have fled, and the probable efforts of other governments including the United States, it is suggested that the Government might make an additional contribution of eight hundred thousand dollars to provide for emergency relief in Hungary. This might best be done by making this sum available to the Canadian Red Cross Society, to be drawn on as needed to finance the provision of supplies for utilization in Hungary by the International Red Cross. In informing the Canadian Red Cross Society of this contribution it would be appropriate to suggest that to the extent practical and economical the money be used to provide supplies of Canadian origin.

In this latter connection there are several possibilities that come to mind. It appears that a most acute need is for foodstuffs; hence some of the money, up to perhaps some $300,000 could be used to provide butter from Government stocks. There is also the fact that the proposed trade agreement with Hungary would have provided for the supply of Canadian wheat to Hungary. The conclusion of that agreement has been suspended, but there is some indication that Hungarian authorities may, in any case, approach us concerning a possible wheat sale. The provision of Canadian wheat as emergency relief might usefully precede the sale of wheat if that should subsequently prove possible and desirable. Indeed a particularly favourable impression would probably be created, both in Hungary and elsewhere, if milled flour could be made available promptly to alleviate the acute food shortage. This might be done by arranging for the release of flour from commercial stocks in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, to be replaced in due course from Canadian sources.

Another possibility, which would have to be carefully studied in terms of the supply situation in Europe, would be the provision of powdered milk. There is no Government stock of this commodity, but it is believed that there are supplies available in commercial hands which might perhaps be suitably packaged for emergency distribution. Consideration might also be given to the provision of powdered eggs, which it is understood may become surplus in Canada within the next few weeks.

I therefore recommend that the Government make an additional offer of eight hundred thousand dollars, to be made available as required to the Canadian Red Cross Society, for relief in Hungary, subject to the condition that the Red Cross must be able effectively to supervise the distribution of relief and ensure that it is provided impartially to those in need. I recommend further that the use to be made of the money should be discussed with the Canadian Red Cross Society, in order to encourage the provision, to the extent practical and economical, of appropriate supplies of Canadian origin. Finally, I recommend that an immediate announcement be made of this offer and of the Government's intention to request the necessary funds from the forthcoming Special Session of Parliament.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES

Following for the Minister: I am sending you in my immediately following telegram† text of aide-mémoire left on Friday by Austrian Chargé d'Affaires, in which Austrian government, in pressing appeal, asks us to share heavy burden of taking care of high number Hungarian refugees still entering Austria.

Mr. Pickersgill (who returns Ottawa from Vancouver tonight and leaves for Europe probably next Saturday) has not yet replied to your letter on subject of November 9. You then recommended to him that we might adopt, in the case of the Hungarian refugees, a more liberal policy than would be applicable to a regular immigration operation, in view of the internal political, as well as international, implications. It has since appeared that our contribution on this question was not as generous as we first thought. Criticism is already being voiced in the press and among Canadians of Hungarian origin that our regulations regarding admittance of Hungarian refugees are not sufficiently liberal. For these reasons, it is suggested that you might raise again this matter with Mr. Pickersgill on an urgent basis. Following is text of telegram you might wish to send him directly from New York, if you agree.

"My department is sending you text of aide-mémoire in which Austrian government, in pressing appeal, asks that we continue with other friendly governments to share in taking care of high number of Hungarian refugees still entering Austria.

Austrian request adds further weight and urgency to proposal I made in my letter to you on this subject of November 9, that we might adopt in the case of the Hungarian refugees a more liberal policy than would be applicable to a regular immigration operation. Considering the unconditional offers made by numerous other countries, it appears that our contribution on this question has not been as generous as might be hoped. I also understand that criticism on this score is already being voiced in the Canadian press and among Canadians of Hungarian origin.

Again I need not emphasize the domestic and international political desirability of making it clear that Canada is taking an unselfish interest in the plight of the Hungarian refugees. I hope that you will be able to give this important matter your urgent consideration and that it will be possible to waive most of the non-political immigration requirements in this urgent and exceptional situation."[18]

THE SITUATION IN EASTERN EUROPE

The NATO countries were caught completely napping by the events in Hungary, and, of course, the Middle East diversions prevented us from concentrating our diplomatic resources on this problem. It would be disastrous if this were to be repeated and I am therefore advancing a few ideas which might be put forward when this question is next discussed in the NATO Council.

2. The dilemma for the Russians, of course, is that they have seriously endangered their policy of co-existence and the position of the Communist parties in Western Europe, in order to keep Hungary in the Soviet bloc, and to protect their strategic position. They might now very well wish to establish a national communist régime in Hungary which would, however, remain an integral part of the Soviet bloc, but it seems doubtful that they will be able to govern except by a military régime.

[18] On ne sait pas très bien si ce message a déjà été envoyé à Pickersgill.
It is not clear whether this message was ever sent to Pickersgill.

3. This is bound to have its effects on the other satellites, and in Poland and Yugoslavia. The brutal repression of Hungary is likely to discourage other revolts. In Poland it may have the effect of slowing down the too rapid evolution towards national communism, but will also add fuel to the anti-Russian, anti-communist fires.

4. It is difficult, therefore, to see how the Russians can simultaneously suppress Hungary and the satellites, and yet continue the Khrushchev policy towards Yugoslavia, and tolerate the evolution of Poland.

5. It is this dilemma which might precipitate another crisis, with all the implications for the West since either Soviet policy carries with it the seeds of further unrest. If there should be an outburst in Poland, it would certainly arouse the strongest of feelings in the West, possibly with considerable pressure "to do something". If it should happen in Czechoslovakia, with an open frontier on the West, then the pressure to help the Czechs might be overwhelming. Admittedly there seems little likelihood of an outbreak in the latter country, but it cannot be dismissed entirely.

6. We must be prepared then for two eventualities, either that violence should spread; or that the evolution towards national communism in Poland, Hungary, and possibly the other satellites continues. This requires an early clarification of the kind of positive, and above all joint, action the Western Powers can take to meet either possibility, since the only thing we can be sure about is that the situation will not remain static.

7. In the event of another outbreak of violence, as suggested in paragraph 5, we would presumably want to rule out military action, since this would mean world war, but there may be ways to bring non-military action to bear in addition to the UN.

8. In the event that violence does not spread, the best hope probably lies in encouraging "gradualism" in the evolution of Eastern Europe. As a start, now that jamming of foreign broadcasts has ceased in Poland, we might counsel the Polish people to exercise patience in order to avoid another Hungarian catastrophe. We are already taking steps here to make sure that the tone of our CBC-IS Polish broadcasts is not inflammatory.

9. This, of course, has another aim of not confirming Soviet fears and suspicions of ultimate Western aims in Eastern Europe. This is intimately connected with a new Western policy (and propaganda) which would try to re-assure the Russians on their security problem. In this connection, there are many variations on the theme of guaranteeing legitimate Soviet security interests in Eastern Europe, which could be discussed.

10. Ultimately our aim should be to help the Russians to see that the examples of Yugoslavia, Poland and Hungary prove that they can only combine the two aims of protecting their security and maintaining communist régimes by the use of brute force; and that the most they can hope for in the long run is neutrality for Eastern Europe along the lines of Yugoslavia. This, of course, should not be our proclaimed policy, but discreet encouragement of the Gomulka régime and the national communists would be a first step in the right direction. This must be done very carefully, however, and not at the risk of frightening the Russians into thinking we were trying to detach Poland from the Soviet bloc.

11. If it becomes clear that the Russians were prepared to permit evolution towards national communism to develop, then some of the specific steps we could eventually take to encourage this might be: to strengthen economic ties, emphasizing the switch to consumer goods and those aspects of the satellite economies which would add least to war potential; a gradual move towards multi-lateralism (a United Kingdom suggestion), emphasizing first of all links between Poland and Yugoslavia, etc, closer diplomatic contacts, more cultural contacts, and so on. It should be underlined that this is a long-term suggestion and is very much dependent on the course of Soviet policy.

12. These are very preliminary ideas, of course, and your own suggestions and comments would be most useful. The main thing, in our mind, is to regain the initiative in an area of immense importance to the West, and at least start serious consideration of a new Western policy. The Minister agrees with the general line of thinking advanced in this telegram.

13. For London, Washington, Paris, Bonn: I should appreciate your views. If the occasion arises you might use some of these ideas with local officials in order to ascertain the thinking of the government to which you are accredited.[19]

RELIEF FOR HUNGARY
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 7)

9. The Prime Minister, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, submitted a further report on relief for Hungary. The number of refugees had increased considerably. Also, it was now believed that effective relief operations could be carried on inside the country itself. In view of the powerful political arguments for increasing the scale of assistance and the urgent need, the Minister recommended that a further contribution of $800,000 be made to the Canadian Red Cross for emergency relief inside Hungary. To the extent that it was practical and economical, the money might be used for supplies of Canadian origin such as wheat, powdered milk, or powdered eggs, all of which would be useful.

For additional analysis of the impact of developments in Hungary and Eastern Europe on Soviet policy, see Documents 544 and 545.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Nov. 15, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 222-56)

10. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The contribution of $200,000 authorized so far was too small. Already pressure was developing to increase it. However, in making this increase for purposes inside Hungary, as well as outside, it was essential that the relief be handled by the Red Cross and not controlled by the present Hungarian government.

(b) In principle, it was a mistake to provide this relief. Either the revolt in Hungary would be so ruthlessly suppressed that it would be a long time before the people ever rose again, or else there would be continuous unrest and trouble. By contributing supplies was not Canada dampening down the Hungarian desire for freedom?

(c) Some pressure was likely to develop to establish refugee camps in Canada. Any such action would give rise to appalling problems. More value could be obtained, and the immediate needs of sufferers best met, by providing relief in Europe rather than by using the same money to bring refugees here. For this reason, a reasonably adequate contribution, announced quite soon, was desirable.

(d) Apart from the $200,000 already committed to the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, the increased funds should not be specifically earmarked. The vote should be broad enough, for instance, to cover any assessment the U.N. might make on its members for Hungarian refugee problems.

11. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed that a further $800,000 be made available for the relief of Hungarian refugees, and that Parliament be asked to approve the appropriation of $1 million for Hungarian relief in general terms.

IMMIGRATION; HUNGARIAN REFUGEES

1. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that, until a few days ago, his officials in Vienna had been able to keep up with the applications of Hungarians to come to Canada. Now, however, these requests were being made at such a rate that they could not be dealt with as promptly as the situation demanded. As of yesterday, 657 people had applied but only 128 visas had been granted and 21 refused. If further steps were not taken to speed up processing, the feeling would grow here that red tape was nullifying the plans announced to help these refugees. He proposed, therefore, that he be authorized to waive the usual form of medical examination and to use funds, which were available in his appropriations, to charter aircraft to bring Hungarian refugees to Canada.

On the first point, all European countries had cut out their normal medical requirements. If his suggestion were approved, only a minimum medical examination would be given in Europe and X-ray and certain other examinations would be done on arrival in Canada, possibly in co-operation with the Department of Veterans Affairs. If a few cases of illness were discovered they would have to be admitted to hospital. There would probably be controversies with local authorities as to who would look after these unfortunate people, but these would just have to be faced and settled.

As regards chartering aircraft, the Canadian Pacific Air Lines had indicated it would be willing to arrange flights at quite reasonable rates between Vienna and Vancouver over the North Pole. Landing the immigrants in Vancouver was desirable because there was an Hungarian group there who would be willing to help their former countrymen, and Vancouver had always complained that it never seemed to get enough new arrivals. He hoped, too, that chartering arrangements at similarly reasonable rates could be made with Trans-Canada Air Lines.

2. Mr. Pickersgill added that he had already relaxed the regulations to the fullest extent possible under the law. To do more to hasten the arrival of the refugees necessitated these further arrangements and they, in turn, involved the assistance of other departments.

3. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on proposals for speeding up the flow of Hungarian refugees to Canada and agreed,

(a) that the normal medical examination requirements abroad, including X-ray, be waived, and undertaken on the arrival of these immigrants in Canada; and,

(b) that aircraft be chartered to bring successful applicants to this country; the detailed arrangements to be made by the Minister in consultation with the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and of Transport.

HUNGARY

1. This afternoon Zakharov, Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs, handed to me Bulganin's reply dated today to Mr. St. Laurent's letter of November 13.[20] Neither Zakharov nor I made any comment on reply. Zakharov said that it was not repeat not intended to publish reply. However if Mr. St. Laurent publishes his letter, the Soviet government will publish theirs.

2. Following is an official translation of text. "Dear Mr. Prime Minister

I have received your letter of November 13. The contents of your letter and also of your recent statements and of speeches of Canadian officials about situation in Hungary show that the Canadian government seem to have one sided tendentious and unobjective information about developments in Hungary and about position of Soviet Union on this question.

3. I would like to note that revolutionary workers peasants government of Hungary have shown in their statements that reactionary forces inside Hungary with active support of certain circles outside tried to overturn peoples' democratic régime in the country and establish a Horthy fascist régime. The inner patriotic forces of Hungary came out in defence of peoples' democratic régime asking for help of Soviet troops stationed in Hungary under the Warsaw Treaty.

4. As concerning position of the Soviet government on question of relations of Soviet Union with Hungary this has been fully set forth in "Declaration of Soviet Government on

5. This question is fully within competence of Hungarian government. As far as we know government of the Hungarian Peoples' Republic has already positively solved this question and Hungarian government has formally informed Secretary General of UN about this.

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES; FREE PASSAGE TO CANADA
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE NOV. 23)

54. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out that Canada was the only country which had not offered free passage to Hungarian refugees who wished to emigrate from Europe. If the Federal government did not do this the Ontario government undoubtedly would. For this reason, and more particularly because these people were in most instances penniless, he recommended that assisted passage be made free, both for future cases and for those who had already arrived or were en route. Admittedly this would increase the number of problem cases which would have to be looked after in the future, but he hoped that the provinces would agree to accept this responsibility as their part in this humanitarian effort. Sufficient funds were available in his appropriations, but a supplementary estimate might be required by the end of the fiscal year.

Over 90,000 refugees had reached Austria and the rate of arrivals had not decreased. So far 1200 applications had been made to come to Canada. He had no idea of how many might eventually be settled here but it did appear that those interested were excellent types, most of whom could start work immediately.

55. Mr. Pickersgill added that acceptance of his proposal would give rise to another problem. The Jewish Immigrant Aid Society had asked if the government would consider rendering aid to the Jews threatened with persecution in Egypt. No trouble had occurred there yet but it was a possibility to be kept in mind.[21]

56. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The fact that passage was now being provided at varying rates was beginning to create difficulties. These might be overcome by treating as a debt for everyone only what amounted to tourist passage by sea, for which there was a precedent. There was no precedent, however, for completely free passage. On the other hand, this appeared to be the only just and humane thing to do and could be defended easily because of the unusual situation. In two or three months the offer of free passage could be withdrawn.

(b) Another reason for granting this further assistance was that facilities in Austria were being taxed to the limit and that country would be faced with a severe problem unless other countries did all they could to assist.

(c) It might be possible to induce the U.N. to request countries not receiving refugees to pay part of their transportation and settlement costs. It was doubtful if anything would come of this, however, as most nations with reasonably sized budgets were already helping directly.

57. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and agreed that free passage be offered to Hungarian refugees wishing to come to Canada and to those who had already arrived or were en route; an announcement to be made forthwith including a statement that the Minister was proceeding to Austria to ensure that everything was being done to move the refugees to Canada as quickly as possible.[22]

See Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 8, No. 12, p. 412.

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 9 which refers to the admission to Canada of Hungarian refugees.

I can assure you that during this emergency our officers are not applying too rigidly the health regulations now in effect. Instructions have already been issued to our officers in Vienna to waive the normal X-ray procedures, should they slow up the processing of applicants. As a matter of fact, in actual practice, refusals on medical grounds are now being limited to those with contagious diseases and to those who in their own interest should obviously not be moved.

It is inevitable under this drastic reduction of our medical examination standards, that some immigrants will require hospitalization on their arrival. It is hoped that other provinces will follow Ontario's example by making provision for treatment in such cases.

There are in fact no training requirements. Our officers are instructed to accept all immigrants who are willing and able to work, but we do try to advise prospective immigrants where in Canada their particular skills are most required and what conditions they are likely to encounter.

I agree that sponsored Hungarian refugees who have already received approval from this department but who lack exit visas, should be given special consideration if they appear along with other refugees before our immigration officials. Of course the main objective at present is to keep the flow maintained. Therefore our officials cannot be spared from their already very heavy duties to seek out those who may be in this position.

In order to facilitate the movement of Hungarians to Canada, we are providing free passage by air and sea on regular airline and ship service, and are arranging special chartered flights both to eastern and western Canada. Ocean shipping is being used to the fullest extent possible. Two hundred and fifty refugees are due in Quebec on December 8, and another four hundred on December 11th, and negotiations are under way for more space with other shipping companies.

Yours sincerely,
J.W. P[ICKERSGILL]

I. THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Further U.N. Resolutions on Hungary

EUROPEAN DIVISION: On November 21 the United Nations General Assembly adopted by an overwhelming majority three more resolutions on Hungary. A Cuban resolution, imputing genocide to the U.S.S.R. because of the deportations from Hungary and urging compliance with previous resolutions, was passed with 55 countries in favour (including Canada), 10 against (Soviet bloc and Yugoslavia) and 14 abstentions. An Indian resolution calling on Hungary to admit United Nations observers was adopted by 57 votes in favour, 8 against (Soviet bloc, except Poland) and 14 abstentions. Krishna Menon's statement on Hungary was the most constructive and helpful the Indian delegation has made, and the Soviet delegation was said to be surprised and angry about the Indian initiative. The Soviet bloc was isolated and split once more in the voting on a United States resolution concerning aid to Hungarian refugees, which was carried by 69 votes in favour (including Canada), only 3 against (Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Roumania) and 7 abstentions (Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Poland, Sweden, Sudan, Ukraine and Soviet Union).

Following the Secretary-General's report on November 30 that Hungary had still not complied with the Assembly's request for the admission of United Nations observers, the United States, British and French delegations co-operated (for the first time since the Suez action) in drafting a resolution recommending that the Secretary-General immediately dispatch his observers to the borders of Hungary. The resolution was introduced on December 3 under the sponsorship of 13 countries, and was carried on December 4 by a vote of 54 to 10 with 14 abstentions. Mr. Roch Pinard, heading the Canadian delegation in the absence of Mr. Pearson, spoke in support of the resolution and suggested that if the Hungarian government refused to co-operate, the United Nations should take stronger measures.[23]

The Hungarian government announced on December 3, after the latest U.N. initiative was under way, that it would be willing to have the Secretary-General visit Budapest "at a later date appropriate for both parties". Mr. Hammarskjöld then conferred with Imre Horvath, the Hungarian delegate to the United Nations, and has proposed December 16-18 as the dates for his visit to Hungary.

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES; ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES; REPORT ON ARRIVALS

60. Mr. Harris, as Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, said the Saskatchewan government had presented a plan for receiving and caring for Hungarian refugees in the province which might involve substantial federal expenditure, but which might be desirable to accept and use as a basis for negotiation with other provinces.

Saskatchewan proposed to establish and administer reception centres. The Federal government would be expected to pay $3 a day for each refugee for such time as they were in these centres. If there were any expenditures for social aid, the Federal government would reimburse the province accordingly. It was also proposed that the Federal government pay the transportation costs to these centres and from them to places of employment. As regards medical examinations and hospitalization, the province would take X-rays and give vaccinations at its expense; for the first six months the Federal treasury would pay hospital costs, for the next six they would be shared equally, and after that the province would bear the full cost. Premier Douglas had asked that this latter feature be changed so that the Federal government pay full costs for a year, after which the responsibility would be assumed by the province.

The only really serious item in this proposal might be hospitalization costs, as it appeared that it would be relatively easy to establish refugees in Saskatchewan where there was already a substantial Hungarian community and a shortage of farm labour.

61. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It might be helpful to re-open the federal reception centres used for immigrants shortly after the war. Some of these were being occupied now as the refugees arrived and it was desirable to get the provinces to cooperate as soon as possible, particularly as the question of hospitalization would probably arise immediately.

(b) The great merit of the Saskatchewan proposal was that, at the province's initiative, it established a provincial responsibility. After a year the welfare of these refugees would be quite clearly the concern of the province. However, it had to be recognized that unless similar agreements were made with other provinces, this principle might not be generally recognized.

62. Mr. Sinclair reported on the arrival of the first group in British Columbia, and the arrangements made to look after them. The whole of the Hungarian state school of forestry, including faculty and students, would soon be coming to the province. The University of British Columbia had agreed to help as much as it could with this group, and accommodation had been arranged by the Powell River Pulp and Paper Company. Jobs could probably be found for most of them in the summer although the older professors might present a problem. Most members of the Hungarian State Opera Company had also indicated they wished to come to Canada, preferably as a unit. The settlement and integration of its members would obviously be more difficult.

63. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and of Mr. Sinclair on the arrival of Hungarian refugees and agreed, in principle, that Mr. Harris might work out arrangements with the provinces for sharing the costs of their care and welfare along the lines suggested by the government of Saskatchewan.

I. THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Further U.N. Resolutions on Hungary

EUROPEAN DIVISION. The announcement on December 6 that the Hungarian Government was not prepared to receive Secretary-General Hammarskjöld on December 16, as agreed on December 4, aroused a strong U.S.A. protest in the General Assembly. On December 10, the United States introduced a new draft resolution, co-sponsored by 15 other countries, calling attention to the failure of the Soviet and Hungarian Governments to comply with the previous decisions of the General Assembly concerning the withdrawal of troops and related political matters.

India, together with Burma, Ceylon and Indonesia, introduced an alternative draft resolution, and later tabled a number of amendments to the 16-power resolution designed to delete the idea of condemnation and bring it closer to the Indian draft resolution whose terms were couched in a milder and more conciliatory tone on the grounds that co-operation from the U.S.S.R. would otherwise be impossible.

The debate on these resolutions and on an Austrian resolution introduced on December 11 continued until December 12. During this period the United States resolution acquired four new sponsors, and a fifth paragraph was added to the operative part of this 20-power draft to take into account the Austrian proposal that "the Secretary-General take any initiative that he deems helpful in relation to the Hungarian problem in conformity with the principle of the charter and the resolution of the General Assembly." Austria announced that it would not press its resolution if the 20-power resolution was adopted.

In the vote on December 12, the Asian amendments were rejected, the Austrian amendment accepted, and the 20-power resolution as a whole was adopted by a vote of 55, in favour (including Canada), 8 against (Soviet Bloc with Hungary absent) and 13 abstentions (the Arab States, Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Yugoslavia and Finland). In view of this vote, India announced that the 4-power draft would be withdrawn.

On December 13, Hungary submitted a letter to the Secretary-General announcing formally that December 16 was not an appropriate date for his visit to Budapest, but that steps might be taken towards reaching an agreement "at a later date".

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES; REPORT BY MINISTER OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

27. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reported on his visit to Austria and other countries in Europe and on the steps taken to move Hungarian refugees to Canada. His latest information was that 135,000 refugees had entered Austria and 64,000 had departed, leaving about 70,000 to be cared for, or the same residual situation that existed two weeks earlier. Except for the United States, few countries were doing anything at the moment to relieve this problem in Austria. Most other European countries had quotas which they had already filled.

Canada was committed to take up to 10,000 refugees directly, who would enter before the end of January. In addition, the Netherlands had agreed to provide a staging arrangement for 2,000 who would start arriving after March 1st. The Netherlands authorities had agreed to meet the basic needs of these people in the meantime, while his department would provide such amenities as were necessary. He had also arranged with the French to permit 3,000 of those in France to come to Canada, provided France agreed to admit 3,000 more from Austria. The situation in the camps in France was most unsatisfactory, largely because the refugees had been led to regard France as a communist country. His officers in going about the camps in France were doing their best to quieten fears and improve morale. In the United Kingdom he had suggested that Canada might grant visas after April 1st next to 5,000 more refugees presently in camps there if the U.K. would make arrangements similar to those made by Holland and France.

The situation in Austria was almost desperate. Before the Hungarian outburst there had been 130,000 people in refugee camps for eleven years. In two months this figure had doubled and more would continue to come as long as chaos reigned. Whether the Russians were deliberately letting people out to create trouble was uncertain but he did know that Hungarian officials were helping their countrymen across the border. Most of those who had come were healthy men, under the age of thirty-five, many of them single, and nearly all skilled in one trade or another. Once they learned English or French they would be eminently employable.

As far as reception arrangements in Canada were concerned, the situation in Ontario had not turned out to be as satisfactory as earlier indications might suggest. Except for maintaining a centre in Toronto, the Ontario government had done virtually nothing. He proposed in a few days to find out exactly what the province intended to do in the future and to make the best arrangements he could. In other provinces arrangements appeared to be as good as could be expected. The most desirable situation would be to have agreements, like the one made with Saskatchewan, with all provinces where the bulk of the refugees were likely to go.

Specifically, he now requested authority to admit in February 2,000 more refugees now in Austria, to admit a further 1,000 in January and February in aircraft chartered from the Maritime Central Airways, and to arrange for the entry beginning April 1st of 5,000 refugees at present in the United Kingdom as well as the 2,000 from Holland and 3,000 from France.

28. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There would be very little difficulty in placing arrivals leaving Europe after April 1st. As at present they would be sent to the areas where they were wanted and where employment opportunities were best. Up to date it had been thought better not to use the services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to place the refugees in work because of the danger of interfering with normal employment of Canadians, but that avenue of approach was open if it were needed. Practically all coming were urban dwellers so there would not be much hope of directing many to farms to relieve the labour shortage. However, instructions had been given to send forward immediately any who did have farm experience.

(b) On the whole, the university people would be integrated and taken care of very well. In addition to the school of forestry from Sopron going to British Columbia, other faculty members and students would be brought in and offers of co-operation had been received from four Canadian universities. The rumours about the opera company coming to Canada were a myth.

(c) Immigration from western Europe would increase considerably next year, particularly from the United Kingdom. The number of enquiries in the past few weeks at offices in the U.K. had increased greatly and while many persons might eventually decide not to emigrate, most of those who did would be able and willing to pay for their own transportation. The main reason for this renewed interest was the course events had taken in the last few months.

(d) Some municipalities, particularly in Ontario, were worried over the possibility of having to care for any refugees who might become ill or unemployed. The Minister should reassure them by announcing that the Federal government would assume basic maintenance costs, if any, for the first year of residence in Canada.

(e) Refugees who wished to pay their own costs of transportation were free to do so and those who wished preferred treatment must pay too. All those who had borrowed before the recent change in policy would have their loans cancelled.

29. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on the Hungarian refugee situation and agreed,

(a) that a further 2,000 refugees now in Austria be admitted during February;

(b) that aircraft chartering arrangements be suspended except for the contract with Maritime Central Airways, which would continue in January and February and provide transport for the admission of an additional 1,000 refugees from Austria; and,

(c) that 5,000 refugees now in the United Kingdom and 3,000 in France be admitted starting from April 1st, 1957, as well as 2,000 in Holland from March 1st, 1957.

HUNGARY

We understand from the USA delegation that they are attempting to dissuade the Cuban delegation from proposing the expulsion of the Hungarian delegate from the First Committee by interesting them instead in a resolution to be introduced in plenary the effect of which would be to appoint an investigating committee of governments. This move would come when the Secretary-General made his report, probably early next week, announcing the break-up of the three man observation committee. The USA proposal would be intended in part to keep the Hungarian question before the Assembly, in part to forestall wilder moves (such as a mooted resolution to impose sanctions on the USSR), and in part to relieve the Secretary-General of some of the more embarrassing aspects of the task imposed on him by the Assembly. The USA seems to have decided, at least for the present, not to pursue the plan to hear Anne Kethly in the First Committee. As an alternative they think this new committee might hear her and probably other Hungarians.

2. We have now heard from the UK delegation that they have received new instructions which would permit them to introduce a resolution starting from the USA base but going on to name an investigating, or watch-dog committee, from among five smaller countries with missions in Budapest. The individuals would actually be members of the diplomatic missions of those countries in Hungary.

3. My reaction, which I have not yet given to the UK, is that this is not a very wise move. The Soviet bloc is bound to vote against such a resolution, and the Hungarians would probably claim it was an infringement of their sovereignty, in which case the members of the committee in Budapest would be placed in a very invidious position.

4. I would be grateful for your comments. My inclination is to try to dissuade the UK, but to support the USA move.

HUNGARY

In view of the obvious determination of the Western Powers not to use force either to aid the Hungarian rebels, or to enforce UN decisions, there are, it seems to me, only three possible courses of action open to us:

(a) We can go on passing resolutions in the UN (with ever-decreasing majorities), which we know will not be accepted by the Russians and Hungarians, the aim of which will be presumably to continue to focus public opinion on Soviet misdeeds in Hungary;

(b) We can leave the Russians to try to work out some kind of modus vivendi with the Hungarians; or

(c) We can try to facilitate the second course or, better still, try to find a formula by which the Russians will actually leave Hungary.

2. The latter course would require an overall settlement in Central and Eastern Europe and presumably would only be acceptable to the Russians if they became convinced that there was no long-term political and economic solution to the problem of Soviet subjugation of Eastern Europe, and if at the same time they were offered something substantial in return for their withdrawal, such as for example the withdrawal of USA and Canadian forces from Western Germany. This, however, seems hardly likely to appeal to either the Russians or the Americans at this stage, and in any case is hardly feasible if Washington is determined to approach questions such as that of the Middle East primarily on the basis of an overt struggle against Soviet aggression, and if Moscow faced with its very difficult problems in the satellites is determined not to compromise where it still holds the upper hand.

3. The difficulty with the first course is that public opinion is not likely to be aroused much longer by repeated UN resolutions which are obviously not enforceable. The West can probably better bring home to the Russians their reaction to the events in Hungary by such action as a scaling down of cultural exchanges, and so on. I think it is important that the Russians continue to be aware that they cannot embark on repressive actions in any part of the world and still gain the benefits of their policy of peaceful coexistence. But we have just about exhausted the possibilities of the UN in this connection.

4. Condemnatory, but futile resolutions, may, however, goad the Russians into taking harsher action in Hungary. The logical conclusion the Russians may eventually reach, if they are unable to establish any kind of native communist, or even semi-communist, régime in Hungary, is that they must set up an outright military government and possibly extend this to some other satellites as well. This would then be the logical time for a strong move in the Assembly, which would be that much stronger if it were not preceded by a number of inconsequential resolutions at regular intervals which had diluted its moral effect.

5. I think we must come reluctantly to the conclusion that it would be best for the Hungarians, and for the West, if the Hungarians were to come to whatever compromise they can arrange with the Russians. If Kadar is unable to make his strictly "stalinist" — type régime work nor to secure support from non-stalinist or non-communist elements, then the Russians may have to take over with a blatantly Soviet military government which would surely be much worse for the Hungarians. The reaction this would produce in the other satellites might also necessitate an increase in the Soviet military establishment elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the net result being the bringing of Soviet troops in large numbers and in an ugly mood to the borders of the West. The increasing tension, the greater danger of incidents, and the increased difficulty in reaching a solution with the Russians of the problems of Central and Eastern Europe need hardly be underlined.

6. Although it may sound rather cynical I think we must conclude that the struggle for Hungary may well be over, at least temporarily, in which case our main political preoccupation ought to be to preserve the gains made by the Poles. This would certainly not be easy if the Russians, who can hardly be in a very confident mood right now in view of the political and economic problems they face, were to decide that relations with the Western world had degenerated to such an extent that they could take no chances inside their bloc.

7. All this may, of course, happen no matter what the Assembly does, but I am now inclined to think that unless we can hit on something effective, we would do well to avoid further action intended to score propaganda victories, although naturally some measures in the UN are going to be required. Of those suggested, the move to establish an investigative committee seems the most acceptable and most effective.

8. I recognize the political unpalatibility of these conclusions but I think, nevertheless, in spite of the positions we have to take publicly, that we should clearly analyze developments in Hungary and Eastern Europe, and try to balance the necessity of giving all possible moral support to the Hungarians against the political realities and the desirability of avoiding an outright Soviet military role in the satellites. This might in the long run lead to the final downfall of the Soviet system, but in the short run it would mean added misery for the peoples of Eastern Europe, and incalculably greater risks of war.

9. Holmes and I entirely agree with this telegram which has been prepared by Ford. I should be grateful for your comments.

Enclosed is the latest Immigration Operational Directive† dated December 21 which you may find interesting. It revises directives which hitherto have been in use in dealing with Hungarian refugees.

2. It is evident from this that there has been a radical change in our immigration procedures for Hungarian refugees. For example, more complete medical examinations are now obligatory. In Austria only, where hitherto the medical examination has been somewhat superficial, x-rays may be waived where facilities do not exist, but elsewhere complete medical examination including x-rays and vaccination where necessary are required. Furthermore until now there has been no security screening in Austria; an oral interview is now to be given. In all other countries where previously an oral interview took place, the normal complete security check will go into effect. This is not very clearly expressed in paragraph 7 of the directive and it is understood that the question of security screening is still under review.

3. Further tightening may be seen in the instruction that the Visa Office in Vienna is to deal with sponsored cases only, within the liberalized meaning of the term "sponsor", which means any relative or friend. Processing teams in the refugee camps in Austria however will deal with all applicants within the limits set by transportation but will give priority to farm workers, students and other particularly desirable applicants. In other Western European countries excluding The Netherlands, France and the United Kingdom where special arrangements have been made, the processing of Hungarian refugees is to be limited to sponsored cases. In all other countries, e.g. Yugoslavia, normal immigration procedures are to be followed and it will therefore be impossible for Hungarian refugees now in Yugoslavia to qualify for immigration to Canada unless they have close relatives here.

4. The net effect of this is to retard the flow of refugees into Canada during the winter months. Immigration officers abroad are being asked not to publicize this slowing down of the movement. We understand that the firm commitments made for the months of January and February, together with the 4,500 refugees who had arrived by December 31, will bring the total number of arrivals to 15,000 by March 1. No estimate has yet been made of arrivals in March but by the end of that month the movement of 10,000 refugees from The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and France for which special arrangements have already been completed will begin. On the completion of that movement therefore the total number of refugees who will have arrived in Canada should be in excess of 23,000.

JULES LÉGER

This makes depressing reading in the light of the 70,000 odd refugees left in Austria. I am wondering if a further effort shouldn't be made to bring more to Canada.[24]

There has been no suggestion here that Canada would be a member of the proposed Assembly Committee. Although final agreement had not been reached the names being mentioned yesterday were Australia, Denmark, Burma, a Latin American country (Brazil, Cuba or Peru) and Tunisia. The Minister has agreed that you may co-sponsor the USA draft resolution.[25] Like you, we regard the resolution as providing a useful opportunity for tidying up a number of loose ends, as suggested in the Secretary-General's report of January 5. For one thing, it will presumably take the place of the Assembly observers who have not yet been sent to Austria to take evidence from refugees. For reasons given in your telegram 55, with which we are in general agreement, we would also hope that the present resolution would be the Assembly's last of the series unless the situation in Hungary changes drastically. A number of wavering delegations might be persuaded to vote for the resolution on this basis, but whether you can do any missionary work in this sense will, of course, depend on the attitude of the other co-sponsors.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE NEW UNITED NATIONS HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES, MR. AUGUSTE LINDT

We had a meeting with the UNHCR last week and during the discussion Mr. Lindt mentioned the following matters which are weighing on his mind:

I. Hungarian Refugees

Mr. Lindt gave the figure of approximately 150,000 who have fled to Austria. (The latest figures as of January 3 which we have are 158,183 to Austria and about 2,300 to Yugoslavia.) The High Commissioner said the reason for the great surge over the Austro-Hungarian border was that the mines had been cleared from that border but not from other Hungarian borders. He also said that at the beginning of the exodus his Office roughly estimated that the majority of the first 30 to 40,000 refugees would return when conditions in Hungary became less disturbed. Then the picture changed and those coming out after the first week or so were coming out permanently. He explained this change of heart among the Hungarian refugees by saying that for years prior to the Second World War Hungary was a country of emigration; but for 16 years the normal flow of emigrants had been bottled up; the refugees wanted to start a new life in another continent. They were not interested in going to South America which had offered refuge to a small number of them because apparently they thought that South America had few opportunities for their work skills or professions. Also most of the Hungarian refugees wanted to get out of Europe.

With regard to the number of refugees, Mr. Lindt noted that anything could happen in the near future — Hungarians might continue to come out at the present rate of about 1,000 a day or, if conditions in Hungary became brutal again, there could be a quick surge of many thousands in a few days and these refugees, he said, would be mainly the "freedom fighters".

The Austrians have done a splendid job in this emergency; it has cost them at least $6,000,000 and they cannot afford such a drain on their economy. He therefore stressed the urgent need for additional financial assistance.

The High Commissioner mentioned some of his fears —

(a) The siphoning off of Hungarian refugees from Austria is slowing down considerably; there are over 70,000 of them still in Austria and they are becoming slightly restive; should there be another great flight out of Hungary, the living conditions in Austrian camps would become serious;

(b) The psychological hazard, even given no further great flight from Hungary, of this slowing down of movement out of Austria is troubling him. The United States is still processing refugees in the expectation that their allowed total will be increased; however, they can give no definite guarantee to any more since the 21,500 (their present limit) have already been chosen. Mr. Lindt was pleased that Canada has worked out the staging process which relieves to some extent the congestion in Austria. As you know, Canada has agreed to take 5,000 refugees who have been moved temporarily to the U.K., 3,000 from France and 2,000 from the Netherlands. But all Mr. Lindt's conversation was directed towards getting us to take more Hungarian refugees out of Europe now and not wait until the spring. He was interested in learning of Mr. Michael Barkway's articles in The Financial Post[26] which urged Canada to bring in the refugees now, give them language training, and try to Canadianize them during the winter and have them part way ready to strike out for themselves in the spring. Mr. Lindt mentioned that Citizenship and Immigration admitted in his discussions with them that reception centres, mostly unused army barracks, were available in Canada to receive refugees this winter. It was pointed out to him that for a number of years the Government has tried to space its immigration so as to minimize the number of people arriving in the winter. It was obvious however that Mr. Lindt felt there might be a greater modification of this policy in the Hungarian emergency.

II. Hungarian Refugees in Yugoslavia

Of the 2,300 of these, a small number, about 126, want to come to Canada. The High Commissioner urged that we take this small group as quickly as possible. He said if we could take them there would be great political advantage to us because none of this group, up to now, was getting any offers. He mentioned that the Yugoslavs would be happy to let them come since investigations have shown that the refugees in this group may be a political embarrassment to Yugoslavia since they are anti-communists and could not easily be assimilated in Yugoslavia. Our mission in Belgrade has told us that these "forgotten" Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia fear they will be forced back to Hungary. In a memorandum which went to you on January 7 you were advised of the recent Immigration directive, dated December 21 which tightens up the whole movement of Hungarian refugees to Canada, and in fact makes it impossible for any more to be accepted unless they have sponsors in Canada. However even before December 21 there seemed to be almost insuperable difficulties in the way of taking this small group of Hungarian refugees now in Yugoslavia.

III. Long-term Refugees

This problem is worrying Mr. Lindt very much. He said it was heartless the way these long-term refugees were being overlooked. There are approximately 225,000 of them in Europe and of this number 70,000 are "hard core" cases still in refugee camps. These long-term refugees now saw what was being done for the Hungarians after two or three months and resented very much the double standard being followed — the strict immigration requirements being applied to them, and the relaxed immigration regulations being applied to the Hungarians. Mr. Lindt said his Office estimated that if the relaxed regulations were applied to the long-term group 50% of them could meet the standard. On humanitarian grounds alone this should be done. He then went on to argue that the calibre of Hungarian refugees was so high that surely the receiving countries when taking the Hungarians could receive in addition about 10% of the long-term ones, that is 100 "hard core" refugees to 1,000 Hungarians. This, Mr. Lindt thought, would produce a fair cross section of population, but as things were working out now, the receiving countries were getting all first-class immigrants since the Hungarians were either university-trained or skilled workmen. Mr. Lindt was obviously very troubled by the problem of the long-term refugees and sympathized with the bitterness which is creeping over this tragic group.

I understand that you intend discussing this question of refugees with your colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would you like us to follow up your conversation with a letter to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?[27] It seems to us that there are at least three points which require some clarification and perhaps a little pressure:

(a) The problem of the 126 or so Hungarians in Yugoslavia. They were there before the more stringent Citizenship and Immigration directive of December 21. The political reasons for taking this small group are quite strong.

(b) The problem of our winter slow down in receiving Hungarians. Fewer shipping facilities will be available in the spring because normal travelling is greater then. Do you think that the Hungarian emergency requires further modification of Canadian policy to hold back immigration in the winter months?

(c) Could we not take a percentage of the "hard core" refugees? You may know that a year or so ago the Department of Citizenship and Immigration revised the way in which it keeps immigration statistics and so it is impossible to find out how many of these people we admit, but we think that in the last few years we have not been of much help to the High Commissioner in solving this heavy and tragic problem.

My dear Colleague,

As you are aware, I have made a submission† to the Treasury Board concerning an item which I believe should be included in the proposed special supplementary estimate to provide funds for urgent expenditures arising from the Hungarian tragedy. My submission was for an item of $1,250,000 "for assistance for the victims of the recent tragic events in Hungary". Of this total $250,000 was proposed to meet certain expenses for relief of refugees awaiting immigration to Canada in transmit camps in the Netherlands; the main figure of $1,000,000 was to assist the various international agencies engaged in the provision of relief either within Hungary or for refugees who have not been accepted anywhere for settlement.

The figure of $250,000 was tentative, as the arrangements for the staging camps were still being worked out. I now understand that the Citizenship Branch proposes to meet a part of the costs involved, and that the figure of $250,000 in my submission can be correspondingly reduced. A letter covering this matter is going forward to the Secretary of the Treasury Board.

I am writing to you to urge the approval of the main figure of $1,000,000 for assistance through international channels. My submission to the Board explains how the scale of the tragedy and of the need for emergency relief has increased since the Government recommended the earlier vote of $1,000,000 for this purpose. I do not believe that there can be any question of the need of these various agencies for further substantial assistance, and the only real question is where it should come from.

[27] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes. L.B. P[earson]

Popular feeling about the Hungarian tragedy runs very strong in western Europe, and relief assistance from private sources in many of the countries concerned has been on a large scale. We have had a fairly recent report from Sweden, for example, that their voluntary subscription fund had reached $4,000,000 — a large amount for such a small country. The fund established by the Lord Mayor of London, which it is true received some contributions from outside the city itself, passed £500,000 a month ago. There has been a series of reports indicating a similar high level of voluntary contributions from other western European countries. It is true that governmental assistance, at least in money, has been on a lesser scale in Europe, but the fact remains that per capita contributions from all sources has for those countries been high.

In North America, in contrast, contributions from the public have been disappointing. On January 7 private subscriptions in Canada to the Red Cross Fund (which receives the contributions to the great majority of the various individual fund-raising organizations) had totalled $367,000); in addition there had been received $250,000 from the Federal Government and from the provincial governments of Alberta, Ontario and Saskatchewan the amounts of $7,000, $25,000 and $2,000 respectively. Although I have no precise figures, I understand that private contributions in the United States have been even more disappointing. This is particularly distressing in the light of North America's reputation for humanitarian generosity and for leadership in the opposition to the Communist dictatorship responsible for the Hungarian disaster. No doubt with these considerations in mind the United States Government has announced an emergency assistance programme of $20 million; of this $5 million has already been contributed in the form of cash grants to the various international agencies concerned. It has not yet been determined what form the remainder of the $20 million programme will take, but we understand it will be primarily for assistance to refugees and that officials are now, as a separate operation, considering what type of aid programme will be required for the provision of relief within Hungary.

In these circumstances I do feel that the Government should take whatever steps are necessary to ensure an adequate level of assistance from this country. Perhaps this should be done by giving a stronger lead to the public than has so far been provided, so that private contributions might be increased; I would welcome such a course. But the results of such action would not be fully effective for weeks or months; the need is urgent, and is known to the governments and peoples concerned to be so. I therefore feel strongly that for political reasons we should take action which will be effective rapidly, and it seems to me that this can be done only by announcing an adequate further contribution of money.

There is, of course, no special magic in the figure of $1,000,000. I have no particular plan for how best to divide such a sum. But in the circumstances, given our contribution of $1,000,000 earlier and the fact that the problem has not merely doubled but has increased three or fourfold since then, I do not expect that anything less would be regarded, either in Canada or abroad, as adequate.

You may consider that this matter should be discussed in Cabinet before a decision is taken by the Treasury Board. If so, I regret that I will not be present next week and would hope that my submission would be sympathetically examined in the light of the considerations I have outlined.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

HUNGARIAN RELIEF

1. The Treasury Board today considered a recommendation from this department that a further sum of $1,000,000 for Hungarian relief through international channels be provided in a special supplementary estimate which may shortly be submitted.

2. The Board was unable to reach a decision, considering that the recommendation was not adequately supported by figures of the assistance provided by other western countries. Accordingly the matter will be decided by Cabinet on Tuesday morning by which time we have undertaken to provide all available information on assistance from other western countries.

3. Please send in time for the meeting whatever information you can concerning assistance from western countries. We have in mind assistance both from governments and from voluntary or non-governmental contributions, since the level of non-governmental assistance from European countries has been far higher relatively than in North America, and this difference may be relevant. We recognize that time may not permit a complete report, but please send what you can.

HUNGARIAN RELIEF

As you may recall, the Special Session of Parliament voted $1 million as a Canadian contribution for Hungarian relief. Sometime ago one half of this sum was divided evenly between the Canadian Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the understanding that the money would be used for relief either in Hungary or for Hungarians who had fled their country, on condition that it should be provided impartially on the basis of need and used under effective international supervision to ensure that this condition is fulfilled. (This vote was not intended to be used for the expense of transporting Hungarian refugees to Canada.) Last week the Treasury Board approved release of the remaining $500,000 to the Canadian Red Cross ($100,000) and to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees ($400,000).

In making available this final $500,000, we proposed that the Canadian contribution might be used most effectively if it were given to the United Nations Secretary-General who is in a better position than we, despite our careful sifting, to determine which of the deserving appeals from the Austrian Government, the Red Cross, the United Nations High Commissioner, and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, for example, is most urgent at present. However, some Ministers indicated a preference for disbursing this money through the High Commissioner for Refugees since this ensured that none of the funds would be spent within Hungary itself, and this course was accepted.

It has been generally understood for some time that the sum voted as a Canadian contribution would undoubtedly have to be augmented when the complex relief problem could be more clearly appreciated, if Canada is to provide more than token support for the international co-operative effort to assist the 160,000 Hungarian refugees in their attempts to seek freedom. Thus, an item is included in the Supplementary Estimates which are to go before Parliament in the next few days to provide a further $1 million for this purpose.

This second million dollars, however, will probably be expended in a somewhat different manner. The Cabinet has agreed that the costs incurred in the Netherlands staging camp where Hungarians destined for Canada are to await their movement across the Atlantic should be met from this sum. These costs will probably amount to $250 - 300 thousand and will be administered by the Department of Immigration.

The remainder, I suggest once more, might be made available to the Secretary-General in order that maximum flexibility and control can be ensured in the utilization of Canadian relief resources. While the point may not be of enough significance to stress strongly, I do think that it would be most feasible for us to contribute through the Secretary-General and, if it is considered desirable, to make our assistance conditional as we see fit. Thus, if it is not considered appropriate to permit further assistance to be given to the citizens of Hungary who are still within their own country, this stipulation can be made although I do not think that such an arrangement need be made unless the Ministers suggest it should.

I would recommend therefore that we should seek the agreement of the other Departments concerned to the release of the $1 million to be requested of Parliament in the next few days as follows:

(a) to provide for the expenditures of the Department of Immigration for the staging camps in the Netherlands (on the understanding that this will require about $250 - 300 thousand)

(b) to place the remainder at the disposition of the Secretary-General of the United Nations so that the most efficient use may be made of the funds in meeting such urgent requirements as he is aware of (with the understanding, if it is so desired, that a stipulation be made preventing any expenditure of these funds in Hungary, and requesting some assistance be given to the Austrian Government if any explicit recommendation to this effect is felt necessary).

I enclose letters to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Immigration, which you might sign if you agree. In these letters, I have provided additional details they have requested regarding the extent of assistance provided by other Western countries. I have concluded by indicating the nature of the problem faced by the Austrian authorities, and by recommending as in this memorandum, that Canadian aid can most usefully be distributed through the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

My dear Colleague:

As you will recall it was agreed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs before he left for New York that an item for $1 million be placed in the forthcoming supplementary estimates for 1956-57 to be presented to Parliament within the next few days. It was agreed further that before any expenditure from this sum would be permitted that agreement would be sought among the three Departments concerned on the most feasible method of allocating this money to the various international agencies and governments who are concerned with the problem of Hungarian relief.

You will recall also that in discussing earlier the disposition of the remaining $500,000 from the vote made during the Special Session of Parliament the Department of External Affairs agreed to conduct a further assessment of the manner in which other Western nations are continuing to assist in the very great task which must be faced and solved by international co-operation if the more than 160,000 Hungarians who have left their country are to be cared for satisfactorily. To this end I am reporting on a few of the more recent comments we have had on the extent to which other friendly nations have committed themselves.

You may be especially interested to learn of the latest aid provided by the United States. The initial government authorization of $20 million has been allocated among the various organizations which are operating in this international task. This sum has been supplemented of course by money provided previously for such schemes as the United States Escapes Programme, which assists refugees fleeing satellite nations, and the International Committee for European Migration which has received a special grant within recent weeks. The Department of Defence is expected to spend a total of $12 million before its "Operation Safehaven" is completed, which is destined to move 15,000 refugees to the United States. To this public assistance must be added private contributions which now have reached about $10 million; thus the total assistance provided by the United States will probably exceed $42 million (by far) in addition to funds previously destined for relief work. The final cost to the United States has not yet been suggested and authorities predict that expenditures on relief will continue for some time.

From Western Europe, several comments have been received in the past few days which show this assistance for Hungarian refugees in this part of the world continues to be forthcoming. In France about $6 million has thus far been set aside for Hungarian relief. Most of this money is intended for use outside the country and much of it has been collected privately. In Norway some $3.5 million has been collected, most of it in private donations. The Danish Red Cross reported $1 million for relief by the beginning of December and at the same time Finland had provided about $.75 million. In Sweden voluntary contributions reached about $2.5 million by mid-December. In most of these areas government contributions have not compared with private collections largely because the governments concerned have devoted substantial and often incalculable amounts for the financing of internal reception arrangements for refugees.

The situation in Austria is at the other extreme, of course, since the amounts expended internally far exceed requirements abroad. By the end of December, we have been informed by the Austrian authorities, relief expenditures had reached $8 million and these had been offset by external grants only to the extent of $1 million. Since than the United States has provided an additional $2 million. Moreover, the serious situation which exists can hardly be expected to improve in the coming months if large numbers of the refugees remain in Austria. The latest available figures place the number of Hungarians in Austria at 70,000. This number is increasing by about 600 - 800 a day. Almost no refugees are leaving Austria now, although 90,000 have thus far been relocated in other countries. During the current year if 80,000 refugees are to be cared for in Austria the Austrian government has estimated that some $130 million would be required. Of this amount $96 million would be used in the construction of lodging facilities. It is apparent, therefore, that the Austrian government, if it is to provide even a minimum amount of assistance, will continue to require large expenditures for those refugees remaining within Austrian borders for even a short time.

In addition to the initial problem of providing assistance for Hungarian relief, the Austrian authorities and the Secretary-General of the United Nations have both indicated that the aid provided must be as flexible as possible. Previous contributions specifically made for care of orphans or for immigration assistance to particular nations and commodity gifts have been useful but not necessarily of maximum value. It would seem that in addition to an increased volume of assistance, there is a need for greater co-ordination of relief so that a comprehensive programme can be carried out.

Therefore, I would recommend that we might arrange for the $1 million to be requested of Parliament to be disbursed as follows:

(a) to meet the expenses of the Department of Immigration for clothing, medical expenses and language training of refugees in the staging camps in the Netherlands, which it is estimated will reach about $250 - 300 thousand.

(b) the remainder to be placed at the disposal of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, within whatever specific terms we may wish to prescribe, in order to make the most effective Canadian contribution possible.

Yours sincerely,

PAUL MARTIN

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1957-58; FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (2) 1956-57; HUNGARIAN RELIEF
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JAN. 14)

30. The Minister of Finance submitted the main estimates for 1957-58 and further supplementary estimates (2) for 1956-57. The main estimates totalled $4,827,600,056, an increase of approximately $171 million over 1956-57.

The supplementaries contained items for freight assistance on western feed grains ($2 million), transportation and other assistance for Hungarian refugees coming to Canada ($9 million), further Hungarian relief ($1 million), grants to municipalities ($2,024,000), grants to universities ($7,986,000), immigration medical services ($225,000), construction of a P.E.I. ferry ($600,000), veterans hospital at Deer Lodge ($435,000), and a loan to finance the clearing of the Suez Canal ($1 million), a total of $24,270,000.

In the matter of further Hungarian relief, the Minister recalled that, at the previous meeting, it had been decided to include the item subject to revision when further information was available. What information had now been received was not too satisfactory. It appeared that the Austrian government estimated that it would cost about $130 million to look after the refugees in that country for one year, of which some $96 million would be capital outlay for new buildings and rehabilitation of existing barracks and camps and about $35 million for maintenance of refugees. The situation seemed complex and unorganized as yet. He felt $96 million on buildings was a large amount to spend when this refugee movement would likely be over in a year. It also seemed that disposal of the original $1 million, less some $200,000 needed for refugees in Holland, would be left with the Secretary General of the United Nations. It had been originally considered that the relief amounts were to be handled by the High Commissioner for Refugees in Austria. This way there would be some kind of sensible relationship of Canadian contributions to other ones. It did not seem desirable to embark on a programme which could perpetuate the relief situation in Austria and Canada's contribution should be in bringing refugees to Canada. Total contemplated Canadian expenditures in assisting Hungarians, amounting to some $15 million, seemed far out of proportion to what, for instance, the United States was doing.

31. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported that it had now been ascertained that U.S. expenditures on aid to Hungarians were about $42 million. Other approximate figures were — France $6 million, Norway $3.5 million, Denmark $1 million, Finland $0.75 million, and Sweden $2.5 million. Some of these were private contributions. Up to the end of December, expenditures for relief in Austria had been $8 million. A large number of refugees, some 70,000 were still in that country and were being added to at the rate of 600-700 a day. If 80,000 were to be looked after, the suggested total of $130 million might well be required. Large expenditures would undoubtedly be needed but there was still little precise information.

32. During the discussion it was suggested that it would be better to wait for a time to see how matters would turn out. If necessary, provision could be made for more assistance in the further supplementary estimates in March; meanwhile, costs of assisting refugees coming to Canada could come out of the special Immigration Branch votes, including the amount that had been planned for assistance to those in Holland and included in the relief figure.

33. The Cabinet approved the main estimates for 1957-58, as submitted by the Minister of Finance and the further supplementary estimates (2) for 1956-57, after deletion of an item of $1 million (vote 540) for Hungarian relief, and agreed that the Governor General be asked to recommend them to the House of Commons, in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act.

(PREVIOUS REFERENCE DEC. 19, 1956)

34. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration recalled that no commitment had been made to bring to Canada Hungarian refugees from Austria during March. It was now considered that it would be relatively easy to handle a further 2,000 during that month and these could be taken in just as soon as their papers were processed and transportation found. It seemed desirable to keep the "refugee pipeline" full. After April, those in Canada would soon be absorbed in the country. It was desirable not to keep the refugees together any longer than necessary.

35. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and agreed that a further 2,000 Hungarian refugees from Austria be admitted to Canada during March.

WESTERN ECONOMIC AID TO HUNGARY

We were interested to learn that the French and Italian governments have been approached about the possibility of providing economic aid to Hungary. This confirms press and radio reports that the Kadar régime is faced with a desperate economic situation and is willing to accept economic assistance from the West.

2. While for humanitarian reasons it is necessary that food and clothing be provided through the International Red Cross or United Nations agencies to alleviate hunger and cold among the Hungarian people, it would seem reasonable to insist that representatives of such relief organizations should have freedom to exercise some control over the distribution of supplies. Anything beyond belief, it seems to us, must be considered in the light of East-West strategy and our own commercial interests.

3. According to a report in the Swiss economic daily Neue Zuricher Zeitung the Hungarian national rising reduced the Budapest government's planned production for 1956 by one-quarter, or 10 billion of florints in terms of national income. Physical destruction and displacement of people is leading during the current year to an acute shortage of labour in the mines and agriculture and to serious unemployment in the cities. Other reports indicate that the five year plans in all the satellites and in the Soviet Union have been seriously affected by the developments in Hungary and Poland and that the cost of destalinization to date for the USSR may be close to 2 billion dollars apart from considerations of prestige and defence. We can see little political advantage now in making concessions to ease this situation at its most acute point, in Hungary, particularly if by extending loans or credit we bolster a Moscow-imposed régime that the Hungarian people and workers' councils have so far refused to accept.

4. Against these political considerations must be weighed the commercial interests of western countries. When the uprising began, Canada, for example, was on the point of concluding a trade agreement with Hungary providing for the sale of 300,000 tons of wheat over a period of three years and was willing to extend one year's credit for at least the first year's purchase. The agreement was never signed in view of public opinion here and abroad. Moreover, the credit position of the Hungarian government is shaky and the Hungarian Minister of Agriculture admitted on November 27 that the Hungarian government was not in a position to honour trade agreements concluded with foreign countries.

5. On balance therefore we are inclined to share the USA view that there should be no truck or trade with the Kadar régime except for relief measures through the International Red Cross or the United Nations. Should economic or other pressures force some degree of liberalization in Hungary, we would have to reassess this attitude. The French rationalization about aiding the satellites to achieve greater economic independence of the Soviet Union would, in our opinion, apply in the case of Poland but is hardly applicable to the puppet régime in Budapest at present, though we must recognize that if the Kadar régime breaks down completely the Red Army might have to run the country directly.

6. You will by now have received Candel's telegram 228 of January 17† giving a confidential report of de Seynes impressions of the Kadar government and of the economic crisis which Hungary is facing. Although you will not be able to use this private account in the Council, de Seynes noted that the Kadar régime was regarded with contempt, that power and coal supplies are barely brought to keep one or two basic industries going, and that food stocks would be exhausted by May, leading to an extremely serious situation. You will also have been Candel's telegram 251 of January 18† summarizing the official public report of de Seynes and of the experts who accompanied him.[28] While the findings of the UN team may perhaps provide a more acceptable framework either for aid or trade, the basic political difficulty remains that of having to deal with the Kadar régime. So far as may be possible, we would prefer arrangements or any western aid to be made with Kadar's administration through Red Cross and UN channels, but if big program is developed this might prove impossible. In any case further consideration will need to be given both at the UN and by individual governments to the general policy of aid to Hungary and to the methods of distribution, should more relief be extended. In the meantime, we think it well worthwhile to have a further exchange of views in the Council.

Cabinet deleted from the supplementary estimates the further item for Hungarian relief. This decision was apparently based upon a feeling that an unduly high proportion of the proposed expenditure by Austria was of a capital rather than a current nature.

2. Expenditures in connection with the staging camp in the Netherlands to be used for prospective immigrants will now be financed from the supplementary vote which Citizenship and Immigration is seeking for transporting these immigrants to Canada.

3. In view of this rejection I would think we should attempt to achieve the maximum effect from the funds already made available by arranging formally or informally that one half or more of the four hundred thousand dollars which Treasury Board agreed last week

Dear Colonel Fortier:

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES IN YUGOSLAVIA

Just before Mr. Pearson returned to New York last week for meetings of the eleventh session of the United Nations General Assembly, he asked me to take up with your Department three questions concerning refugees in Europe. Perhaps the most important matter requiring attention at the moment is that of Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia; the other two questions — the winter slow-down of movement of Hungarian refugees out of Austria to Canada, and the problem of long-term refugees in Europe — will be dealt with in a subsequent letter.[29]

The latest word we have received concerning Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia indicates that, with more and more refugees crossing the Hungarian-Yugoslav border, the total in Yugoslavia has now reached 8,000 and is rapidly growing. Of this number, it seems likely that a few hundred may wish to come to Canada, for the last definite figure we had was 126, when the total influx was less than 3,000.

I am sure that your Department will already have under review the desirability of arranging for the admission of a sizable proportion of these refugees from Yugoslavia and will appreciate the advantages of avoiding the criticism that Canada is discriminating against refugees who fled from Hungary to Yugoslavia rather than to Austria, by requiring them to have close relatives in Canada as sponsors before they will be considered for admission. However, there is, in addition, a strong case on grounds of international policy for taking action to admit Hungarian refugees now in Yugoslavia.

You will, no doubt, have seen telegrams 133† and 134† of January 22 on this subject from the High Commissioner in London. These two telegrams have already been referred to you, but I attach copies for convenient reference. In these telegrams Mr. Robertson submits further information derived from the United Kingdom Ambassador in Belgrade and suggests that our present policy towards Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia might be reconsidered in the light of the marked change in attitude shown by the Yugoslav Government.

At the present time, in contrast with what is happening on the Austrian frontier, there appears to be little interference with the movement of Hungarian refugees across the Yugoslav border and the knowledge that this escape route is open to them may have an important bearing on the continued resistance to the Kadar Government of many Hungarians now actively dissident. If, however, Canada and other Western countries withhold their cooperation in facilitating the movement of refugees from Yugoslavia, it may become necessary for Tito to close the frontier against any further influx. This, in turn, may have an important impact not only upon events within Hungary but also upon relations between Yugoslavia and Hungary and may have the effect of upsetting the delicate balance which Tito, under increasing pressure, is attempting to maintain, and of drawing him closer to the Kadar régime, who will, no doubt, continue to press Tito for the return of Hungarian refugees.

In view of these important considerations, I should be grateful if our present policy with respect to Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia could be re-examined and if the possibility could be reviewed of applying to the Hungarians in Yugoslavia the same criteria, and also the same opportunities for free passage, as are now being extended to Hungarian refugees in Austria. If a meeting would be helpful to discuss these matters as well as any other problems concerning the movement of refugees from Europe, I know that officials of this Department would be very pleased to attend such a meeting.

Yours sincerely,
J. LÉGER

HUNGARIAN RELIEF

Allocation of the second half of the one million dollars voted by Parliament in December for Hungarian relief has now been decided upon. One hundred thousand dollars will be given the Canadian Red Cross for its international relief activities and the remaining four hundred thousand dollars is to be made available to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, the chief co-ordinator for international assistance as designated by the UN Secretary-General. In making this sum available to the High Commissioner we are also requesting that two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of it be earmarked for the Austrian government for the relief of the many thousands of refugees who are not provided for by the International Red Cross under the terms of its agreement with the UN whereby the Red Cross acts as the operating agency of the UN. In this way it is intended that Canadian assistance will be open to all; and by disbursing the one hundred thousand through the Canadian Red Cross provision is also being made for relief activities outside the scope of those which the UN has undertaken — especially aid to prospective Canadian immigrants, for example, and others who do not qualify for UN sponsored aid. (This of course is not to be taken as a reflection upon the work which the High Commissioner's office is engaged in; on the contrary, our confidence in the capacity of his office for co-ordinating the various national contributions towards Hungarian relief is demonstrated in our allocation of the entire Canadian contribution of one million dollars apart from the three hundred and fifty thousand dollars given to our own Red Cross. Our purpose is simply to ensure that our assistance is spread as widely as possible.)

2. Consideration is now being given to a further stipulation that fifty thousand dollars of remaining one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for High Commissioner be given to ICEM and for the moment it is planned that the High Commissioner shall have for use at his own discretion only one hundred thousand dollars. A decision will be taken on the remaining fifty thousand dollars within the next few days.

3. Please notify without delay on an informal basis the High Commissioner or his office of our decision so that there will be no danger of his learning of our actions from the press. You should emphasize that in allotting the sum mentioned for the use of the Austrian government and in considering a further stipulation with respect to the ICEM our intention is not to interfere unduly with his freedom of action but rather is to ensure that some help is directed towards the wide spread needs which are not now covered by the UN-IRC agreement and which have been brought to our attention by the Austrian authorities, other international agencies and by the High Commissioner himself.

4. Apart from notifying the appropriate UN people we would not wish mention of our contribution to be made publicly prior to a press release which will be issued here on Thursday at eleven am.[30] This course is subject to the minister's concurrence although the time will remain approximately the same in any event. Any change will be sent to you by immediate telegram.

5. The cheque for the High Commissioner for four hundred thousand dollars will be forwarded Tuesday January 29 according to present plans.

IMMIGRATION; HUNGARIAN REFUGEES; ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES; JEWISH REFUGEES FROM EGYPT
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE DEC. 5, 1956)

54. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that the Minister of Planning and Development for Ontario [Nickle] would be in Ottawa to-morrow to discuss an agreement with the province on care of Hungarian refugees.

Ontario had been offered much the same terms as the agreement made with Saskatchewan but had come back with unacceptable proposals. In addition to asking the Federal government to pay $3 a day for each refugee during the time in reception centres, Ontario expected payment for the capital cost of these centres. This was quite out of the question. The Federal government would also, as with Saskatchewan, pay Ontario the cost of providing immediate clothing needs. The Saskatchewan agreement also required that the Federal government pay full costs of medical treatment of indigent Hungarian immigrants during the first year in Canada, provided that the province would assume such costs after that year.

The Minister suggested that the best way to break the "jam" was to say that Ontario could either have an agreement such as that with Saskatchewan or rely on the existing agreement for landed immigrants; that was a fifty-fifty share of costs in respect of immigrants, but with the Federal government bearing the full cost of treatment for those not legally landed.

As regards the other provinces, Nova Scotia would probably accept on the same basis as Saskatchewan but Manitoba had raised the question of paying for persons who had not been landed. Quebec did not wish to deal with the Federal government but proposed to go ahead on its own. The Minister had supplied a provincial committee with the terms of the Saskatchewan agreement and, in effect, refugees in Quebec would get everything they got elsewhere. A good job was being done and some $100,000 had been made available. An excellent agreement had been negotiated with Newfoundland, but it was unlikely that many refugees would go there.

55. Mr. Pickersgill raised the question of Jews leaving Egypt. The Canadian policy in respect of such persons had been quite severe and no applications were processed in Egypt. Emigrants had to get first into other countries, excluding Italy, and were required to go through all the formalities, such as medical examinations and security checks. He thought a more liberal policy might be taken in making arrangements for dealing directly in Egypt with those Jews who had relatives in Canada who had been landed two years or more, and were well established. To do this, it would be necessary to send to Egypt, temporarily, a small team of an immigration officer and a doctor. Any such immigrant approved would, of course, be expected to pay his own way to Canada. Probably some 400 persons might be involved.

56. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There would only be a few Hungarian immigrants who were not landed. They would be persons not thoroughly examined or even unable to satisfy requirements, who had been accepted under the same system adopted in the emergency by the United Kingdom and France.

(b) Without a special agreement, Canada would have to take care of those not landed who required treatment. It was argued that section 48 of the Immigration Act dealing with medical treatment applied to the Federal government just as to any transportation company.

57. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and approved,

(a) the proposed line to be taken with representatives of the Ontario government on an agreement with that province on the care of Hungarian refugees; and,

(b) the temporary stationing in Egypt of an examining team to deal with relatives of persons of Jewish origin resident in Canada for two years or more, who wished to emigrate to Canada at their own expense.

HUNGARY

In our view, the special committee on Hungary should place primary emphasis on ascertaining what happened in Hungary and how it happened, holding up the documented record beside the principles of the Charter and the terms of the resolutions passed by the Assembly.

2. To serve this purpose, the committee ought to ensure that its report provides effective answers to the following obvious questions: (a) Has the present régime a legal mandate or has it been imposed by Soviet force? (b) What was the nature of the Soviet intervention and under what conditions did it take place? (c) Have arrests, deportations and executions been carried out without due process of law and in disregard of human rights?

3. We agree that the substance of a report along these lines is bound to be damaging to the USSR, but consider that this should not be permitted to divert the committee from the discharge of its responsibilities.

4. In the light of this, there seem to be two problems. First, should the aims of the committee be related only to the simple condemnation of the USSR, or should its work be exploited as part of a grander design? Second, how far should it go by publicity, etc., to heighten the condemnation which the facts alone will convey?

5. Although it may still be too soon to attempt to draw up a detailed policy regarding Hungary and the satellites as a whole, there seems to be general agreement that the West should encourage a gradual drift away from Soviet dominance. This drift must spring from national Hungarian initiatives. The committee may help to serve this end.

6. The low standard of living, as well as the lack of fundamental freedom, have, we think, been basic causes of the trouble in Eastern Europe, including Hungary. A refugee movement of such dimensions cannot however be explained solely by the desire for freedom in the abstract. It may be that one of the avenues of approach by which to encourage the drift will prove to be through economic channels. It would follow that the committee should ensure that its findings are not confined to the course and circumstances of Soviet intervention, but should ensure that its reports paint a concise but telling picture of the economic lot of the individual on the eve of the trouble. For this purpose, it has abundant human source material available. Thus the facts themselves will not only condemn the USSR, but will document the legitimacy of the Hungarian rising. Moreover, they put the case for the other satellites, at a time when at least some of them show signs of wanting more trade with the West rather than with the USSR and the Middle East, will help to explode the myth of the communist economic solution for a classically underdeveloped area ("Green Europe"), will say explicitly what the flight of over 200,000 refugees implies, and will be of no little interest to the Afro-Asian countries who tend to overlook the violations of human rights behind the curtain and may be tempted to take similar short cuts to industrialization.

7. As to the second question, the USSR has made it clear that it does not wish a resumption of the cold war, despite Suez and the Sino-Soviet reply to the Eisenhower doctrine.[31] It cannot simply put the clock back on the October 30 declaration, for the Soviet Union faces a persistent and similar problem at home. Already, Soviet military posture in Hungary suggests that Moscow expects to be able to ride out the storm in a long-term occupation and not to have to impose direct military rule. Should it do so, the Assembly can always take strong action, as you have suggested.

For a note on the Eisenhower Doctrine, see Volume 22, Document 208, footnote 173.

8. We therefore think that the hearings should be conducted in public, if only to prevent the USSR from discrediting evidence taken in camera. It would be unfortunate if the committee were to allow a desire to obtain the widest possible measure of agreement to lead to emasculation of its report and to direct its hearing accordingly. Although we believe that by confining itself to facts the committee should be able to present a succinct report we would hope that these facts could be fully documented in annexes and that in any event if the committee found itself too strongly divided to produce an acceptable common statement, it should be prepared to present either majority and minority reports or an agreed report followed by supplementary submissions.

9. The use to which the report should be put will depend on its conclusions and the circumstances at the time of its release. We agree that further condemnatory resolutions in the meantime are likely to be futile and inadvisable, unless there is a sudden change in the picture.

10. All reports indicate that the struggle is not yet over in Hungary. The régime is held in contempt even by its employees and passive resistance continues. It would seem that both the Kadar régime and the USSR are counting on the winter and the depletion of food stocks to bring the population to heel. It would follow that we should expect no compromise before the spring. Only such a compromise will make it easy for many members of the UN to move beyond relief. It might be useful if the committee took this possibility into account as regards the timing and substance of its reports.

11. These suggestions imply, within the broader terms of reference of the committee which are inherent in the circumstances of its creation, the adoption of a few precise but connected objectives: documentary justification for the condemnation of the USSR, the exposure of the myth of the Soviet socialist solution for Eastern Europe, the holding of Hungary, which has rebelled against that solution, in the limelight, a show of moral support for the valour of the Hungarians, and the encouragement of continued resistance by a demonstration that in the eyes of the UN a compromise is not only possible but inevitable, with a hint to all concerned that a compromise will make it easier for the West to move beyond relief to consider re-habilitation for Hungary. We realize, however, that we can only attempt to influence the committee's programme through our close friends on the committee.

CANADIAN RELIEF FOR HUNGARY

In telegram 152† of January 30 our Delegation to NATO reports on a further Council Session at which the problem of Western aid to Hungary was considered. You may recall in earlier telegrams (CANAC telegram 123† and Paris telegram 86† of January 25) it was reported that the French were pressing proposals which would provide for some measure of rehabilitation as well as relief for Hungary. Copies of these telegrams are attached for your reference. Since it appears probable that this question will be under continued consideration in the next few weeks I thought you might wish to consider a few of the points at issue, in the light of our own position, and perhaps to advise us of your views.

We have been giving some consideration in our own Department to the problem of Hungarian relief and to our trade relations with Hungary. We have not yet had time to work out a detailed policy on Hungary and the satellites. It may be that we must shortly recognize in current trends in eastern Europe an important opportunity for the west, and that to exploit these concretely western countries may later on have to consider an increase in trade with this region, including Hungary (although in Canada's case, we would not expect much trade to develop with Hungary whatever the circumstances). Meanwhile, and thus far, we have adopted the attitude that there is no political advantage to be gained from dealing with a régime which is not acceptable to the people of Hungary. The limited creditworthiness of the present Hungarian government has reinforced this attitude.

The French proposals would provide for:

(a) Free deliveries of coal, wheat, barley, etc.,

(b) Re-establishment of normal commercial relations with Hungary by NATO Members in so far as the individual interests of each are served by such relations.

If it is likely to become necessary or desirable to modify our stand, it may be wise to explore now the probable alternatives which are before us. We have examined the de Seynes report (together with the request the FAO made of us for feedstuffs in conjunction with this report) in an effort to determine what the effect of a Canadian contribution of relief supplies to Hungary would be, because at this stage we do not think that the conclusion of an agreement to sell wheat on credit would be understood either in Canada or abroad. However, the de Seynes report goes considerably farther than suggesting relief measures alone as aid to Hungary in the coming months. The three fields for activity it sets forth are:

(a) The resumption of agricultural production to satisfactory levels,

(b) The encouragement of deliveries of commodities from the farms, and

(c) The import of foods and other requirements.

In our opinion, category (a) would seem to be an advanced form of rehabilitation which would assist the Kadar régime. Category (b) practically involves political action since it is the communist system to which the farmers are objecting; we see no reason to give the régime support in crushing farm opposition.[32] It is only in the third category that we see a possibility for true relief assistance since the commodities requested will to a great extent be used to supply urgent needs mainly in urban centres where critical shortages exist and where external assistance can best be justified on humanitarian grounds.

At the present time, however, we do not have funds available for additional relief. The million dollars voted by Parliament has now been allocated and is being used primarily for aid to refugees. While it is true the Treasury Board directive does not prevent the use in Hungary of the funds given the Red Cross, it is naturally at the discretion of the Society whether or not they wish to do so. You may wish to give some thought therefore to whether we should consider a recommendation for aid of this type both in a positive spirit of responding to the United Nations request and also as a practicable alternative to the sale of wheat on credit. Under present circumstances such assistance might well take the form of a Canadian gift of surplus agricultural products. While we have not explored this possibility with other Departments (except that the FAO request was passed to the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture for any action which they might wish to take and no reply or comments have yet been received). There would seem to be several distinct advantages in such assistance if a further contribution is to be made. After examining de Seynes' report and taking into account those political facts which come immediately to mind, we would suggest that Canadian flour might be the most appropriate form for such a gift to take since the distribution in Hungary would be much easier and less subject to political obstruction, since the timing of Hungarian requirements would more easily permit a gift of flour than most others, since its source would be more likely to be known than in the case of most other products, and since such aid would contribute much to relief of distress but would do little rehabilitate the Kadar régime.

[32] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
No [L.B. Pearson]

While the latest telegram from the NATO Delegation shows that the difference of opinion between the French and other representatives is less pronounced than had earlier seemed the case, there may be some continued pressure for a more liberal attitude towards Hungary. There are of course additional considerations which we will continue to examine and report to you if it seems advisable; in the meantime you may wish to give some thought to the problem of Canadian relief for Hungary and to advise us whether a contribution along the lines described should be investigated.

J. L[ÉGER]

I don't think we should take any lead at this time in providing any type of assistance to Hungary.[33] This problem is complicated by the heavy financial burden of the Government in the field of immigration.[34]

RELIEF FOR HUNGARY

The question of relief for Hungary has been considered at some length and the conclusion reached that no further action on the part of the Canadian government is warranted at this time. This decision has been influenced both by the extent of government assistance for Hungarians, mainly refugees, already provided — over $10 million to which must be added several million in private funds — and by the number of refugees being accepted by Canada, probably a total of thirty thousand by mid-year. Another consideration is the nature of the problem in Hungary itself, where rehabilitation seems more critical than relief, thus making the issue political as well as economic.

[33] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Nor do I! L.B. P[earson]
[34] Léger a ajouté ce paragraphe à la main./Léger added this paragraph by hand.

2. Thus far, as indicated in our S-35 of January 18, we have taken the stand that, for humanitarian reasons, food, clothing and medicines should be provided through the facilities of the International Committee of the Red Cross provided some control over local distribution is retained. Both the original $250,000 and the $100,000 just given the Canadian Red Cross Society have been made available for use of the Society in the refugee work and in its International Relief Programme; thus a share of this $350,000 of the Canadian vote of $1,000,000 of last December could find its way into Hungary. However, what proportion, in fact, the Red Cross has considered it just to spend inside Hungary we do not know.

3. Beyond such relief, we did not consider it advisable to go. The de Seynes' report, together with the FAO report which forms part one of the former, have been examined as has the ICRC report which portray the extent of assistance which Hungary is said to require. Along with these reports we have received formal or informal requests for Canadian contributions. These are now to be rejected for the time being at least, for the reasons outlined in paragraph 1. As anything beyond traditional relief is bound to assist in some measure in rehabilitating the Kadar régime, we have examined with extreme care suggestions for contributions of agricultural feedstuffs and fertilizers. The dangers inherent together with the extent of aid already rendered dictate against any further assistance now.

4. As far as normal commercial relations are concerned, we have not been asked recently to reconsider the proposed Hungarian trade agreement. Given the existing state of the economy, the Hungarians are hardly likely to be able to meet its terms, nor would we be likely to consider signature at this time even if these economic difficulties did not prevail.

For CANAC — We agree with the action proposed in the Council and reported in your telegram under reference whereby information will be collated from members with representation in Budapest. Our decision to take no action now is consistent with the view in (b) of paragraph (3) requesting members to refrain from assisting Hungary until such consultation takes place. Our previous information in telegram S-35 of January 18 continues to describe the state of our commercial relations with Hungary and there is nothing further for you to report to the Council.

For Candel New York — In view of our attitude towards this problem, there is little value, in our view, for Michel and Meyer of the ICRC to visit Ottawa. Their memorandum which you forwarded has been examined as have all other requests for aid and will be kept in mind should our position be changed. With respect to your telegram 438 of January 31† and the informal approach made to you by de Seynes' staff, we presume no formal communication is expected of us. If you consider it advisable and the occasion presents itself you may wish to intimate that we do not expect to take any action in the near future. The suggestion in your telegram 514 of February 8† that a contribution of Canadian flour or wheat might be made to Hungary was one which had previously been considered and brought to the attention of the minister last week. At that time, however, it was considered inadvisable to pursue the matter for the reasons noted previously. Therefore, if you believe there are any new and compelling arguments favouring such a proposal you might wish to mention these to the minister and to report to us any reaction favouring a further investigation of such a gift. However, we should point out that if any item is to be added to the supplementary estimates, and such a gift would require an addition, immediate action must take place as supplementary estimates are being closed probably today.

Le sous-ministre par intérim de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, February 12, 1957

Dear Mr. Léger:

In Colonel Fortier's absence I am replying to your letter of January 25, 1957, in which you suggest a re-examination of our policy with respect to Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia.

The considerations regarding these refugees as outlined in your letter are appreciated. However, Mr. Pickersgill believes that any action should be in co-operation with other Western countries, rather than on our own, in an attempt to provide the same facilities in Yugoslavia as we have done in Austria. He does not feel that in the circumstances he should take the initiative, but rather that it should come from your Department. In his opinion Canada should not act unilaterally in this situation although he would consider some form of joint action with other Western countries, particularly if the United Kingdom and the United States of America took part.

We are endeavouring to find some means of simplifying the processing of sponsored cases which would help to alleviate the situation in Yugoslavia.

Yours sincerely,

C.E.S. SMITH

IMMIGRATION; ADMISSION OF HUNGARIAN REFUGEES FROM YUGOSLAVIA AND AND ITALY; IMMIGRATION FROM POLAND

29. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that the problem of Hungarian refugees in Austria was diminishing as the flow into that country had practically ceased and the outflow was continuing. However, with the closing of the Austrian border by the present Russian supported Hungarian government, thousands of refugees were entering Yugoslavia where there was now a total of 18,000. This had led to a serious situation and the Yugoslav government did not understand why western countries were taking more than 120,000 refugees from Austria while doing little for those in Yugoslavia. Only a few of the refugees wished to remain in that country.

Several western countries were now prepared to accept some of these people and the United States was considering the admission of 1,000. The Canadian Embassy in Belgrade had been informed that over 2,000 Hungarians wished to come to Canada, and it had been suggested that up to 1,000 might be admitted.

The Minister felt this would be a useful action to take. The Yugoslav government was standing up vigorously to the U.S.S.R., and this example had a strong influence on the present Polish government and on other satellite governments. There would be important subsidiary benefits in admitting these refugees.

30. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out that there would be careful selection of any Hungarian refugees that were in Yugoslavia. Probably a better type could thus be obtained. This selection would be on the basis of those who had expressed a desire to come to Canada, with a priority for those who were financially sponsored by friends or relations in Canada and for agricultural and mine workers. They would also have to satisfy the usual health requirements for immigrants.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Joint memorandum, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and Secretary of State for External Affairs, undated — Cab. Doc. 61 57)†

31. Mr. Pickersgill said there were two other immigration problems on which he would like the views of Cabinet. One had to do with Hungarian refugees in Italy and the other with persons of the Jewish faith in Poland who wished to emigrate to Canada.

There were some 4,000 Hungarian refugees now camped in various summer resorts in Northern Italy and the owners wanted the places vacated. The government of Italy was prepared to pay the passage to Canada of 1,500 persons on a selective basis. The proposal would be similar to an ordinary immigration movement and would be advantageous to Canada in increasing the number of Hungarians here who had been picked in accordance with the regular immigration criteria. The same selection team could be used for both the 1,000 refugees in Yugoslavia and the 1,500 in Italy. It would not involve any persons arriving before May or June, and he would propose to make no announcement about it.

In the case of the Polish Jews, strong representations had been made to him to take in more of them by increasing the admissible classes. It appeared that it was now the deliberate policy of the Polish government to allow any Jews to leave who could. He had said he could not consider doing anything for Jews alone, but thought it might be possible to extend the permissible categories to include brothers or sisters of Canadian citizens if they were satisfactorily sponsored financially and were recommended by the Canadian Polish Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress or the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee, all of whom were strongly anti-communist. These persons would pay their own passage and there would be less than 500 altogether. He would propose to make no announcement.

32. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The admission of Hungarian refugees from Yugoslavia would actually make little difference to the numbers entering Canada, as there was only so much transport available. The refugee problem in Austria was being substantially eased and it was understood that the United States were taking some 200 a day without any publicity or controversy, though this seemed to be of doubtful legality.

(b) It might be difficult to justify taking Hungarian refugees from Yugoslavia when Yugoslavs themselves were not able to get into Canada. Against this, it was pointed out that there was no reason why bona fide Yugoslav emigrants could not come in; the difficulty was that exit permits were made available generally only to communists. Canada did take Yugoslavs under 18 and over 60 where there were immediate Canadian relatives, and the main problem was with nephews and nieces.

(c) The admission of Hungarian refugees into Canada was working out far better than had been expected. There had been some concern expressed in labour circles and there had been a few troublemakers among the immigrants.

(d) Austria had indicated quietly that, if there proved to be some troublemakers among the Hungarian refugees from Austria they could be returned to Hungary via that country.

(d) There had always been anti-Jewish feeling in Poland and the government there appeared to be trying to overcome this by getting rid of as many as possible of the Jewish population. Some 100,000 were going to Israel. There seemed to be real fear in the minds of the government of an anti-Jewish pogrom.

33. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on Hungarian refugee problems and Polish Jews and agreed,

(a) that 1,000 Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia be admitted into Canada; the persons to be selected from refugees who have expressed a desire to come to Canada, with a preference for those who were sponsored by friends or relatives here, and for agricultural or mine workers. All of whom must satisfy the usual health requirement for immigrants;

(b) that up to 1,500 Hungarian refugees in Italy be admitted to Canada; the persons to meet the usual immigration criteria and their passage to be provided by the Italian government; and,

(c) that the permissible categories be extended to allow the entry of residents of Poland who are the children or the brothers or sisters of Canadian citizens, together with their immediate families if any, if they were satisfactorily sponsored financially, and were recommended by the Canadian Polish Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress or the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee; it being understood that these additional immigration arrangements would be given no undue publicity.

HUNGARIAN QUESTION — ITEM 67: ELEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

With this letter I am enclosing a memorandum which was prepared early in March by Mr. Ford before his departure for Colombia. You are no doubt aware that he was concerned with the Hungarian question when it was being considered at the eleventh session of the General Assembly. Mr. Ford has given his impressions of the Assembly exercise. While I do not entirely agree with the conclusions in the memorandum, I suggest that it might be useful to add these views to others which were expressed by the Delegation from time to time.

2. At the same time I am enclosing a copy of Document A/3573† of April 1 which contains a note verbale dated March 26, 1957 from the Permanent Representative of Hungary to the Secretary-General concerning the report of the Credentials Committee (Document A/3536 together with Resolution 484 of February 21, 1957). The Hungarian note complains because the Assembly "has, up till now, not reached a positive decision on the credentials of the Hungarian Delegation...".

R.A. MACKAY

Comment.

I have doubts like Dr. MacKay's. It seemed to me that the great majority of the Asians and Africans, after some hesitation, reacted quite strongly against Soviet action and that they were deeply affected by the debate. One result was that the Soviet position was considerably weakened during the rest of the Assembly. An important reason for Arab and Asian hesitation on this issue was the realization that the French and British were deliberately trying to divert attention from Egypt to Hungary — a tactic the latter admitted privately.

Memorandum

HUNGARY

I have reported from time to time on the developments during the past four months with regard to Hungary at the United Nations. In this brief memorandum I should like simply to record a few impressions and comments on the virtual failure of the United Nations to accomplish anything very concrete.

2. On March 6 a meeting was held under the chairmanship of Mr. Lodge to discuss the possibility of introducing another resolution on Hungary at the end of the Assembly. Most of those present, including ourselves, supported the initiative but with marked lack of enthusiasm, and outside the meeting soundings of other delegations revealed even greater reluctance to become involved in another debate on Hungary. The Irish representative said quite frankly that it would be a kind of "danse macabre" over the corpse of Hungary. The Italian said that we should not confess publicly our failure in the Hungarian question, and Sir Leslie Munro compared it to a Maori "tangi" or wake. Only Mr. Lodge protested that the United Nations had not failed completely. As he said, we had not accomplished our primary aim of driving the Russians out of Hungary, but at any rate we had focussed the attention of the world on their iniquities, and we had established a Committee of Investigation which was functioning efficiently and with remarkable unanimity.

3. Nevertheless I think we must agree that the action of the United Nations on Hungary was largely a failure, even if one concedes that it was never likely to achieve its primary aim of forcing the withdrawal of the Russians. Certainly United Nations action on Hungary stands in very sorry contrast with that taken in the Suez crisis. The one lesson which might profitably have been learned by the Arab-Asian group concerning the nature of the Soviet system has been obstinately refused. Though there are no doubt exceptions, I find it difficult to believe, however, that the majority of the Arab-Asian officials and ordinary people have seriously changed their minds about the USSR as a result of Hungary. The efforts of the United Nations may possibly have helped in some way, but I am not convinced of it.

4. Nor has the concomitant been accepted either by the Arab-Asian group, or by the Western nations, except in a rather academic way — that is, that for all practical purposes the USSR will not accept decisions of the United Nations when its own vital interests are involved. Equally we are unable to draw the necessary conclusion which in theory might have to be drawn. Indeed, it is doubtful that anyone seriously wishes to draw this conclusion, because, first, it is not necessarily in our interests to force the USSR out of the United Nations into isolation, and, second, because almost a third of the present members would be most reluctant to side with the West on such an issue.

5. The question therefore arises: should the United Nations have set its sights lower and attempted some more limited aim? It is difficult to see how we could have acted any differently in view of the passions aroused by Soviet actions last October and November without admitting the impotence of the United Nations from the beginning. The debate served one purpose, however, and that was to focus the attention of the world on Hungary, and to serve as some kind of brake on Soviet repressive acts. The UN probably never had any real chance of doing more than this, of acting, for example, as a mediator between the Russians and Hungarians, and of moderating the demands of each side. Similarly United Nations actions in condemning the USSR could hardly have altered Soviet aims and methods in Hungary. In other words most of what the United Nations did was irrelevant to the basic fact that the USSR was determined to re-establish its dominant power in Hungary and was in a position to do so irrespective of what the outside world did, barring an act of war. The only thing which might have altered this would have been a unanimous Arab-Asian reaction against the USSR and even this would not necessarily have prevented the Russians from their course of action.

6. In the circumstances, therefore, the establishment of the Special Committee on Hungary was probably the only action the United Nations could take to assert its authority, to keep the issue alive, and to try objectively to present a definitive report on the actual events. Its work so far, and its interim report, are unspectacular but satisfactory. It seems likely that the final report will be a sombre and pretty convincing indictment of the Soviet Union.[35] But, basing myself on the reception of the interim report, it seems probable that it will have very little effect on world opinion.

7. As regards the question of the Hungarian Delegation to the United Nations, we were faced with the dilemma of accepting the credentials of a delegation of a government completely unacceptable to the vast majority of the Hungarian people, or having to deal solely with the Russians over Hungary. In the end the Hungarians themselves solved the question by voluntarily absenting themselves from the work of the Assembly.

8. To sum up, I must repeat my conviction that Hungary was the major failure of this Assembly. It failed to liberate Hungary, and it failed basically to change the Arab-Asian attitude towards the Soviet system, or Soviet colonialism. The first was due at least in part to a refusal to accept the basic premise that the United Nations is not yet in a position to force decisions on the USSR without going to war. The second is more serious because it was within the possibilities of the United Nations. The only mitigating factor in absolving it of this guilt is that the Anglo-French-Israeli attack on Egypt obscured what otherwise would have been easier to present as a clear-cut case of Soviet colonialism. But this must remain speculation, and I do not think we should exaggerate it. The fact that we did fail is a factor of far-reaching importance. It means that the anti-Western colonial bias is still great enough to prevent the Arab-Asian countries from seeing through the rosy haze in which they regard the USSR. But I also think it means that, subconsciously or not, the Afro-Asians are not prepared to take a high, moral line with a country which is in a posi-

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], January 9, 1956

Mr. W.B. George, Past-President of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, came to see me this afternoon. I was anxious to talk with him about the forthcoming Olympic ice hockey matches at which Canada will, of course, be represented by the Kitchener-Waterloo team.

I told him that I hoped the Government would be able to keep out of international sport, and that it was far from our intention in this Department to do anything to lessen that hope. However, and unfortunately, certain international sporting competitions have become as political as they were sporting, and questions of prestige were often more important than the game itself. This presented a problem for Canada as well as for other countries, especially in the field of ice hockey where we were supposed to be supreme. That problem, as the World Hockey Championships in Germany last year showed, has been accentuated by the participation of communist teams. Therefore, Government intervention was sometimes inevitable when difficulties occurred, as we learned particularly from our experience in Stockholm two years ago. Also, especially as our team would be travelling behind the iron curtain, our missions abroad could be of some assistance to them. It was assistance and not interference that was in our minds. If, however, we were going to be of any help, we would have to know the itinerary of the team and their plans. Mr. George said that he had previously asked that information on this score should be sent to us, but I told him we had not received it.

It appears that the team is leaving by plane on Saturday and will be in Prague next Wednesday. I told him that if we were to be of any help — and help and advice might certainly be required in Prague — we would have to get the necessary information at once. He said he would try to secure this.

Mr. George seemed to agree entirely with my view that international sport has now become too closely connected with international politics. He also agreed that it was of first importance that any Canadian hockey team abroad should be a credit to Canada, both off and on the ice, and he had high hopes for the present Canadian Olympic team in this regard. He himself wondered whether it was worth while sending Canadian hockey teams abroad, where conditions are so different than they are at home and where difficulties and misunderstandings occurred. These, he said, were not due so much to the players as to the press representatives who accompany them and to the hangers-on. He instanced their experiences in Germany last winter to support this contention, where the search seemed to be not so much for news as for headlines, especially those which indicated conflict not only between teams, but between nations.

The World Hockey Championships next year will be in Moscow, and I gave Mr. George my own opinion that it would be difficult to avoid participation now that Canada had taken the championship from Russia in Germany. I hoped that the Canadian team next year would be of outstanding ability, would win the championship convincingly, would show the Russians what we could do, both on and off the ice, and then that serious consideration would be given to the desirability of withdrawing from such competitions in the future.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 30-56 Ottawa, February 3, 1956

EXCHANGE OF VISITS AND INFORMATION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE SOVIET UNION

This memorandum draws attention to, and makes certain recommendations concerning the various problems posed by the increasing number of scientific, technical and cultural exchanges, both of visits and of information, between Canada and the Soviet Union.

Soviet Policy and Practice on Exchanges

2. Messrs. Bulganin and Khrushchev revealed at the meeting of Heads of State last July that the Soviet Union had decided to widen its range of contacts with Western countries considerably beyond the narrow diplomatic channel which had been sufficient for its purposes during the cold war period. This development was at first misunderstood by some people in the West, and false hopes were raised that the iron curtain was to be dismantled. What we have learned in the last few months, as recently as February 14 when Khrushchev spoke in Moscow, has enabled us to see Soviet policy and practice in better perspective.

3. This clearer understanding of Soviet tactics has a bearing, of course, on policy regarding exchanges. A list† of exchanges initiated between Canada and the Soviet Union since July 1, 1955, is attached. Our experience of these exchanges (and we understand that the experience of other Western countries has been the same) has established the three important points covered in the following paragraphs.

4. First, exchanges of visits proposed by the Soviets are in fields in which Canada may well be technically ahead of the Soviet Union (i.e. agriculture, lumber and energetics) and in which therefore the Soviet Union might have more to learn from Canada than Canada would have from the U.S.S.R. Proposals have also been made for exchanges of artists and athletes, and it should be noted that in this case the Soviet Union may be expected to outclass Canada and so gain a propaganda advantage.

5. Second, Soviet citizens visiting Canada come only in organized delegations carefully supervised by the Soviet Embassy, and information exchanged by correspondence and subsequent reports on any visits are controlled by censorship at the Soviet end.

6. Third, the Soviet Embassy has been proposing exchanges through many different channels. Our Embassy in Moscow is required to deal with the Foreign Ministry on every subject. Here in Canada, however, the Soviet Embassy has been proposing exchanges of visits or of information to several Government agencies and private organizations, and persons across the country. This practice has certainly been adopted in order to achieve better results from the Soviet point of view. Arrangements for specific exchanges are often accepted by Canadian officials or others who are unaware of the picture as a whole. It must be recognized, of course, that any effort we might make to oblige Mr. Chuvahin to work through any one agency on these matters would be handicapped by the fact that it would not always be easy to impose effective sanctions if he did not choose to cooperate.

7. It is quite evident that the balance of advantage in exchanges so far has been heavily in favour of the Soviet Union, which has taken and kept the initiative, and coordinated its effort better all along.

Value of Exchanges for Canada

8. The Canadian reaction, both official and unofficial, has been to welcome any genuine improvement of the atmosphere which might be created by increased exchanges, or indeed by any other method. In particular, exchanges are seen to offer the following possible advantages to Canada.

(a) Increased contacts may help to remove the Soviet misconception that Canada is a member of an aggressive Western alliance which intends to attack the Soviet Union in due course. They may thus contribute to a slow improvement in East-West relations if continued long enough. They also help to put new ideas into the heads of people who in general have been kept in complete ignorance of the outside world for several decades. If continued long enough this may have a cumulative effect in the Soviet Union out of all proportion to the number of individuals affected;

(b) In those scientific and technical fields in which the Soviet Union is ahead of us, Canadian research and industry obviously stand to gain by suitable exchanges;

(c) We also stand to gain from an intelligence point of view in almost every field, because Soviet knowledge of Canada so greatly exceeds our knowledge of the Soviet Union;

(d) As far as visits to Canada are concerned, while we may not be able to convert from Communism the sort of people selected to come here, we can at least show them our country, have them meet our people, and explain to them our policies in ways that must improve their understanding of Canada and what freedom means. This may have some effect on others when they return.

9. Many of the disadvantages of exchanges from the Canadian point of view stem from the fact that we have so far left the initiative in Soviet hands. This situation could largely be corrected by a careful and well-coordinated planning on our part. One danger which can never be removed, however, and which should therefore never be forgotten arises from the unchanging Soviet predilection for subversion and espionage. An international atmosphere of détente, and the closer personal contacts which it involves, will encourage the growth of a new generation of fellow-travellers and "respectable" Communists. They, by their influence and under-cover activity, may reduce Canadian support for NATO to a dangerous degree, and induce our people to believe, without genuine evidence to the contrary, that the Soviet Union has changed its basic aims and methods.

10. As regards the danger of espionage, Soviet visitors may be used to select persons and intelligence targets for subsequent exploitation by the Russian Intelligence Service. These risks, however, can be kept within bounds if the Canadian public is made aware of them, and if our internal security service is given sufficient resources to carry out its task.

11. Although the Soviet Union has so far benefitted more from exchanges than has Canada, it seems possible to make, if we so desire, these exchanges quite as profitable for us as for them, and perhaps even more so. But, if so, we must make our own arrangements and not allow things to develop without control by us. Such arrangements as we now have are described below, and certain suggestions made for improving them. The only alternative to working out suitable procedures would be to turn down every Soviet suggestion for wider contracts. This, however, would mean the erection of a Canadian iron curtain, and the full resumption of cold war tactics on our side which, I assume, is unacceptable.

Canadian Policy and Arrangements Concerning Exchanges

12. Thus far in this memorandum the term "exchanges" has covered the exchange both of visits and of information. Canadian policy regarding the exchanges of unclassified information with the Soviet Union and the Soviet satellite countries has been satisfactorily settled for some time now. Briefly, this policy lays down that unclassified information may be given only when some useful return can be anticipated, that the decision in each case is a departmental or agency responsibility, and that reports should be submitted twice a year to the Secretary of the Security Panel summarizing the information sent. If private organizations in Canada request advice on this subject, they are also requested to seek reciprocity as much as possible.

13. The exchange of visits poses far more difficult problems, on which our policy is still evolving. Our experience to date has established the continuing importance of the following points:

(a) The exchange of visits between Canada and the Soviet Union can be useful and should up to a certain point be approved;

(b) As in the case of the exchange of information, the exchange of visits should be reciprocal;

(c) It is not sufficient for us merely to reciprocate visits proposed by the Soviet Government. We must take the initiative ourselves in fields of special interest to us, in order, among other things, to forestall undesirable initiatives from them.

(d) Canadian effort in connection with the exchange of visits, whether governmental or non-governmental, should be co-ordinated by the Department of External Affairs with due regard to all the political aspects involved;

(e) Each visit proposed from either side should be referred by the Department of External Affairs, as early as possible in the planning stage, to the Security Panel and the Joint Intelligence Committee for examination of its security and intelligence aspects;

(f) The minimum security requirements in connection with Soviet visits to Canada are the following: visas should be denied if the invitations have been issued by Canadian Communists or Communist-front organizations; the frequency and nature of visits should be related to the available resources of our security service; Soviet delegations should be restricted in size; Canadian conducting officers should be attached to the delegations in certain cases; and security briefing should be given to the institutions being visited;

(g) The minimum security and intelligence requirements when Canadians visit the Soviet Union are that a security briefing be given beforehand and an intelligence debriefing be arranged afterwards in certain cases.

14. A Visits Panel to coordinate Canadian interests in this field has been operating for four months within the Department of External Affairs. It is now apparent, however, that both its constitution and its terms of reference are too narrow to enable it to handle the problems with which it has to deal.

Recommendations

15. In view of the foregoing, the Secretary of State for External Affairs submits the following recommendations to Cabinet:

(a) That the policies outlined in paragraph 12 and 13 above be confirmed as Canadian policy in the matter of the exchange of information and of visits respectively between Canada and the countries of the Soviet bloc.

(b) That this policy should be announced to Parliament, or to the Committee on External Affairs, in suitable terms, which should cover the points mentioned in sub-paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) of paragraph 13, and also the fact that visas will be denied to visitors who are sponsored by Canadian Communists or Communist-front organizations;

(c) That an Interdepartmental Panel on the Exchange of Visits with the Soviet Bloc be set up to implement this policy;

(d) That the Panel be responsible to Cabinet through the Secretary of State for External Affairs;

(e) That the Chairman of the Panel be the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; that its permanent members include the Secretary of the Cabinet as Chairman of the Security Panel, and the Commissioner of the R.C.M. Police; that the Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee attend its meetings; that Deputy Ministers and Heads of Agencies attend when visits of interest to them are discussed; that the foregoing officials may be represented by senior members of their staffs; and that the Secretary by provided by the Department of External Affairs;

(f) That its terms of reference be as follows:

(i) Establish liaison with appropriate Government departments and agencies, including the Government Hospitality Committee, in order to ensure that the Department of External Affairs is kept informed as far in advance as possible of forthcoming official visits in either direction between Canada and the Soviet bloc countries and, as appropriate, to advise on and assist with arrangements;

(ii) Deal with such unofficial organizations and persons as advise the Government of forthcoming unofficial visits in either direction and, as appropriate, to advise on and assist with arrangements;

(iii) Ensure that the Security Panel and the Joint Intelligence Committee are informed of such visits and consult with these bodies as necessary on the security and intelligence aspects;

(iv) Consult with the Chairman of the Government Hospitality Committee in order to ensure that the political, security, intelligence and information aspects of official visits to Canada from the U.S.S.R. and its European allies are borne in mind;

(v) Initiate proposals for official or unofficial visits to and from Soviet bloc countries if and when such visits would serve Canadian interests;

(vi) Keep under continuous review the subject of exchange of visits with Soviet bloc countries, including the problem of financing certain visits in whole or in part if Canadian interests would be served thereby, and prepare appropriate recommendations from time to time; and

(vii) In consultation with the Security Panel, consider the exchange of unclassified information with the Soviet bloc insofar as this is related to the exchange of visits.

(g) That the Soviet Ambassador be told that he should always take up directly with the Department of External Affairs in the first instance any proposals he may wish to make concerning official exchanges of information and visits, and that he should keep that Department informed of his activities concerning unofficial exchanges.

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador in Soviet Union

DESPATCH DS-133 Ottawa, March 29, 1956

EXCHANGE OF VISITS AND INFORMATION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE SOVIET UNION

The Department has given considerable attention to this subject in recent months. The purpose of this despatch is to inform you of our plans for placing the exchange of visits with Soviet bloc countries on a more equitable basis, and to ask you to make appropriate representations to the Soviet Government.

2. Attached is a copy of a memorandum to Cabinet dated February 3, 1956. You will find that it outlines our recent experience on visit exchanges, describes the policy we have elaborated on the basis of this experience, and concludes by recommending that our policy be confirmed and certain interdepartmental arrangements made to implement it. Cabinet considered this memorandum on February 23 and agreed:

(a) that the policy outlined be approved, but that no announcement about it be made;

(b) that an Interdepartmental Panel on the Exchange of Visits with the Soviet Bloc, with the terms of reference proposed, be established to assist in implementing this policy;

(c) that the panel be responsible to the Cabinet through the Secretary of State for External Affairs and be constituted as he had recommended, with the addition of the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration;

(d) that the Soviet Ambassador be informed that he should always take up directly with the Department of External Affairs, in the first instance, any proposals concerning official exchanges, and that he should keep the department informed of his activities concerning unofficial exchanges.[37]

3. Our major recommendation to Cabinet was that an Interdepartmental Panel on the Exchange of Visits with the Soviet Bloc, chaired by the Under-Secretary, be created to coordinate government policy in this field. The composition of the Panel is described in paragraph 15(e) of our memorandum to Cabinet (which added the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to its permanent membership), and its terms of reference in paragraph 15(f). It is proposed to call the Panel together as soon as possible.

4. At its first meeting the Panel will have to begin by settling procedure for the handling and approval of visits in both directions. It is hoped that we can develop some fairly flexible arrangements whereby the Panel can meet quickly and often, if necessary, to consider specific visits and to help the Departments most concerned build up a fund of knowledge about the special problems posed by Iron Curtain visits. We therefore mean to suggest that each member of the Panel appoint a fairly senior member of his staff as the "visits officer" for his particular department or agency. It will then be up to the Secretary, who will be provided by this Department, and who will be in effect our visits officer, to coordinate the Government's day to day activities in this field in consultation with the visits officers of the other departments concerned.

5. Another matter for discussion at the Panel's first meeting will be the definition of what constitutes an official visit for the purposes of the Panel's agenda. We shall suggest that visits should be considered as official, from the Canadian point of view, if Canadian Ministers or officials make or receive them, even if Canadian private citizens are also involved.

6. The R.C.M. Police are anxious that the Panel should discuss the visit to Canada of Soviet-bloc trade representatives. These people are now beginning to apply for visas in larger numbers in the hope of being allowed to travel freely across the country in order to drum up trade. There is a security risk in this situation, to which the Panel's attention might well be drawn. We hope that the Panel will develop into a forum where the security aspects of visits can be balanced against the other aspects, and firm policies decided upon for the guidance of departmental visits officers.

7. The Panel will also want to examine the financial problem involved by visit exchanges. The Soviet practice of paying the expenses of visiting delegations, and their expectation of reciprocal hospitality abroad, must be examined in the light of Cabinet's preference (which was not actually reflected in its decisions on our memorandum) that we should insist on paying the expenses of our officials abroad.

8. The Panel will conclude its first meeting by considering the visits programme for 1956. To the extent that certain visits have already been decided, the actual arrangements will be discussed. Proposals not yet finally decided will be examined, and the Panel will begin, we hope, to consider the very important question of what visits, in order of priority, we should propose in our own interests. This discussion would be held with a view to preparing specific recommendations to Cabinet, looking ahead a year or so.

[37] Après avoir examiné ce mémoire, le Cabinet a également convenu « that the requirements of the Special Branch of the R.C.M. Police be reviewed in the light of changing attitudes toward Russia and increased contacts between Russians and Canadians. » Voir Conclusions du Cabinet, 23 février 1956, Dossiers du BCP.

After considering this memorandum, Cabinet also agreed "that the requirements of the Special Branch of the R.C.M. Police be reviewed in the light of changing attitudes toward Russia and increased contacts between Russians and Canadians." See Cabinet Conclusions, February 23, 1956, PCO Records.

9. It is our intention to continue the Department's Committee on Visits to coordinate the Department's views in general, and to define its attitude towards particular visits. The Chairman of the Committee will normally be Mr. Macdonnell or, failing him, the Head of European Division. European Division will also supply the Secretary of the Interdepartmental Panel.

10. Now that our policy on visits has been approved by Cabinet, and the first steps are being taken to set up the machinery to implement it, we must obviously broach the subject with the Soviet Government. Attached is an aide-mémoire which I should like you to present to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs as soon as possible. You will see that it sets out the limits within which we are prepared to co-operate in arranging exchanges, and indicates our agreement to two major Soviet visits to Canada this year: a timber delegation and a fisheries delegation. No mention is made of the Soviet proposal for an exchange of energetics delegations, because this is to be discussed by the Interdepartmental Panel at its first meeting. For your own information, the Department is not prepared to recommend to the Panel that this particular exchange take place, at least this year.

11. At the time you present the aide-mémoire, I should like you to make the following points orally:

(a) in ordinary circumstances the Canadian Government does not intend to issue visas to visitors invited to Canada by Communist-dominated organizations;

(b) we are not yet ready to answer the Soviet suggestion regarding an exchange of energetics delegations, but our decision will be taken shortly and will be communicated to the Soviet Government at the same time as the proposals mentioned in paragraph 3 of the aide-mémoire.

I should like to emphasize that the first of these two points is as much the Government's policy as anything covered in the aide-mémoire itself. The only reason that we prefer to have you mention it orally is that it would not look well in what we intend to be a rather friendly communication. However, we do not expect that the Soviet Government will be in the least disturbed by what you say on this point, as they will presumably consider it as something for us to settle as we wish.

12. I should like to be advised by telegram of the date you propose to present the aide-mémoire, as we intend to call the Soviet Ambassador into the Department at the same time, or shortly thereafter, to give him a copy of it. At that time the same oral comments will be made to Mr. Chuvahin, and his attention drawn particularly to paragraphs 5 and 6.

13. Copies of this despatch are being sent to our Legations in Warsaw and Prague. It is intended that in due course the Interdepartmental Panel will also cope with visit exchanges with Poland and Czechoslovakia, but we are not prepared as yet to open discussions with the governments of those countries. For the time being, we wish to concentrate on the major problem raised by exchanges with the Soviet Union. Our Chargés d'Affaires in Warsaw and Prague should therefore regard this despatch as being sent to them for their information only at this time. Copies are also being referred to London and Washington and to our NATO Delegation. These posts may convey the information it contains to the Foreign Office, the State Department and the NATO Council respectively, at their discretion. In due course we shall address further despatches to these three posts, elaborating on any specific points which we wish them to take up.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Aide-mémoire

Ottawa, March 28, 1956

The Canadian Government has received in recent months a number of proposals from the Soviet Government for exchanges of visits between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It has also noted with interest the various proposals made by the Soviet Ambassador in Ottawa to private groups and individuals in Canada for such exchanges. The Canadian Government welcomes exchanges of visits between the U.S.S.R. and Canada which contribute to greater mutual understanding between the two governments and peoples. It is prepared to assist in the development of such exchanges and would like to suggest certain conditions and criteria which, in the Canadian view, will contribute to better relations between our two countries. The purpose of this aide-mémoire is to outline these conditions and criteria, which may be further elaborated in the light of experience.

The Canadian Government considers that exchanges of visits should be based on the principle of reciprocity, and that there should not be a marked imbalance of visits in either direction. It will be for each Government to suggest to the other what visits it would like to take place. This principle of reciprocity need not be confined rigidly to an exchange of visits in a particular field; each Government should be prepared in certain circumstances to consider, for example, a visit in one field as matched by a return visit in quite a different one. This flexible approach should enable both countries to derive the maximum benefit from the exchange of visits.

So far as official Soviet visits to Canada are concerned, the Canadian Government would find it difficult to receive more than a limited number of groups from the U.S.S.R. in the course of a year. In 1956, for example, it would be preferable if major visits could be confined to those of a Soviet timber delegation and a Soviet fisheries delegation. The Canadian Government would not, of course, consider sending more than a roughly equivalent number of Canadian delegations to the U.S.S.R. under official Canadian Government sponsorship. In this connection, the Canadian Ambassador in Moscow will shortly make some suggestions to the Soviet Government for visits in the current year. Proposals for other more limited exchanges in both directions, particularly where some preliminary arrangements have already been made, can be considered separately.

In general, it is the opinion of the Canadian Government that it will be easier to make suitable arrangements if visiting delegations are small in size. The size of the delegations should be agreed in accordance with the preference of the host government. In accordance with normal Canadian practice, the Canadian Government would prefer to pay the expenses of any of its officials visiting the U.S.S.R.

In order to ensure the most effective handling of the exchange of visits between Canada and the U.S.S.R., the Soviet Ambassador in Ottawa is requested to take up directly with the Department of External Affairs in the first instance any proposals concerning official exchanges.

Apart from Soviet visits to Canada at the invitation of the Canadian Government, there remain visits to Canada proposed by Soviet representatives to private groups in Canada. In such cases, the Soviet Ambassador is requested to inform the Department of External Affairs concurrently of proposals for such visits.

EXCHANGE OF VISITS

1. Please present aide-mémoire of March 28 on exchange of visits to the Soviet Foreign Ministry omitting paragraph 3, sentence 4: "In this connection ... current year". As you know, a delegation of Canadian lumbermen will be going to the Soviet Union this year and we currently have no other major visit to suggest.

2. Point (a) paragraph 11 of despatch under reference has already been explained to Soviet Embassy here, but in view of its importance you should repeat it orally to Foreign Ministry. You might, if pressed for explanations, give the refusal of visas to the Soviet women as an example, stating that we have no objection to the women, only to the organization which invited them, and that we consider that Soviet Canadian relations would not repeat not be improved by a visit under the auspices of a group not representative of Canada and the views of which are generally unacceptable to most Canadians.[38]

3. In place of point (b) please inform the Ministry that Canada will not be able to accept a Soviet energetics delegation in 1956, but might reconsider this for next year; you should give the Ministry no reason to hope that this visit will necessarily be permitted in 1957. You should add that Canada wishes to encourage the exchange of meteorological information, and will shortly make specific proposals for an exchange of visits by one or two specialists in this field.

4. Please wire proposed date of presentation, so that copy may be given Soviet Chargé d'Affaires here.

EXCHANGE OF VISITS

Aide mémoire presented yesterday and additional points made verbally. Ministry commented regretfully that while introductory paragraphs were encouraging rest of communication appeared restrictive in intent. Disappointment was expressed at decision on energetics exchange. Specific proposals on meteorology would be welcome. Position on Communist dominated organizations was that USSR wished encouragement of widest possible contacts; so far as they knew no organizations whose invitation has been accepted were considered illegal by the Canadian Government; and in any case the initiative had come from the Canadian side. However they had no wish to interfere in our internal affairs and the decision was of course up to us.

VISITS FROM THE SOVIET BLOC SPONSORED BY COMMUNIST OR COMMUNIST FRONT ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Pickersgill's statement in the House yesterday has brought into the public domain the Government's decision not to admit to Canada visitors from Soviet bloc countries coming under the auspices of Communist or Communist front organizations.[39] I am glad that the Government's position has been stated as I was somewhat concerned about public misunderstanding of the reasons for the decision to refuse visas to the Soviet women, i.e., failure to appreciate that the objection was to the sponsoring organization rather than to the visit of some Soviet women.

I think it is unfortunate, however, that the statement has been made in the context of the Robeson visit and of his agent Jerome Myers and even more unfortunate that Mr. Pickersgill should have said as his opening statement that "it is not the policy of the government to admit known communists to this country either as immigrants or as visitors." I am afraid that the context and this opening statement may blur the main point which we hoped to get across. The case with regard to the Congress of Canadian Women was much more clear-cut and defensible, and in any case as far as this Department is concerned would have explained to the Russians in an unmistakeable way what our attitude was. As it is, the two issues are going to be confused in the public mind, and the question of civil liberties may become the dominant question (see the attached editorial from the Globe and Mail of April 12.)

[Mr. Jerome Myers'] company may or may not be run on a commercially sound basis, but it is apparent that he turns his commercial activities to the political and propaganda advantage of the L.P.P. and the front organizations. The following is a summary of his current activities as an impresario:

(a) He arranged a series of concerts for the Polish pianist Mme. Czerny-Stefanska to whom a visa was granted without, apparently, any check being made as to her sponsorship.

(b) He is trying to arrange, for October, 1956, a series of concerts by Soviet artists, Emil Gilels, the pianist, I. Bezrodny the violinist, and Mr. Hryshko and V. Firsova, bass baritone and coloratura. He is planning to book this tour in conjunction with other quite reputable agents in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

(c) He has made to the Yugoslav Ambassador a proposal to organize a complete tour of Canada by the Yugoslav National Ballet.

(d) He has proposed to the Stratford Players and to the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde that he organize a tour to the Soviet Union on the basis that he (which must mean the Russians) will pay two of the three items, transport, fees (salaries) and expenses if Stratford and Théâtre du Nouveau Monde will pay the third.

We have nothing against any of these tours as such, but we do object to the role of Jerome Concerts. The problem of how to ease him out of the picture is a knotty one, particularly as Myers may accuse the Department of forcing him out of business. The two possible courses which I am considering are

(a) a personal and informal approach to Mr. Koudriatzev, the Montreal impresario, or Mr. Tremblay of Tremblay Concerts, to ask whether either of them would take over Myers' role or would suggest another agency to do so;[40] and/or

(b) an informal and friendly chat with the Soviet Ambassador suggesting that, because of our objections to Myers and the impossibility of granting visas to artists brought out by him, the Russians change their impresario.

This does not, admittedly, cope with the Yugoslavs but I would hope that the Yugoslav Ambassador could be persuaded to drop Jerome Concerts without too much difficulty. I should appreciate your comments on these ideas.

To return to the more clear-cut case of the Congress of Canadian Women, I am wondering if it might not still be desirable to say something in the Committee or the House to clarify the position. I am thinking of a statement setting forth first the general policy on sponsorship of Soviet bloc visitors, emphasizing that the objection is to Communist and Communist-front sponsors not to Soviet bloc visitors per se, and second our specific objections to the Congress of Canadian Women. These thoughts are set forth in my memoranda of March 21† and April 6.† I think that a clear statement of Canadian policy in this regard

[40] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I doubt that this is possible. J. L[éger] is important for the sake of public understanding within Canada and for the sake of our dealings with the Russians.

Finally, there is the question of replying to outstanding enquiries. Attached for your signature if you approve are:

(a) A telegram† to Moscow refusing visas for the Soviet women. I would prefer to quote a statement by yourself in the House along the lines suggested in the previous paragraph, but I think it is important that a reply be sent without further delay.

(b) A letter† in reply to the enquiry from Chrysler Corporation of Canada.

There is also an outstanding enquiry from the Congress of Canadian Women, but I think we should stick to the decision not to correspond with the Communist front organizations and let Mr. Pickersgill's statement in the House serve as the reply.

Aide-mémoire du gouvernement de l'Union Soviétique[41]

Aide-mémoire from Government of Soviet Union[41]

Moscow, June 5, 1956

In connection with the Aide Mémoire of the Embassy of Canada in Moscow, handed to the Deputy Chief of the Second European Division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the USSR N.D. Belokhvostikov, by Mr. Collins, Chargé d'Affaires a.i., on May 7, 1956, the Soviet Government advises that it fully shares the opinion of the Government of Canada that the exchange of visits between the USSR and Canada contributes to greater mutual understanding between the Governments and peoples of both countries.

The Government of the USSR agrees with the statement in the Aide Mémoire that the exchange of visits should be based on the principle of reciprocity. So far as the exchange of official visits is concerned, it is taken for granted that the number of official delegations and their composition should be agreed in advance through diplomatic channels. The question of payment of expenses in connection with the sojourn of official delegations could be most easily solved in each case individually, taking into account the wishes of the interested party. Also taken into consideration is the wish of the Canadian Government that Soviet delegations visiting Canada and Canadian delegations visiting the USSR should be small in size.

It goes without saying that when organizing trips to Canada in connection with Canadian private groups, unions (?) or individuals, the Embassy of the USSR in Ottawa will maintain contact with the Department of External Affairs of Canada and inform it when the relevant agreement with the private group, union or individual has been reached.

At the same time the Soviet Government takes note of ("cannot overlook") the statement of Mr. Collins during his talk with N.D. Belokhvostikov on May 7, 1956, regarding the unwillingness on the part of Canada to exchange energetics delegations in 1956, and also his statement regarding the refusal of the Canadian Government in future to issue the Canadian visas to Soviet citizens and organizations leaving for Canada at the invitation of certain public Canadian organizations. Such a practice would mean the limitation of the contacts between two countries and would not assist in the realization of the agreement, stated in the joint Soviet-Canadian communiqué of October 12, 1955, regarding the necessity of developing as much as possible cultural, scientific and technical contacts".[42]

The Soviet Government hopes that the Government of Canada, in addition to official visits, will also encourage the exchange of delegations and information between various Soviet and Canadian institutes and public organizations, which would permit these institutes, organizations and citizens of one country to become better acquainted with the experience and achievements of the other country in the spheres of culture, science, education, sport, care of public health, industry, transport and agriculture.

ADMISSION OF VISITORS FROM THE SOVIET SATELLITE COUNTRIES

You will recall that on February 23, 1956, the Cabinet gave its approval to a memorandum submitted by you entitled "Exchange of visits and information between Canada and the Soviet Union". Among other things, the Memorandum recommended in connection with Soviet visits to Canada that "visas should be denied if the invitations have been issued by Canadian communist or communist-front organizations".

2. We intended that the same regulations should apply to visitors from Soviet satellite countries as well as from the Soviet Union itself, and this extension was omitted merely through an error in drafting. In view of the fact that the Cabinet approved of this and of the other recommendations in the memorandum as constituting "Canadian policy in the matter of the exchange of information and of visits respectively between Canada and the countries of the Soviet Bloc" it may be that members of the Cabinet assumed that the entrance restrictions would apply to both the Soviet Union and its satellites.

3. In case you consider it necessary to go to Cabinet again for a decision on the satellites, I attach a brief draft† submission to Cabinet for your approval. Since the Department of Citizenship and Immigration technically has the responsibility for the granting or refusal of visas other than courtesy or diplomatic ones, you may wish to discuss this matter with Mr. Pickersgill first.

4. A nine-member Czechoslovak cultural delegation applied for visas early in May to come to Canada at the invitation of the communist-dominated Slovak Benefit Society, between June 15 and 20 for a three-week period. In view of the urgency of reaching a decision on this application, I should appreciate knowing whether you agree that visas should not be granted to the delegation.

5. As I noted in my recent memorandum† to you concerning the refusal of visas to a delegation invited by the Association of United Ukrainian Canadians to celebrate the Franko centenary,[43] the Canadian policy on the refusal of visas to groups sponsored by communist-dominated organizations does not seem to be fully understood by the Canadian public. If questions are raised in the House of Commons or the External Affairs Committee in connection with the refusal of visas to either the Soviet or Czechoslovak groups you might wish to explain the policy again and to note that it applies to visitors from the whole Soviet bloc, provided Cabinet agrees to the extension of the policy to the satellites.

ADMISSION OF VISITORS FROM SOVIET SATELLITE COUNTRIES

You had no opportunity to raise this case in Cabinet before your departure and since a decision on the visas had to be taken today, I got in touch with Mr. Pickersgill, who fully endorsed the view that delegations from Soviet satellite countries should be treated in an identical manner to those from the Soviet Union when sponsored by communist dominated Canadian associations. As a result of this conversation it was decided that visas should be refused to the nine-member Czechoslovak cultural delegation which applied for visas to come to Canada at the invitation of the communist dominated Slovak Benefit Society.

Mr. Pickersgill made the further point that you might not consider it necessary to raise this issue in Cabinet.

EXCHANGES OF VISITS WITH THE SOVIET BLOC

During the past year the Soviet Union has displayed an increasing willingness to enter into exchanges of visits with Canada. On the whole we have tended to meet the Soviet advances primarily by imposing restrictions upon the number of visits and the manner in which they could take place and only secondarily by attempting to use them for our own ends. From the way in which the exchanges have been developing it now appears that to meet the pressure upon us to increase the number of visits, to keep up with the example of our allies and to obtain the maximum advantage from the exchanges we shall have to move away from this restrictive attitude and expand considerably our visits programme.

2. The Soviet Union has suggested a large number of exchanges in many different fields both because it finds many of them rewarding in themselves and because it wishes to appear to be taking the initiative in instituting a policy of peaceful co-existence among nations. Both Canadian Government Departments and private Canadian organizations have also produced a variety of proposals for visits. Although our reasons for rejecting many of the proposed visits have been perfectly valid, our attitude has unfortunately appeared to be a purely negative one. We have seemed to be less interested than the Soviet Union in breaking down the barriers between the two countries. A cautious attitude may have sufficed while we were still unsure what was behind the Soviet interest in freer contacts and were uncertain as to how long it would last. Now that the Soviet Union appears likely to continue trying to promote visits it would be preferable for us to wrest the initiative from it as much as possible and recommend or endorse exchanges which will be profitable to us.

3. Facing a similar pressure upon the United States to increase the number of visits, President Eisenhower recently agreed to seek a bilateral increase in exchanges of information and people between the United States and the Soviet Bloc countries along the lines of the programme put forward by the Western Foreign Ministers at Geneva in October 1955. This programme you will remember called for the elimination of barriers to the free flow of information through publications, radio and films and recommended exchanges of visits by people in all walks of life ranging from technicians and artists to private tourists. The United States has already begun to increase contacts with the Soviet Bloc. The United Kingdom and France have been pursuing a similar programme for some time to meet the Soviet Union's overtures and to attempt to push it still further towards liberalization. I do not think that Canada should lag behind these three countries in promoting exchanges of visits.

4. There is already evidence that the visits can be of value to us. Canadian science and technology can learn much from the Soviet Union in certain fields, and many visits have in addition produced information of interest to Canadian intelligence agencies, especially since the Soviet Union is now imposing somewhat fewer restrictions upon what visitors can see. More important, the visits have helped to give many Soviet citizens an opportunity to learn something of a way of life other than their own. Although none of them may have been converted from their basic belief in Communism the contacts have at least led many in important positions to acquire a somewhat more exact idea of the nature of our society and of the aims of our policy. In the long run the opportunity to spread our ideas in the Soviet Union may lead to some liberalization within the Soviet system.

5. The Soviet visits to Canada undeniably do present certain political and security difficulties, but these considerations should not be regarded as overriding. The security dangers can be minimized if we make satisfactory arrangements for the reception of the visitors. If necessary, the size of the R.C.M.P.(SB) should be increased; the development of our relations with the Soviet Union should not be tied to the present size of the Canadian security forces.

6. If we are to increase the number of visits between Canada and the Soviet Bloc, the following are some of the ways by which this can be done:

(a) We should accept a reasonable number of the Soviet visits to Canada proposed by the Soviet Union or non-Communist organizations, including visits by Soviet tourists, if any actually do apply to come here. Although asking for reciprocity, we should permit the visits even if we have no immediate plans for a return trip.

(b) Canadian Government Departments could be encouraged to send specialists to the Soviet Union whenever they consider the visits would be profitable, even if we have to give permission for Soviet specialists to come here in return.

(c) We could welcome requests from responsible non-Communist Canadians to travel to the Soviet Union and offer them advice and assistance (other than financial) whenever practicable.

(d) Both in connection with the visits and independently from them we should attempt to increase the exchange of information with the Soviet Union.

7. The attached memorandum† gives a somewhat fuller analysis of the desirability of increasing the number of visits between Canada and the Soviet Bloc. I should appreciate any comments you may care to make on the ideas developed above.

8. I would not recommend that a new recommendation be submitted to Cabinet at the present time, concerning the need to expand our programme of exchanges with the Soviet Union. The memorandum is intended to point out that it may be difficult in the coming year to maintain our present attitude towards visits. It would be unfortunate if our policy were to be more restrictive than that of our principal allies. In due course it might be advisable to make a progress report to Cabinet.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 27, 1956

UNITED STATES' POLICY ON EAST-WEST EXCHANGES

President Eisenhower agreed late in June that the United States should increasingly take the initiative in seeking exchanges with the countries of Eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union. To institute this programme Mr. Dulles has just appointed a Special Assistant for East-West Exchanges, Mr. W.S.B. Lacy, a former Ambassador to Korea, who will be concerned with exchanges of persons, literature and cultural information.

2. The United States Embassy recently gave us the attached confidential policy information bulletin† which outlines some of the reasons behind the United States' desire to increase the exchanges. The bulletin notes that a 17-point programme of exchanges was submitted at Geneva by the three Western Foreign Ministers. Although agreement was not reached at that time the number of exchanges with the Soviet Bloc has, in fact, increased, and the results of these have been such as to lead the United States to the conclusion that it should increasingly take the initiative in arranging for more.

3. In recommending that the number of exchanges be increased the National Security Council has noted that these should forward the basic United States' policy with respect to the U.S.S.R. of promoting its evolution towards a régime which will seek to promote the aspirations of the Russian people rather than the global ambitions of international Communism and which will increasingly rest upon the consent of the governed rather than on despotic police power. Exchanges with the satellites might help to promote a desire for greater independence from the Soviet Union.

4. The objective would be to increase the knowledge of the Soviet and satellite peoples as to the outside world, to encourage freedom of thought by bringing them challenging ideas, to stimulate the demand for greater personal security, to encourage their desire for more consumer goods and to stimulate nationalism within the satellites. Against the advantages of the exchanges the National Security Council noted that some third countries might misconstrue the United States' policy as indicating that it believed that the Soviet aims had now become more benign. The Council noted, however, that it might be possible to explain to them confidentially that the policy was designed to weaken international Communism and should not be taken as an indication that the United States considers that the Soviet Union is no longer to be feared. The President accepted the National Security Council's view that the United States should take the initiative in promoting exchanges.

5. The United States' decision to increase the number of exchanges with the Soviet Bloc may affect our own programme of exchanges with the Soviet Union. Quite apart from the fact that many Soviet visitors to the United States request permission to come to Canada as well, I think it would be undesirable for us to lag too far behind the United States in this field. You will recall that in a memorandum to you of July 13, 1956, I noted that it might be difficult to maintain our present attitude towards visits. The change in emphasis in the United States' policy provides an additional argument in favour of a more forthcoming approach by the Canadian Government to the question of exchanges with the Soviet Union. It is only by a relatively "liberal" programme of our own, that we could resist pressure from the Russians to accept their visitors to the United States as well, which would be practically impossible for us to handle with our limited resources.[44]

EXCHANGE OF VISITS WITH THE SOVIET UNION

In view of recent Soviet actions in Hungary, I think you will agree that the recommendation for a more liberal exchanges policy towards the Soviet Union, contained in your memorandum to Cabinet of February 3 and approved by the latter on February 23, will now require at least provisional amendments.

2. I would recommend, therefore, that for the immediate future, we take no initiative in the exchange of visits with the Soviet Union, and that we defer consideration of any Soviet proposals in this field.[45] It might be advisable, however, not to make a public announcement to this effect. I would also recommend that we give most careful consideration to adopting a more liberal exchanges policy towards the satellites in the light of the changing situation in that area. I think for example that much can be gained if we encourage more contacts with a country such as Poland which has made considerable progress in breaking away from complete domination by Moscow.[46]

3. You will have noted that steps have already been taken towards restricting our contacts with the Soviet Union. A telegram† and circular document† were sent recently to our posts abroad instructing our representatives in all capitals, except Moscow, normally neither to invite Soviet officials nor accept their invitations; and at other functions to keep social intercourse with Soviet fellow-guests to the bare minimum required by politeness. The restrictions do not apply to satellite officials. The members of the Interdepartmental Panel on the Exchanges of Visits have been asked to defer action on any plans regarding exchanges of visits with the Soviet Union and our missions have been informed accordingly.

4. With regard to exchanges of information, especially in the scientific and technical fields, there appears to be little reason for not permitting these to continue. Exchanges in these fields have now been established on a regular basis between various Government departments and the corresponding Soviet agencies, and have proved to be of considerable value.

5. I do not think that a new memorandum need be submitted to Cabinet at present, but you may wish to discuss this matter at the next Cabinet Meeting you attend.[47] You might draw the attention of Cabinet to the fact that the United States has suspended all pending exchanges with the Soviet Union, although not with the satellites, and that the United Kingdom is also taking steps in this direction.[48]

EXCHANGE OF VISITS WITH THE U.S.S.R. AND THE SATELLITES

Last November, as you know, we decided to defer action on any exchanges of visits with the USSR for an indefinite period. It was felt that developments in Eastern Europe might eventually warrant a more liberal attitude toward exchanges with the Satellites, but, for the time being, we undertook to examine any such exchanges on their merits.

2. As regards the Satellites, I think you will agree that we should in principle favour selective exchanges with all except Hungary, and that we should try to be especially accommodating as regards Poland. It is of interest that the Jewish Theatre of Poland is to visit the United Kingdom and that the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra plans to tour North America, including Toronto and a number of cities in the United States, early in 1958.

3. There remains the question of our policy toward the exchange of visits with the USSR. I would suggest that the time has come for us to reconsider our present policy in this regard.

4. Although the Soviet authorities understand our position very well, they have pressed us for a resumption of those exchanges which were planned before the events in Hungary. During the past five weeks, they have approached our Ambassadors in Moscow and Belgrade; and Mr. Chuvahin and Mr. Strounnikov have raised this question with various officers of the Department in Ottawa. Since we had left the door open for consideration of these plans at a later date, the Soviet authorities have now taken the line that they will have to make alternative plans if they cannot count on us for an early decision. For our part, we may wish to bear in mind that the Soviet Government has not yet placed an order for wheat in 1957.

5. I attach for your convenience a list† of the exchanges for which plans are outstanding. Mr. Chuvahin has raised most of them specifically. The bulk of these proposals have been initiated by the Soviet Government, but the visits concerning ice-breakers and meteorology represent Canadian initiatives. The Department of Transport is anxious to pursue the ice-breakers exchange at once.

6. Perhaps we might now give thought to the possibility of gradually resuming a limited number of exchanges, though no Soviet visits to Canada would take place before July. We might try to keep the first exchanges as small and as inconspicuous as possible,[49] and to plan the relevant itineraries so as to avoid areas in which there are concentrations of Hungarian refugees and other émigré groups. We might limit the exchanges to one or two per month, depending on the size of the delegations and the publicity which these seem likely to attract. We should, I think, make no public announcement about this modification in our policy.

7. It might have been easy to open the door by arranging cultural exchanges, such as, for instance, a visit to Canada by the Moiseyev Folk Ballet. The United States Government has cancelled a visit by this group for the current season, and we have been informed that Canadian impresarios would find it financially difficult to underwrite an artistic tour in Canada unless this is associated with a tour of the USA. However, it may be considered that the Stratford Festival provides us with an opening. The Festival authorities have long been anxious to bring Soviet artists to Stratford, and we have agreed to allow a limited number of Soviet theatrical personnel to come this summer as visitors rather than as performers. If you agree with this approach, we might concentrate on visits in which there is a strong Canadian interest, and which are clearly non-political in character. I see no reason why our people should not go to see Soviet ice-breakers as soon as arrangements can be made with the USSR; the same applies, I think, to meteorology.

8. If we attempt to resume these exchanges, the Soviet authorities will wish a reciprocal programme. Their proposals embrace a wide variety of fields including agriculture, statistics, public health, antibiotics, neurosurgery, labour economics, asbestos production and energetics, and a tour for the pianist Oborin in exchange for Glen Gould's forthcoming tour of the USSR. We shall probably find it inconvenient to grant certain of these requests, such as those concerning energetics and asbestos. The Departments of Trade and Commerce and of Mines and Technical Surveys both advise against the latter exchange in view of the serious Soviet competition for Canadian asbestos markets abroad. It would, in any case, be necessary for the Inter-Departmental Visits Panel to review these proposals.

I agree L.B. P[earson]

9. There appears to be some feeling in the United Kingdom that, unless we are prepared to devote ourselves to the overthrow of the Soviet régime by all possible means, any reasonable step, such as a resumption of the exchange of visits, which is apt to improve relations and to encourage the kind of Soviet public opinion necessary to modify the Soviet régime, is desirable. As you know, the United States at Bermuda did not disagree with the British view that a cautious and controlled resumption of cultural exchanges would be desirable. We have just heard from Canada House (Letter 647 of April 12† attached) that the UK Government has concluded that cultural exchanges should be quietly resumed. Our Delegation to NATO has also reported (Telegram 648 of April 16† attached) that both the French and US Governments have agreed with the British position, and that the US Government has decided unobtrusively to resume exchanges of technical visits with the USSR. I attach for your signature, if you agree, a telegram† to NATO which answers Mr. Wilgress' request for our views on this question before April 23, and which asks our Embassy in Washington for confirmation of this change in US policy.

10. In the meantime, if you agree to a resumption of exchanges along the lines suggested above, we shall consult the Inter-Departmental Visits Panel.[50]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 15, 1956

Dear Mr. Bryce,

As requested in your letter of July 19,† I enclose a report on the operations of the CBC International Service which has been prepared by the Political Co-ordination Section of this Department for the proposed meeting of the special committee of officials.

This report gives a satisfactory outline of the relations between this Department and the CBC-IS, with interesting and important comments on the reception of the short-wave service and the use of transcriptions, and sets out a statement of principles of broadcasting to Soviet and satellite countries for approval by the committee. It does not, however, in my

[50] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes — but we shall have to go carefully until and after June L.B. P[earson] opinion get down to the root of the matter which is the question of the ultimate responsibility within the Government for the operation of the International Service.

The original Order-in-Council, PC 8168 of September 18, 1942, set out very clearly the responsibilities of the CBC and of the Department of External Affairs with regard to the International Service. Paragraph 6 of the Order-in-Council reads:

"The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has, in its national broadcasting service under the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, acquired and gained considerable experience in radio broadcasting and associated programmes, technical and administrative operations. It has trained personnel many of whose services could automatically be applied to the short-wave service. Many of its regular programmes would be used for short wave transmission and it would be responsible for the building of the special short-wave programmes which would largely interlock with those on the national system. It is recommended, therefore, that the Corporation is better equipped than any other body and is the logical one to administer, operate, supervise and control the short-wave broadcasting stations and associated facilities. In view of the fact that such short-wave broadcasts would constitute a factor affecting Canada's relations with the other countries of the Commonwealth, and with foreign countries, the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this field should be carried on in consultation with the Department of External Affairs."

It seems clear from this that the original intention was that the Corporation should be directly and continually responsible for the work of the International Service and that the Department of External [Affairs] should provide advice in matters affecting our relations with other countries.

It appears however that over the past five or six years the CBC management has not done much to "administer, operate, supervise and control the shortwave broadcasting stations..." When Mr. Désy was appointed Director General in 1952 the CBC management in Ottawa seem to have taken the line that they had no further responsibility for the International Service, apart from mere housekeeping details. Mr. Désy set up machinery which allowed for closer liaison between the International Service and the Department of External Affairs in the matter of providing background information and information on Government policy in international affairs, but his appointment did not mean — or at least was not intended to mean — that this Department had assumed an interest in the day to day operation of the shortwave broadcasting service.

With the appointment of Mr. Delafield as Director of the International Service, in succession to Mr. Désy, the nominal link with this Department was broken, but I doubt that the CBC management resumed any closer direction of CBC-IS affairs. As far as the Department is aware, the International Service seems to be regarded by the CBC as a separate establishment operated by its own senior officials, with a minimum of interference from the Corporation. There is little cross fertilization of ideas between the national service and the international service, or easy transfer from say, the West Coast division to the International Service or vice versa. No doubt many of the positions in the International Service requiring a knowledge of foreign languages are highly specialized, but this should not apply to all positions.

The Department of External Affairs has no interest in taking over the responsibility of the operation of the International Service, which is primarily a radio matter and should be run by the best available experts in the field. We think however that better results could be achieved if the CBC management exercised its responsibility "to administer, operate, supervise and control" the International Service. The present situation is probably as unsatisfactory to the CBC as it is to this Department.

I understand that in their brief† to the special committee the CBC will stress the necessity of building, sooner or later, new short-wave transmitters, which will presumably cost several million dollars. It may well be that unless these new transmitters are provided our short-wave broadcasts will only reach a small part of their potential audience. However, I should be reluctant to support a request for the necessary appropriation unless some fairly radical changes were made in the present set-up of the International Service.

I wonder if you and I could meet with Mr. Dunton sometime before the special committee meets, to discuss whether this problem of responsibility for the International Service should be considered by the committee.

I am sending additional copies of the attached report to Mr. Dwyer for distribution to the members of the Committee. No distribution is being given to this letter.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

CBC-IS OPERATIONS

The Department of External Affairs supports the principle that Canada should maintain an international short-wave broadcasting service. Radio offers an effective way of reaching and influencing people's minds and is accepted by all the major countries of the world as a useful instrument of external policy. The great powers, the USSR, the United States and the United Kingdom, are most heavily engaged in international broadcasting and the tremendous effort made by the USSR and the satellites to jam Western broadcasts is an indication of their belief and fear that such broadcasts are potentially effective.

2. The Department has stated in the past its belief that an effort to explain Western life and policies to the people of the Communist countries is worth while. A departmental memorandum written in January 1954 stated:

"If even a modest degree of success is obtained in counteracting incessant Communist propaganda and disabusing the Soviet people of some of the false concepts forced upon them, if the faith in the values of democracy and Christian civilization can be maintained at a healthy level in those countries more recently taken under Soviet sway, the moderate costs of radio broadcasting are well spent."[51]

3. With the easing of international tension, the conflict of ideas has become increasingly important. Canada has a modest influence in the world's political and military affairs and a considerable one in economic affairs. This influence will be strengthened if our views are as widely known as possible and if other countries have an accurate knowledge and understanding of Canada. Radio can play an important part toward this end.

4. An important consideration in assessing the value to Canada of a short-wave broadcasting service has always been its potential usefulness in wartime. In the last war, radio broadcasting, chiefly conducted by the BBC, was a most effective means of encouraging our friends in Occupied Europe and sowing disaffection in the enemy population. Canada came into this field very late and without experience, but its importance was appreciated. In the event of war Canada would want to play a vigorous part in the allied propaganda effort, of which broadcasting would be a vital part. If we did not possess a short-wave service one would have to be created in a hurry. The short-wave transmitters and the very considerable experience of the present CBC-IS staff are assets which should be kept in readiness. (It is notable that nearly 2 1/2 years elapsed between the decision to set up a short-wave service in September 1942 and its inauguration in February 1945.) It should also be noted that the Canadian Government has a considerable investment in this service. In the eleven years of its existence the CBC-IS has cost over $19 million of which $4 1/2 million has been for capital investment and $14 1/2 million for operating expenditures.

5. The Department reaffirms its belief that the work of the CBC-IS is important. It is chiefly concerned that it should be carried out as effectively as possible and that as necessary methods be adapted to changing conditions.

Eastern European Services

6. In its report of May 22, 1954, the special committee of officials recommended a set of directives for broadcasting to the Soviet and satellite countries which was subsequently approved by the Cabinet Committee.[52] These directives were drawn up when there was still very considerable tension between East and West. It is believed that in the changed international atmosphere since the Geneva Conferences of last year, and in the light of the changed internal situation in the USSR and the satellites since the XXth Party Congress, a new directive for CBC-IS broadcasts to the Soviet and satellite countries is required.

7. A draft statement of principles of broadcasting to Soviet and satellite countries is attached as Appendix "A". The emphasis has been placed on the projection of Canada, which of course means not only providing information about Canada, but also expressing a Canadian view of international affairs and, where appropriate, of events in the Soviet and satellite countries. The statement suggests that the International Service should attempt to avoid the imputation of being a propaganda organ which seems to be a widely held opinion of the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe. On the other hand, it should not be merely an imitation of the highly regarded BBC. Our comments on international affairs should reflect the Canadian as a representative Western view. The statement also suggests that direct comments on internal affairs of the USSR and the satellites should be limited, and that our principal criticism of the Communist system can best be expressed indirectly through a positive description of the Canadian way of life, with discussions of common problems and demonstrations of our methods of solving them. Particular attention is drawn to the question of the tone of our broadcasts.

8. It is submitted that a moderate approach will be more likely to attract the listeners' attention and therefore more likely to be effective as propaganda than direct and emotional attacks on communist theory and practice. This approach should find ready acceptance among the educated people in the professions, in the bureaucracy, and in industry, who are most likely to have access to short-wave radios, who are interested in relations between the USSR or the satellites and the outside world, and who have a growing influence in communist society. A second consideration, which should not be allowed to affect the content of our broadcasts, but might well affect their tone is that at some appropriate time a direct approach might be made to the Soviet authorities on the question of jamming. Subsequently similar approaches to the satellite governments might be desirable.

[52] Voir/See Volume 20, Document 698.

9. Before any approach is made to the Soviet authorities we would want to be sure that their monitoring service could not produce any scripts of the CBC-IS broadcasts which they might reasonably claim to be abusive or actively hostile. It would be more difficult to obtain suspension of the jamming of broadcasts to the satellite countries, as their governments are less sure of their position and more vulnerable to outside criticism. However, if the Soviet authorities set an example, the satellite authorities might decide to follow suit in due course.

Liaison with the Department of External Affairs

10. The present arrangements for keeping the CBC-IS informed of Government policy and Departmental views on international affairs and for supplying them with available background information for their broadcasts would seem to be adequate. The Political Co-ordination Section of the Department, which was set up in 1953, maintains this liaison through letters of guidance, weekly selections of classified material and by frequent telephone consultation between Ottawa and Montreal. In addition, there is an interchange of visits between members of the section and of other divisions of the Department and of members of the CBC-IS staff. The CBC-IS representative in Ottawa also keeps in constant touch with this Department and with other Government departments.

11. The Department has wondered whether the CBC-IS directing staff might be able to improve its methods of giving policy and editorial guidance and direction to the different language sections and to the Eastern European sections in particular. There appears to be a division of responsibility between the policy co-ordination unit and the supervisor of language sections with regard to the actual output of the sections. In order to apply the principles suggested in the attached Appendix "A" consistently and successfully, it might be necessary to exercise closer direction over the various language sections, giving them ideas for their programmes, discussing projected scripts and infusing a greater sense of unity and purpose into the total effort. If a suitable person were available, the CBC-IS might consider the appointment of an officer who would be directly responsible to the Director for all programmes to Soviet and satellite countries. There would be no point in making such an appointment unless the person chosen was highly qualified, with expert knowledge of international affairs and of Eastern Europe, experienced in broadcasting and newspaper work and with a wide knowledge of Canada. It would also be most desirable that he should be able to speak at least one of the languages used, so that he could judge directly the work produced. Such a person could not easily be found, but the possibility should be kept in mind.

12. With regard to the personnel of the language sections, the Department has noted that two of the sections, the Polish and the Ukrainian, are headed by Canadian-born citizens, of French and English backgrounds respectively, rather than by former nationals of the countries concerned. This is a development which should be encouraged as experience has shown how difficult it is for the émigré members of the broadcasting staff, even with the best will in the world, to divest themselves of their old loyalties and prejudices. To have effective control the heads of sections ought to be completely familiar with the language of their section and should be assisted and encouraged in their study of it. As a long-term plan the International Service should develop specialists with a thorough knowledge of the various target countries, but with a strong Canadian background.

Reception of CBC-IS Signals

13. Canadian diplomatic missions in areas to which CBC-IS programmes are directed were asked in June and July of this year to carry out a monitoring exercise and to let us know how well they can hear CBC-IS programmes in the language of their posts and in English on radio receivers normally available to members of their staff. The replies received were on the whole very disappointing and are summarized in the attached Appendix "B".† Our mission in Prague reported that they were able to hear the beginning of the Czech programme on a number of occasions but that it was heavily jammed after the first few minutes. They were also able to hear CBC-IS programmes in English with fair success. Our mission in Warsaw was completely unable to hear CBC-IS programmes either in Polish or in English, because of jamming and interference. The mission in Moscow reported that they were totally unable to hear CBC-IS signals because of jamming.

14. Reports from missions in Western Europe, including those in Stockholm, Oslo, Bonn, Berlin, The Hague and London, were uniformly discouraging. Only one of fifteen staff members who tried to monitor CBC-IS programmes on their home sets in Bonn was able to hear the programmes with any degree of consistency, using a fairly expensive radio. The staff members of other missions listed above all reported very little success in hearing the programmes. Our Embassy in Madrid reported poor reception of the Latin American service in Spanish but that reception of CBC French and English programmes was satisfactory. None of our missions reported having met a significant number of people who listen to CBC-IS programmes.

15. The reports from our missions must not be taken as proof that CBC-IS short-wave signals cannot be heard by people who are in the habit of listening to short-wave broadcasts. Most members of Canadian missions abroad are obviously not accustomed to short-wave listening and their personal reports have little technical value. It is however their belief that short-wave listeners in most countries are a rather specialized group, representing only a very small proportion of the general population. The report by the BBC Monitoring Service, summarized in Appendix "B", presumably based on the use of powerful receivers, with its preponderance of fair, or fair/poor and poor reports for the month of May 1956 does not give much assurance that even this specialized group is well served. There is evidence that CBC-IS programmes relayed by the BBC on medium-wave are received satisfactorily in Europe.

16. It may be that the European area, with its heavy concentration of broadcasting stations in every country and of jamming stations in the satellites and the USSR, is particularly difficult to reach by shortwave from Canada. It is also realized that 1956 is a particularly bad year for reception because of the sunspot cycle. Reports from other parts of the world, including South America, Australia and Japan, and the many listeners' letters received by the CBC-IS, would indicate that the signals are usually received very satisfactorily. The best solution to this problem might be the provision of new and more powerful short-wave transmitters to replace the present transmitters at Sackville, N.B. which were built fourteen years ago.

Relays and Transcriptions

17. It is the Department's view that whenever they can be used, relays and transcriptions of Canadian programmes are a great deal more effective than short-wave programmes. Nearly every mission which reported difficulty in hearing the short-wave broadcasts, expressed enthusiasm for the use of transcriptions and recommended their increase. Our Ambassador in Norway, Mr. Ronning, said:

> "The programmes prepared in Canada which are broadcast over the Norwegian long-wave system are of tremendous value. I listen to these broadcasts and I hear comments very frequently after each one from people in Oslo who have been impressed. The trouble is that there are so few of such broadcasts. I am quite certain that arrangements could be made for a larger number of such broadcasts."

Our missions in The Hague, Bonn, Berlin, London, Stockholm and Madrid all made similar comments.

18. The Department of External Affairs would support any proposals put forward by the International Service to increase and widen the scope of the transcription service. It is not suggested, however, that the weekend service of broadcasts to the Netherlands, Italy and the Scandinavian countries should be abandoned altogether. It seems reasonable that the regular weekly service is necessary to give continuity to the work of the language sections, which would in any case be responsible for increasing the output of transcribed programmes. There are also many types of programme useful to Canada which do not lend themselves to transcriptions or which would not be acceptable to foreign broadcasting organizations in this form and can only be sent out on the short-wave service.

19. The Department thinks that, generally speaking, arrangements for placing of transcriptions should be made directly by the CBC-IS with the broadcasting authorities concerned. It is however important that the missions be kept informed of all CBC-IS dealings with radio organizations in their territory. Our missions are of course glad to help in establishing contacts and expediting delivery of discs, when necessary.

20. The point was made by our mission in Berlin that German broadcasting authorities might be more interested in broadcasting Canadian programmes if they could expect some degree of reciprocity. The CBC might want to consider whether arrangements between the International Service and the National Network to this end could be improved.

21. The Department would also be interested in building up libraries of 12-inch LP transcriptions in missions which request them, which could be lent to radio stations and to schools, colleges and private individuals, in the same way as NFB films are used at present. It welcomed the initiation of this project a few years ago and hopes that it may be extended.

Television

22. It is understood that the CBC-IS report will mention the question of developing international exchanges of television programmes and whether the International Service should have primary responsibility in this field. As the National Film Board and CBC-TV are already establishing contacts with TV authorities in different countries, this is a matter which the Committee should consider. Should the International Service have a budget allocation for processing television kinescopes for placement abroad or should Canadian participation in television abroad be left to the National Film Board and to exchange arrangements made directly by CBC-TV? Our missions have pointed out that television is developing rapidly in many countries which have shown an interest in our radio programmes and this important medium for the further projection of Canada should not be neglected.

Appendice A

Appendix A

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 24, 1956

PRINCIPLES OF BROADCASTING TO SOVIET AND SATELLITE COUNTRIES

I.

The object of CBC-IS broadcasts to Soviet and satellite people is primarily the projection of Canada as part of a co-ordinated political offensive of the Western world. The Eastern European services should promote understanding and friendship between their listeners and the Canadian people by presenting the Canadian view of international affairs, emphasizing that it is part of the Western viewpoint; by reporting events in Canada and by providing a picture of the Canadian way of life. Our principal means of expressing our criticism of the communist system should be through factual descriptions of life in Canada which the listener can contrast with conditions within the Soviet orbit.

2. As the Canadian service is generally only carried on two short-wave frequencies in the midst of a great volume of broadcasts from the BBC, the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, etc., our programmes should have a distinctive quality and appeal which will attract and hold an audience among the limited number of persons who are interested in listening to short-wave broadcasts and who possess the necessary radio equipment. For this reason the tone of our broadcasts should not differ from that used in broadcasting to the rest of the world. They should be restrained and moderate in approach, clear and vivid in language and style and should show respect for the foreign listeners' intelligence, common-sense and national feelings. An additional factor to be considered is that the Soviet authorities have recently stopped deliberately jamming the BBC broadcasts in Rùssia; until jamming of CBC-IS programmes is lifted our service to the USSR, at least, will operate under a serious handicap in the competition for listeners. A consistent, moderate, though uncompromising approach in our broadcasts may make it easier to suggest to the Soviet authorities at some future date that if they are sincere in their desire to promote good relations with Canada they should put an end to the jamming of our short-wave broadcasts.

News Service

3. It is generally agreed that the backbone of the short-wave service to Soviet and satellite countries must be the news. We should present a reliable, balanced and completely objective international news service to counter the one-sided presentation of news in their own press and radio. There should be no suppression of news which might put the Western powers in an unfavourable light. Indeed, the problems of the Western community should be exploited in frank discussion to contrast the freedom of the members of that community with the rigid conformity which characterizes the internal relationships of the Soviet bloc. Because it is the voice of Canada, a deliberately generous share of interesting news of Canadian affairs should be included in the bulletins. Whenever available, reliable items of Eastern European news should also be included.

Commentaries

4. A considerable proportion of the programmes will be commentary on international affairs. This should be given from a Canadian point of view, giving due attention to the explanation of Canadian Government policy. Good coverage should be given to the United Nations, NATO and the Commonwealth about which Soviet and satellite listeners may not be well informed. Inevitably there will be discussion of Soviet foreign policy on which our views presumably will be of interest to listeners in Eastern Europe. When the Soviet Union acts in a dangerous and irresponsible manner, or when it tries to disguise with high-sounding propaganda actions really designed to enhance its power position, we should not hesitate to say so but should do so coolly and frankly, with restraint and reasonableness. On the other hand, when the Soviet Union acts in a responsible and helpful manner, we should be at pains to welcome the fact and should certainly not automatically question the sincerity of its motives.

5. Comment on the internal affairs of the Soviet Union or of the satellite states should occupy only a very small proportion of the total programme content. In any discussion of internal affairs developments which suggest a move toward a more liberal atmosphere should be welcomed and listeners should be encouraged to think of further specific concessions, similar to those which are enjoyed in the West. The theme of the superiority of the Western and the inferiority of the Soviet way of life should not continually be belaboured in the abstract. In dealing with news of internal affairs authentic reports of events or conditions which have been hidden by the Soviet or satellite authorities from their people should be featured. To deal with a development in Eastern Europe which is highly significant of the local way of life, but perhaps insufficiently spectacular to merit lengthy treatment, an item should be produced on a comparable theme from Canadian life, with only a passing allusion to the Eastern European development, so that the facts themselves point up the contrast.

6. Discussion of Communist theory, qua theory, should be cut out altogether. The Russian people already have a surfeit of Marx and Lenin and their boredom with it should be recognized. Effectively to challenge theory in a series of short broadcasts which have to deal with so much else is virtually impossible. Let the challenge to theory come more subtly in a sustained pragmatic approach to developments which is ultimately more effective and more typical of Canadians.

Projection of Canada

7. The projection of Canada should now occupy a higher proportion of space in Eastern European programmes. It should perform a dual purpose of promoting understanding of our way of life and of our country, and of allowing listeners to make comparisons with their own conditions. In this connotation most of our criticism of the Communist way of life should be made by example alone. It should be implicit rather than explicit. The presentation should be entirely straightforward, letting the facts speak for themselves.

8. Exchanges of visits between Canada and Soviet Russia, or the satellite countries, would be given good coverage but should be used as a peg on which to hang the projection of Canada. We should try to obtain radio interviews with Soviet visitors for short-wave broadcasts or, if this proves feasible, for broadcast on Soviet radio.

9. The presence in Canada of sizeable ethnic groups from the countries to which we broadcast should be exploited although, of course, the CBC-IS should never be represented as their particular spokesman. The purpose of such programmes should be to promote closer relations and sympathy between Canada and the countries concerned and not to foment discontent against the Soviet and satellite régimes. The material successes of these new Canadians, their satisfaction with conditions in Canada and pride in their Canadian citizenship, their preservation of their native cultures and their continuing love for their homeland should all be made clear, as a demonstration of the reasons why several generations of their people have come to Canada.

Tone of Broadcasts

10. If the above principles are to be followed, great attention should be paid to the tone of our broadcasts which influences the attitude of the listener.

(a) Restraint

Individuals in communist-controlled countries are subjected to a constant stream of bombastic propaganda from their own authorities and are apt to discount and disbelieve overt propaganda from the West. Our listeners should be made to feel that we are not trying to convert them, but merely to express and explain the Canadian point of view on matters of mutual interest. Generalized and over-simplified condemnations of the Communist system serve no purpose. Judgment must be made of specific issues and conveyed gently. Phrases loaded with emotion should be avoided at all times — e.g. "bloody battle", "wrath of the Polish people", "hated régime", etc. (The supervisors of the International Service may need to remind some of their talented émigré staff members that they are speaking not as Poles or Czechs or Russians but as Canadians who are by nature considerably less emotional and who take a more detached view of events and conditions in Europe.)

(b) Vividness

The vivid concrete image should be preferred at all times to the theoretical and abstract. In discussions of international news, of Eastern European affairs, or of Canada, the facts must be encouraged to speak for themselves. Lectures and homilies should be avoided. Rather than a general discussion of hydro-electric power in Canada, for example, a picture of one particular power station might be presented; rather than figures about the amount of electricity consumed in Canada, the great part played by electrical equipment in our daily lives could be illustrated. Direct evidence should be used whenever possible — interviews with people, including visitors and immigrants, actuality broadcasts, etc. The criterion for any programme should be that it is alive and of interest to a reasonably wide group of listeners. If it is dull it will be a failure.

(c) Respect for the Listeners

A continuing effort should be made by the authors of scripts to place themselves in the position of their audience and to show respect and consideration for the listeners' intelligence, common sense and national pride, and to show appreciation of the difficulties under which they live. Preaching and moralizing should be avoided. Listeners should not be told as news, facts about their own country which they know all too well such as the shortage of housing, the high cost of living, long hours of work, etc. These facts can be referred to but they should be used intelligently and sympathetically in a way which will not antagonize the listeners.

In discussing problems of a free society, we should not apologize for them or explain them away, but by describing how we are tackling them, demonstrate what is meant by freedom. Rather than condemning communist actions, questions should be asked to exploit the puzzling discrepancy between the dictates of common sense and the communist policy underlying the event. Sharp hostility should be avoided — the attitude should be that of an interested observer. Improvements in the communist régime should be welcomed and hope expressed for their extension.

11. The above suggestions for moderation in tone should not mean any weakening in the force and effectiveness of our broadcasts to the Soviet and satellite area. They are put forward in the hope that what the International Service has to say about world affairs and about Canada will have a greater chance of influencing the target audience.

II.

12. While the above principles should be followed in all of the services to Eastern Europe, the different situation in the countries concerned will require some variations in approach.

Russian Service

13. It should be remembered that an entire generation of Russians has lived under communism for their whole lives and that the possibility of a counter-revolution has long since disappeared. Material conditions have improved substantially in the USSR during the past few years and the people are not basically dissatisfied with the Soviet system. They are conscious of the USSR's strength as a great power and are proud of their national achievements. They have also been so thoroughly imbued with their own peace propaganda that they are inclined to believe that all threats of war come from the "imperialist" camp. However, the intellectual and political developments of the past three years — the destalinization campaign, the encouragement of criticism, discussions of "democratization" and decentralization — are evidence that new ideas are appearing and offer new opportunities for the West to force the Russians to think for themselves. In attempting to reach their minds, our efforts should be concentrated on dispelling the ignorance and misunderstanding caused by their isolation from the rest of the world, and on encouraging the native desire for a more liberal régime.

Ukrainian Service

14. Although the Ukrainian service of the CBC-IS owes its existence to direct pressure from the various Ukrainian associations in Canada, its programmes should not be allowed to differ in any significant way from those of the Russian service and should be guided by the same general principles. It should avoid any tendency to identify itself with the Ukrainian community, although naturally it will use the strong Ukrainian element in Canada as a means to obtain the interest of the Ukrainian listeners.

15. It is not the policy of the Canadian Government to advocate the setting up of an independent Ukrainian state, and our broadcasts must not give a false impression on this point. We recognize that the Ukraine has a strong cultural tradition which ought to be encouraged and maintained, although we believe that an independent Ukraine is politically unobtainable so long as the USSR remains a major power. We should encourage the Ukraine to foster their cultural traditions and keep them informed of the strong interest in preserving Ukrainian history in Canada. In commenting on the trend towards liberalization we might suggest that the Ukrainian S.S.R. should be granted a genuine federal relationship within the Soviet Union. The analogy of the federal solution in Canada to our bi-national problem might be demonstrated.

16. It is likely also that the Ukrainian audience of the CBC-IS is predominately rural and the Ukrainian service should bear this in mind in its selection of programme material. Greater direct use might be made of Canadian-Ukrainian material in the form of actuality broadcasts, interviews, etc. The Return to the Homeland campaign should be countered by demonstrating in live broadcasts the attractiveness of life for Ukrainians in Canada. CBC-IS should make use of the special nature of the Ukrainian community to add interest to its broadcasts to the Soviet Union, but should not allow itself to be used by the Ukrainian community.

Polish, Czech and Slovak Services

17. As the evidence shows that the Communist régimes in Poland and Czechoslovakia have not captured the support of more than a minority of the people of these countries, it can be assumed that nearly all of the listeners to our programmes in these countries will show some sympathy for the Western point of view. Our broadcasts, therefore, should give the impression that they are directed to friends who have known something about Western culture and traditions, and who can conceive of alternative solutions to problems more readily than can the Russians.

18. Our broadcasts should show an awareness of the ferment going on in the satellite countries, sympathy for the struggle of an area which has long lacked economic development and suffered from rural unemployment and appreciation of the desire of the people for a better standard of living and greater freedom. At the same time we should not lecture them, nor, as outsiders, either attempt to advise them how to fight their battle or hold out false hopes of "liberation" which could only be brought about by a major war. They should be encouraged to continue in their struggle to achieve a better and freer life in an alien system which has been imposed upon them.

19. Any tendency towards Titoism in the satellite governments should be welcomed. Our broadcasts should appeal to the national pride of the Czechs, Poles, etc., and encourage them wherever possible to assert their independence of the Soviet Union. We must recognize that the satellites, for geographical reasons alone, will be forced to maintain some kind of alliance with the USSR but it can be suggested that it need not be complete domination and that the people of these countries should not allow themselves to be exploited. In this connection the Russian colonial treatment of the satellites in matters of trade, investment, etc. can also be brought out.

RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET SATELLITES

I attach herewith a paper which I have prepared on this subject. It attempts to examine recent developments in the Satellites and Western policy with regard to them. It concludes with a few suggestions as to how we might take the initiative in this field.

2. It is, of course, rather speculative, and I should be grateful for your comments.

3. If you think there is any value in my suggestions we could try them out on the Foreign Office, and get the reactions of some of our missions.

R.A.D. FORD

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du chef de la Direction européenne

Memorandum by Head, European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], January 18, 1956

RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET SATELLITES

We have given a good deal of attention in recent months to our relations with the U.S.S.R., in the light of recent modifications in Soviet tactics.[53] But we have neglected almost completely the question of our relations with the European satellites of the Soviet Union, and have tended, in fact, simply to assume that they should be treated as appendages of Soviet policy. I think there is good reason to take exception to this theory, and I have therefore reviewed the situation with the aim of seeing if our present policy is satisfactory and, if changes are required, what they might be. This paper represents a first examination of the subject and, as in all attempts to deal with Soviet policy, is highly speculative.

Recent Developments in the Satellites

2. The slight easing of tensions in the past year between East and West has not brought about any significant change in the relationship of the satellite countries and the Soviet Union, and only a slight improvement in their relations with the West. Their governments still remain puppets of the Soviet leaders in Moscow, servile to Soviet political and economic ends, and dependent on the USSR for support against a predominantly hostile, oppressed populace.

3. The communist governments of Eastern Europe continue to keep a tight hold over their peoples. Economically the drive is still towards greater industrialization and collectivization, with the result that, as in the USSR, agriculture lags behind industry in per capita productivity. Production and trade have been oriented toward that of the Soviet Union, and very close industrial links developed. This economic dependence has become an important deterrent against the risk that these countries might try to break away from the Soviet orbit.

4. Some minor concessions have been made in the past year. In some of the Eastern European countries the people seem a bit better fed and clothed than in previous years, although the overall grim, shabby poverty remains. Following Khrushchev's emergence to power, most of the satellite governments again followed the Soviet line by stressing heavy industry at the expense of consumer goods. However, while cabinet shuffles occurred in Hungary and Roumania, there were no major purges nor extra harshness in domestic policy. The Russians made a number of moves designed to shift their dominance over the satellites from overt to covert control; these included the relinquishing of their share in the joint stock companies seized as part of war reparations, the withdrawal of a number of their troops from Hungary and Roumania and the establishment of the Warsaw Pact ostensibly on the basis of equal sovereign association. Moscow has also permitted the satellite governments to increase considerably their trade with Western countries. Besides the Czech arms deal with Egypt a number of agreements have been reached involving exchange of Western surplus agricultural commodities for satellite industrial products. These represent marginal purchases on the part of the Satellites however, for they have shown little interest in multilateral trade or in adjusting the exchange value of their currency, which in most cases is closely tied to the rouble, to a realistic dollar or sterling rate. Recent indications are that a substantial part of Eastern Europe's new export trade may be directed for political reasons to the under-developed countries at prices below cost.

5. At the present time, despite the largely passive antagonism of the people, the communist governments of Eastern Europe seem to be well entrenched. Through the existence of Soviet troops, the highly organized terror of the secret police and the monolithic structure of government and party organization, the expression of effective opposition in any overt form has been impossible. The failure of the West to elicit any real concessions from the Soviet Union at the two Geneva Conferences seems to have, at least temporarily, extinguished many of the hopes of those who looked to us for liberation.

Soviet Intentions in Eastern Europe

6. The Soviets have gained considerable advantage by maintaining real control over the countries of Eastern Europe. These countries serve as a buffer zone against the "hostile, capitalist camp" of the West, and their addition to the Soviet orbit has added prestige and military and economic power to the USSR. They also count as additional communist voices in the international agencies and conferences which they attend. The economies of these states have been diverted away from their normal type of production and marketing in order to serve the ends of Soviet planners. Through these economic and political ties the USSR hopes that in the long run all of Eastern Europe will succumb to a permanent form of communism which does not require Soviet armed might to preserve it. Finally, the mere continuation of their control greatly strengthens Soviet bargaining position in any top-level discussions to reduce international tensions.

7. It seems quite certain that government leaders in the satellite countries do not wish to see the effective withdrawal of Soviet control. Aware of their growing isolation from the people, they look to the Soviet Union for their own preservation, and are as a result inclined to be even more rigid in their policies than the Soviet authorities. The likelihood of their attempting some type of Titoist independence is remote, for not only do they lack the popular support necessary to offset Soviet sanctions, but their borders are also much more vulnerable to Soviet pressure than that of Yugoslavia. Furthermore the satellite leaders have been chosen by and are wholly compromised creatures of the Kremlin, and so long as the entire machinery of police control and propaganda is in their hands no alternative to Soviet communism has any chance to develop. Where some degree of liberalism is permitted it generally indicates Soviet confidence in the reliability of the satellite and its government. It is highly significant that the most "liberal" of the satellites, Poland, is also the country which seems to be regarded most favourably by the USSR.

8. It is possible, however, that the Soviet leaders realize that totalitarian control over people who are historically hostile to Russia cannot be maintained indefinitely. Undoubtedly they, as do the communist régimes in these countries, realize how widespread is the discontent and opposition. Their rapprochement with Tito and the settlement of the Austrian Peace Treaty did much to stir popular hopes in the prospects for eventual freedom or at least Yugoslav-type national independence. It is perhaps significant that the supporters of Rajk in Hungary and Slansky in Czechoslovakia who were purged for "Titoist activities" have been edging back into favour in the past few months, undoubtedly as a consequence of the Belgrade Declaration in May.

9. There can be little doubt that if there is a change in the relationship between the USSR and the countries of Eastern Europe it will come about at the time and choosing of the Soviet leaders. It has become quite apparent that the West will not resort to armed force to liberate the satellites. Thus as long as the Soviet leaders construe it to their net advantage to continue their hold there is little likelihood that their domination can be overthrown.

Western Policy towards the Satellites

10. The leading Western nations, while in general agreement with regard to the satellites, differ somewhat in their policies towards the governments and peoples of the satellite countries. The United States has taken a more rigid stand concerning communist domination of Eastern Europe, and has continued to demand publicly that the USSR end its domination and grant freedom to the people of these states. As late as Dec. 31, 1955, a White House press statement, approved by President Eisenhower states: "The peaceful liberation of the captive peoples has been, is and will continue to be a major goal of United States foreign policy".[54] This decision is predicated on the assumption that it is the duty of the West to keep alive the hope that through Western firmness the Soviet Union will be forced at last to relinquish its hold. In practice the United States Government has, while recognizing some of the régimes, publicly disapproved of them and when possible avoided close association with them. It has unofficially endorsed the aims of Radio Free Europe and officially sponsors the more moderate Voice of America broadcasts directed to the peoples themselves. Recent indications are, however, that the U.S. is perhaps moderating its views on the subject, e.g., the toning down of its Voice of America broadcasts and President Eisenhower's proposal to Congress to export agricultural surpluses to communist countries.

11. There is some disagreement among other Western governments with this approach as being too inflexible and unimaginative. They consider that as long as the Soviet Union maintains its hegemony over the satellite countries there is little possibility for "peaceful liberation." To continue to espouse publicly this cause without being able to take any effective action will in the long run only convince a despairing people that the West is being weak and hypocritical. They argue that we should take every opportunity to deal with the communist régimes in order to promote increased contacts with the West and possibly to modify internal conditions in the satellites.

12. The French Government in the last year has taken the lead in responding to Soviet, Czech, Polish and Hungarian overtures, especially in the cultural field. By increasing the area of contacts they hope that enough "free aid" will permeate the Curtain to offset whatever political capital the communists hope to achieve. Such a policy, they argue, permits greater flexibility than does the U.S. approach, it provides us with greater opportunity to expose subtly the arbitrary restrictions, injustices and exploitation incumbent in Soviet domination, and it enables us to encourage a spirit of independence which may force the satellite régimes to grant concessions.

13. Yugoslavia, as might be expected, has adopted a third course. While espousing communism per se, President Tito has condemned the continuing rule of unpopular régimes dependent on Soviet support and hostile to Yugoslav independence. He has, with considerable success, urged all the satellite governments to follow the Soviet lead, recant, and restore on Yugoslav terms, old commercial and cultural ties. There is little indication, however, that he has modified his basic distrust of most of the régimes, especially Hungary's, and he has not reduced Yugoslav defences, which are largely on the frontiers with the satellites.

[54] Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXIV, No. 864, January 16, 1956, pp. 84-85.

14. Students of the satellite question can generally be divided into two groups, those who discount the possibilities of Titoism and advocate a firm policy towards the satellite régimes, and those who urge a moderate policy towards the régimes in order to stimulate tendencies of independence. Those in the first group predicate their policies on the same assumption as does the United States, — that to co-operate with the communist governments tends to lend official sanction to their actions. They consider that members of these régimes neither wish for nor are able to achieve Titoist type independence, and that in fact their long run aims are for closer orientation towards the USSR. It would be folly, therefore, to play into the hands of the communists by co-operating with the puppet governments; rather we should direct our attention to the plight of the people, expose the ruthless actions of their governments and hold on to our hope that "peaceful liberation" is at least fairly close at hand.

15. This policy stems largely from United States internal political considerations. The Republicans gained a large number of votes in 1952 from persons of Eastern European origin and the Eisenhower government would find it difficult to depart publicly from the policy of "peaceful liberation." More positive objections, however, are that incitement to oppose the régimes in Eastern Europe, without any positive assistance from the inciters, in the long run is against the interests of both parties, particularly if there seems to be very little hope of liberation. It can lead only to hypocrisy on the one hand and disillusion on the other, for, if active incitement is used it runs the risk of sparking a hopeless revolt. All that can be said for it is that it keeps the Soviet government on the defensive, as witness the immediate reaction to President Eisenhower's Christmas message.

16. Those of the second school of thought argue that while rejecting the dictatorial nature and ends of the satellite régimes, we should recognize that they are firmly established, and will continue to be so as long as the USSR maintains its hold. The argument runs that efforts directly on behalf of the people are futile, and that the only real hope for amelioration of conditions is through the possibility that the régimes themselves will acquire greater national independence and more liberal policies. While the chances for democracy as we know it are remote, (only Czechoslovakia has any real tradition of democracy, and it spans but a 20-year period) through greater trade and direct contact we might well encourage such Titoist tendencies as exist. For a large segment of the population of Eastern Europe have long had close religious, economic, cultural and political ties with Western Europe, and still feel themselves "Europeans" in a sense few Russians ever did.

17. The reaction in the satellites to the two Geneva conferences illustrates the difficulty in choosing between the two policies. Before Geneva I, a large number of persons, in Czechoslovakia at any rate, seriously believed that the heads of state might, under Western pressure agree to organize free elections. The "spirit of Geneva" resulted in a feeling of betrayal; if the situation was hopeless, anti-Communists in Eastern Europe argued, it would be better for the remnants of the bourgeois classes to make their peace with the régime. But the effect on the satellite régimes seems also to have been unsettling, and may be one of the reasons which prompted Moscow to take a strong line at the second Geneva Conference. In particular, the Russians probably wished to scotch the idea that they might be prepared to sacrifice their satellite régime in East Germany.

18. Put briefly, then, the dilemma can be summarized as follows. The policy of ostracism is related principally to the question of relations with the USSR, and is intended to be one way of keeping the Russians on the defensive. But it also runs the risk of alarming the Russians and of convincing them of the aggressive intentions of the West. It has little effect on the satellite régimes except possibly to force them into even more absolute dependence on Moscow, and it has practically no hope of achieving its end of "peaceful liberation."

19. The policy of improving relations with the satellite régimes recognizes the impossibility of overthrowing these governments, but hopes to be able gradually to modify them with the ultimate aim of creating more Titoist régimes, or at least of modifying their dependence on Moscow. It runs the danger in the interim period of discouraging the anti-communist elements in those countries and of strengthening the communist governments. It proceeds, however, on the assumption that Eastern Europe is the weakest and the most "Western" part of the Soviet bloc, and therefore the area most fertile for western activity.

Conclusions

20. Canada should, I believe, follow a course between the two alternatives outlined above. Naturally we agree in private with the hope for "peaceful liberation" of the satellites but to the best of my knowledge we have never officially associated ourselves with the U.S. policy. At the same time we have attempted to avoid policies which are unduly provocative and self-defeating.

21. I am inclined to discount the possibility that any of the satellite countries could independently adopt a Titoist role. At present Soviet control is too tight for this to happen, — any apparent relaxation seems due not to satellite pressure but rather reflects the degree of confidence which the USSR has in their docility. This means that Soviet leaders, if they wish to give the impression of loosening their control, have room for manoeuvre without altering the realities of the situation. The only two issues which would really indicate Soviet relaxation, — free elections and the complete liberalization of East-West contacts — are unacceptable to them.

22. However even if we rule out the possibility of Titoism among the satellite governments, I think it would be unwise to take a rigid non-cooperative attitude. Instead I believe that, while making it clear that we disapprove of their totalitarian tactics, we should adopt a policy of promoting greater contacts between the satellite countries and the West. We could, where not to our disadvantage, encourage commercial and technical exchanges, especially with those countries which like Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary have shown an interest in trading with us, and also encourage such cultural links as sports exchanges, the exchange of films, packaged radio broadcasts, documentary publications, and artists and technicians. We could perhaps also ensure that the tone of our C.B.C.-I.S. broadcasts is in keeping with these aims.

23. In this connection, I have long felt that Chancellor Adenauer and others were justified in their complaints that Western — and particularly United States — propaganda to Eastern Europe was far too prone to stress the material achievements of the industrialized Western states and their relatively luxurious level of personal consumption. As the Chancellor has recently reiterated in his year-end statement (which has since been elaborated in an official German Government Bulletin entitled "Conflict of Ideologies") — "We are in danger of recognizing the very materialism we are trying to oppose as the basis of life and society. We would wind up in the grotesque situation in which the Russians would only be materialists in theory while the Western peoples would be materialists in their manner of thought and living".

24. This point of view is, it seems to me, particularly applicable to the problem of what to say to the Eastern European peoples. Certainly economic conditions in Eastern Europe are bad and Western propaganda should not miss the opportunity of rubbing in the imposed sacrifices which the consumer in Communist societies is compelled to make for the sake of the very rapid expansion of heavy industry and the building up of the military machine. But by and large the Eastern European peoples are not anti-Communist because they are being deprived of refrigerators. They are anti-Communist because they feel that Communism is opposed to the whole basis of European civilization which is broadly Christian in faith and liberal in political practice. This is the Europe from which these people now feel themselves forcibly cut off. This should, therefore, be the core of our appeal to the Eastern European peoples. After all, in another five or ten years Communism will probably be able to give them refrigerators. But Communism will give them our Western values only, as Khrushchev said last September, "when shrimps learn to whistle".

25. The suggestions outlined above are very general, and we should examine each step with the utmost care. One probable result, which we wish to avoid at present, is that the satellite countries will make increasing demands for the exchange of missions or the establishment of trade representatives and/or consulates here.

26. If the new Soviet tactics are to continue, and all the evidence points this way, we can expect determined Soviet efforts, by diplomatic means and coupled with offers of economic aid, to weaken the Western alliances in Europe, and in the Middle East and South-East Asia. It seems to me that the West might equally try to exploit this new period which we are approaching by a diplomatic and political offensive against the Soviet bloc. I think an offensive of bluster and hostility will be ineffective against both extremities — China, and the European satellites. But I equally think that a more skilful and more determined attempt to detach them from the USSR would at least have an unsettling effect on Russia, even if we were not able to achieve our ultimate goal.

27. The first step we ought to take is to try to establish closer contact with the satellite governments and peoples, and the opportunities for this are opening up. We should then make it clear that we have no intention of trying to change the social systems in these countries, either by force or otherwise. It is up to these countries to decide by themselves their form of government. We only object to this form of government being imposed from the outside. We should make it clear that we are not advocating a return to prewar régimes, most of which, with the exception of Czechoslovakia, would probably by now be quite unacceptable to the people. We should equally make it clear to the Russians that we recognize their legitimate security interests in Eastern Europe and attempt in some way to reassure them that a relaxation of Soviet control would not mean the immediate extension of United States and NATO influence up to the frontiers of the USSR.

28. I am not suggesting that this is very easy to work out, or implement, or that it really stands much chance of success. Under present circumstances it seems highly unlikely that the Soviet Union would contemplate any major change in the satellites, the control of which are essential to the USSR for strategic, economic and political reasons. But we must look forward a few years, and it is not inconceivable that the USSR might consider that the present form of control, of which the costs are undoubtedly high, was more of a liability than an asset, and contemplate a change in the nature of their control. The withdrawal of Soviet participation in joint economic enterprises indicates, among other things, that the Soviet bloc economies are so well integrated that this kind of formal control is no longer necessary.

29. Politically the Soviet Union can be expected to grant freedom of action to those satellite governments which it considers most firmly in the saddle and least likely to deviate from the Soviet line. Strategically, the Soviet Union obviously does not want along its European borders countries closely aligned with the West. However, depending on the degree of its political and economic control, and in the light of modern military thinking, it might be less concerned with having access to satellite territories for large numbers of its troops. It might, for instance, be content with an early warning system in the satellites linked with that of the Soviet Union, perhaps coupled with a mutual security guarantee from the West or a strengthened E.E.T.O. based on a greater degree of sovereign association.[55]

30. All this is, of course, highly speculative. However, if it could be tentatively accepted that some other form of control is possible, then I think it is worth considering what course of action on our part might best promote such a change. Certainly it is time we recognized that a public policy in favour of "peaceful liberation" is not only unrealistic and ineffective, but because of its aggressive tone it also provides Soviet leaders with an excuse not to make concessions. As an alternative perhaps it is worth considering whether we might take the offensive to the Russians in another way by proposing that a neutral status similar to that of Austria, with free elections, be accorded the satellites. They would not accept it, but it would have these advantages:

(a) it would show the Soviet Union and, more important, the uncommitted nations, that the West does not necessarily insist on the extension of Western control over the satellites;

(b) it would show that we are seriously concerned over the fate of the people of the satellites for themselves, and not just as pawns in the East-West struggle;

(c) it would seize from the Soviet Union some of its initiative in the promotion of neutralism in, for example, India;

(d) it would show that we are concerned not with the form of government in the satellites, any more than we are concerned with the existence of a communist régime in Yugoslavia, but merely with the domination of satellite governments by the Soviet Union.

It is, in fact, the old plea for self-determination, with the one limitation of permanent neutrality.

31. Any suggestion that the objective of the Western Powers should be the neutralization rather than the liberation of Eastern Europe would, I feel sure, encounter a good deal of opposition not only for domestic political reasons (as in the United States and Germany) but because of the recent history of the idea of Central European neutrality as it has developed during the past year. When the Western Powers reluctantly agreed to the neutralization of Austria as the price for an Austrian State Treaty last Spring, it will be recalled that there was a good deal of talk about the application of "the Austrian model" to Germany. Soviet propaganda deliberately fostered this obvious parallel and used it to play up the German opposition to Chancellor Adenauer's policy of military alignment with NATO and the West. To counter such propaganda, the Chancellor insisted that the future united Germany must be free to choose its political alliances. At the Summit Conference in July, Sir Anthony Eden suggested that Eastern Germany at any rate might be de-militarized. This idea might have been expanded to include a neutral belt (in the military sense) extended from the Baltic to the Adriatic comprising not only Eastern Germany and Austria but Yugoslavia and some or all of the satellites — the whole package to be wrapped up in the context of a general European Security Treaty between East and West. It foundered because the USSR would not accept reunification of Germany through free elections as the precondition, still less the neutralization of the satellites.

32. In view of this recent history, any Western proposal or propaganda now directed towards neutralizing the Eastern European satellites would immediately awake echoes of the "neutral belt" which would include part of Germany — or, in the Soviet version, all of Germany. Such a proposal might therefore be opposed in Washington and in Bonn. Nevertheless, for the reasons I have already given I believe that such an initiative applied only to the satellites is worth a try and would represent a more realistic line than the doctrine of "liberation". Even if the United States could not change their tune in an election year, there is no reason why other NATO members might not place the accent more on neutralization, though it would be more convincing if the West were prepared to offer some quid pro quo.

33. The suggestions made in para. 30 would be, I recognize, almost exclusively a propaganda move, and there are many details of such a proposal that would have to be worked out carefully. Nevertheless a policy of publicly urging Soviet concessions along these lines would complement our general policy of encouraging trade, exchanges and contacts with communist countries on an ad hoc basis. It would, I think, allow greater flexibility of diplomatic negotiation and still not break faith with the subjugated peoples of Eastern Europe. I was doubtful last July of the advisability of raising the question of Soviet control of the satellites during the Summit Conference, in part because I thought it would wreck the chances of anything useful being done about Germany, and it was better to explore the new Soviet intentions first. Now, however, that the Russians have shown that they intend to maintain their hold on Germany, I think we should go over to the offensive on the satellites. If the Russians want peaceful competitive co-existence, then we ought to give it to them, but this means skill and imagination on the diplomatic front, as well as building up our military defences and consolidating the NATO alliance.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET [Ottawa], June 12, 1956

I am attaching for your consideration a paper prepared in the Department entitled, "Relations with the Soviet Satellites". The following is a summary of the main points made in the paper:

(a) The military, political and economic significance of the European satellites to the USSR is so great that Moscow almost certainly regards the maintenance of effective control over the area, though not necessarily in its present form, as an essential element of its power position, and will continue to do so unless there is a drastic revision in Soviet strategic and political thinking.

(b) The satellite régimes, though unpopular, are firmly entrenched, and there is no present possibility that dissidence in the satellites will lead to a reversal of the social system.

(c) Nevertheless, the changes which have been taking place recently are substantial. They spring from the Soviet rapprochement with Tito, the new Soviet line as laid down at the 20th Party Congress, and some pressures of a national and economic nature within the satellites.

(d) The changes are in the direction of some liberalization of satellite policies, more freedom of contact with the West, and more freedom of national, as opposed to Soviet-orientated, expression.

(e) The changes may offer some hope of a degree of Titoism in the satellites, a development which would be welcome to the West.

(f) The West should make a new and positive approach to the satellite countries by treating them as if they were independent entities rather than one uniform appendage of the Soviet Union; by encouraging trade in order to weaken the dependence of their economies on the Soviet Union; by encouraging the exchange of information and visits, though not to the exclusion of exchanges with the USSR; and, in our propaganda, by welcoming the improvements which have taken place and encouraging the satellite public to ask for more.

I am also enclosing a series of articles on the satellites by C.L. Sulzberger which appeared in the New York Times during April and May.[56]

In developing a new approach to the satellites, we should emphasize that we have no aggressive intentions toward the Soviet bloc and no intention of trying to change their system by force. Our object is to wean them away to some degree from extreme dependence on the Soviet Union and to encourage any developments which will ameliorate the lot of the satellite peoples.

Our policy towards the satellites up to now has been ambivalent. We have tended to ostracize their governments, even those with which we maintain direct diplomatic relations, though we have avoided any direct endorsement of the policy of "peaceful liberation", which, incidentally, Mr. Dulles seems to be abandoning in favour of a more flexible and pragmatic approach, having in mind the possibilities of Titoism.

With a new situation developing in the satellites, particularly Poland and Czechoslovakia, I think the time has come to try to evolve a more positive policy based on the acceptance of the social revolutions in Eastern Europe, and in the hope that the satellites will gradually evolve in the direction of national communist régimes. We cannot expect an exact repetition of Titoism because conditions are different in each republic, but there are greater signs now of an incipient stirring of national feeling than there were in Yugoslavia before June, 1948.

RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET SATELLITES

A. INTRODUCTION

There has been a ferment in the European satellites over the last few months, and it is important that we examine closely the motivations for and the extent of the changes which have taken place. It is the thesis of this paper that the changes are significant ones, that they may portend a substantial change in satellite policies, and that the present period offers a number of opportunities for Western policy toward the Eastern European countries. Its object, therefore, is to examine the changes and to suggest a more positive approach toward these countries.

[56] Voir/See New York Times, April 18, 1956, "American Policy in Eastern Europe I"; April 21, 1956, "American Policy in Eastern Europe II"; April 23, 1956, "American Policy in Eastern Europe III" et/and May 16, 1956, "Some Differences Among the Satellites".

The basic assumptions are, (a) that the military, political and economic significance of the satellites to the USSR is so great that Moscow almost certainly regards the maintenance of control over the area (though not necessarily in its present form) as an essential element of its power position; (b) that, despite their general unpopularity, the communist régimes are firmly established and that the social revolutions which have taken place are not reversible; (c) that Western policy toward the satellites must be drafted with these two realities in mind, and that the West must further convince the Soviet Union that we have no aggressive intentions and no intention of trying forcibly to change satellite systems of government.

Any complete examination of the position of the satellites within the Soviet bloc and of Western policy toward the satellites must examine the following questions:

(a) The requirements of the USSR from this area, and the requirements of the satellite régimes from Moscow.

(b) The substance of Soviet control in the area and the effect thereon of recent developments.

(c) The meaning of "different roads to socialism", the motivations of the Soviet leaders in propounding the new doctrine, and the extent of its applicability to the satellites.

(d) The economic needs of the region and the efficacy of Soviet economic policy to meet these needs. How far the trade pattern and the relatively low degree of industrialization has really made this region dependent on the USSR, and to what extent it could find Western markets if freed of Soviet control.

(e) The extent and nature of satellite trade with the USSR, with the West, and with the under-developed areas. The motivations within the bloc for the recent emphasis on non-bloc trade.

(f) The contribution of the satellites to the defence of the Soviet bloc.

This paper is written with the major emphasis on political content. It does not treat all of the above questions in as thorough a fashion as a more detailed examination would permit. For that reason, it should be regarded as a tentative assessment, subject to possible revision after more detailed examination of the technical problems.

B. RECENT DEVELOPMENTS AND CURRENT SITUATION

Political

The Soviet rapprochement with Yugoslavia and the pronouncements of the 20th Congress of the CPSU have set the pattern for all the recent developments within the satellites, though internal pressures are also present. The restoration of good relations with Yugoslavia spelled trouble for the satellite leaders still in power who had been particularly vehement in their denunciation of Titoism, and made possible, and even necessary, the rehabilitation of the "national" communists. Gomulka in Poland, Rajk in Hungary, Kostov in Bulgaria, all of whom had been accused of nationalist and Titoist deviation, have been rehabilitated, the last two posthumously, and a number of Stalinists are falling from grace. Premier Chervenkov of Bulgaria resigned and was replaced by Yugov, a "national" communist. Stalinist ministers and deputy ministers have been forced to resign in Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany. The fact that Rakosi, a known Stalinist, hated in Hungary and by Tito, is still in power, may indicate that there is no one else strong enough to rule. Even in this case, a rapprochement has been reported between Yugoslavia and the Rakosi régime. There is reason to believe that popular pressure, rather than the Russian example or Soviet pressure, was responsible for the rehabilitation of a number of political prisoners, especially in Poland and Czechoslovakia, and it may well be that events are moving faster than Moscow expected.

The recent dissolution of the Cominform must be viewed as a further concession to Tito. It has virtually no significance for Soviet-satellite relations, and little except in the propaganda field for Soviet relations with communist parties abroad. At no time has it served as the channel of instructions either to the satellites or to communist parties.

The main themes of the 20th Congress — destruction of the "cult of the individual", the principle of "collective leadership", "different ways to socialism" and "peaceful co-existence" — have been taken up by the satellite parties, but with a considerable degree of hesitancy and confusion. The denigration of Stalin seems to have had a much more unsettling effect in the satellites than in the Soviet Union itself, many of whose leaders must be considered Stalinists. Poland has been the most outspoken in the intensity and tone of this campaign. Rumania and Albania have been the most reserved. Intellectuals, students and even Party members, have been asking frank and disturbing questions and are uncertain as to how far they can go in their interpretation of the new line. Students have been notably affected at seeing much they were taught to believe smashed to the ground. Indeed the widespread signs of student and young people's unrest is a clear indication that the régimes have not been very successful in their indoctrination programmes. But in the midst of this confusion, few have dared to criticize the socialist system itself and the reaction of the non-Party masses, although not obvious, is probably similar.

Local party leaders, security officers and other government officials have been widely criticized for taking too much power into their own hands. Numerous accusations have been directed against those who used the methods of Stalin and Beriya in violations of "socialist legality". A number of high officials in the court and security organs have been fired. The criminal codes are being revised with respect to non-political, as well as political, crimes and less reliance is being placed on force. There has been a slight easing of restrictions on religious practices although many victims of religious persecutions are still in prison. Apart from the political prisoners, a number of other prisoners have had their sentences shortened or have been released. These steps may go a long way towards making the present régimes more palatable to the people and reduce the incentive to change. These measures have gone furthest in Poland, but East Germany and Hungary appear to be still under rigid police control and it is unlikely that controls will be lessened enough in any of the satellites to permit weakening of Party authority.

The new Soviet line has extended into the cultural field in the satellites. For some months now there has been an easing of restrictions on cultural exchanges with Western countries as well as increasing criticism of cultural efforts which were losing all artistic value through stereotyped conformism. Since the 20th Congress, criticism has become more violent. Architecture has been branded as unimaginative and impractical, literature and art for being uncreative and hampered by ideological restrictions. It is now recognized that scientific research was being harmed by Party interference and that scientists should not be forced to make their conclusions fit the Party line. If this trend continues, Western culture will be more acceptable in these countries and cultural exchanges will be more feasible.

Appeals are being made within the satellites, especially in Poland and Czechoslovakia, for the good-will and co-operation of socialists not only within their own countries but in other countries as well, e.g., in Italy and France. This policy has presumably necessitated the rehabilitation of many former opposition leaders, for example, some of the Social Democrats in Hungary and former members of the Polish partisan army. Wide political amnesties begun in 1955 are continuing. It may be noted, however, that most of the political prisoners who have been released are broken men no longer in a position to gain political power so that there can be little hope that the new "liberal" policies may provide a leadership for the eventual overthrow of the present régimes.

There is a great deal of talk of the "democratization" of the present régimes although there has been little action as yet to give substance to this. More discussions and criticism within the parties and greater popular participation in the government is called for. Poland is trying to widen the powers of its Parliament and reports of the recent session indicate that parliamentary committees have been debating government proposals for the first time in years. To date, however, the criticism has been no more than criticism of bureaucratic inefficiency and injustice. It has not been criticism of fundamentals, and cannot be as long as one-party rule persists, and to that extent has little relation to Western concepts of democracy. There is no evidence that the communist parties in the satellites intend to relinquish real control to government organs. In the major speeches by Party leaders, emphasis has been placed on increased control by the Party and it can be safely assumed that the communist governments of Eastern Europe continue to keep a tight hold over their peoples and are still very much under the influence and control of Moscow.

Control over the satellites, as well as the close alliance with China and increasing Soviet influence in countries close to the southern periphery of the USSR, has a substantial bearing on the increasing confidence of the Soviet Union in the strength of its position at home and abroad. No longer the lone communist state surrounded by hostile forces, it now considers itself the centre of a great "zone of peace" which is proof, in Soviet eyes, of the correctness of its policies and portent of the eventual acceptance of communism by the whole world. The psychological advantage of having like-thinking allies, with the concomitant of like-speaking and like-voting voices on the international stage, should not be underestimated.

Economic

The economic pronouncements of the 20th Congress did not indicate that the satellites would have greater freedom in the control of their economies. On the other hand, the emphasis is being placed on greater co-ordination of the satellite economies with that of the bloc as a whole and more importance is being placed on specialization. In general, the drive is still, after a slight modification in favour of the consumer from 1953 to 1955, towards greater industrialization and collectivization, although at a pace slightly lower than that which obtained prior to 1953. Poland and Hungary have recently indicated that they will permit more gradual collectivization and less pressure on independent farms, but the ultimate aim remains the same. The decision to industrialize what was originally an area with an agricultural surplus, has not been altered, and co-ordination and specialization will apparently be sought within a broad policy of continued industrialization.

It would appear that communist economic policy in Eastern Europe, in altering the pattern of the economy of the region, has produced a machine which can now export only industrial raw materials and manufactured goods, and must import consumer goods and raw materials. This pattern of trade, resulting from a consistent economic policy, has further tied the region to the Soviet bloc and to the USSR. Recent developments suggest that the aim of economic policy and the associated trade policy is intended to remain the same indefinitely. Behind any expansion of trade which may be permitted between Eastern Europe and the West, there remains a consistent drive toward autarchy, though the notion of autarchy may be expanding to include the bloc as a whole, rather than the USSR. In pursuit of this end, it may be desired ultimately to pre-empt a segment of Western trade in the markets of the uncommitted nations. It is, however, too soon to say precisely what the ends of bloc policy are in this respect.

Some minor concessions have been made to improve the standard of living in the satellites. In some of these countries the people seem better fed and clothed than in previous years, although the overall grim shabby poverty remains. The satellite party leaders have admitted that in the near future at least they will not be able to bring about the improvements in wages, working hours, pensions and consumers goods which the Soviet Union is now in a position to grant to its own people. Some are trying to give workers more incentives to increase production, e.g., proposed increases in wages and pensions in Poland and Czechoslovakia, but these are minimal and not likely to affect seriously the present low standard of living. It seems probable that the people of the satellites will continue to suffer severe hardships in order to serve the ends of the bloc policy. The targets set for the satellites in the new Five-year Plans are unreasonably high and it is significant that when East Germany tried to have its objectives lowered it was refused and told to improve its techniques and productivity.

Defence

Dependence on the Soviet Union extends to the field of defence. The area is of great strategic importance to the Soviet Union. During the past few years the USSR has maintained large forces in the satellites, has intensively developed airfields and communications, has tried to build up reliable satellite forces and has supplied a great deal of modern equipment and arms. Since the conclusion of the Austrian Treaty, continued Soviet military commitments have been rationalized by the Warsaw Pact. The conclusion of this Pact, ostensibly on the basis of equal sovereign association, may give the appearance that the satellites have a certain independence in the field of defence, but this is not borne out by the facts. In an era of aerial warfare, perhaps the most significant factor is the network of airfields constructed for use by Soviet forces, more than half of which are located in Poland and East Germany. Although the satellite contribution to aircraft production is small, the Soviet Union has supplied modern jet bombers as well as equipment and training facilities for satellite air forces. Satellite ground forces are becoming increasingly effective and better-trained. Recent reports indicate that a considerable amount of revamping is occurring in the satellite armies with more emphasis on well-trained and well-indoctrinated personnel. This means that even if the proposed reductions in the satellite armies are carried out, which will probably happen in view of the recent cut in armed forces in the USSR, a hard core of relatively good quality will remain. This will also release large numbers of men to agriculture and industry in an area throughout which a shortage of industrial manpower has been prevalent. The satellite navies constitute a relatively minor contribution to the Soviet bloc naval strength but, in East Germany and Poland, they are not being neglected in the overall defence picture. In addition, a number of atomic projects in the satellites are being subsidized by the Soviet Union and in Czechoslovakia especially, more technical and scientific research is being directed towards military ends. Defence costs still remain an important part of the 1956 satellite budgets. It is thus clear that defence policies will definitely limit the degree of independence which the satellites can obtain from the USSR. The main qualification of this statement lies in the interpretation of the effect of the H-bomb on military strategy. It is possible that in due course, the advantage of the Eastern Europe area of manoeuvre in depth may lose its importance, but for the present we must assume the Russians have not changed their policies.

General

It is apparent from the preceding that developments in the satellites have followed closely developments in the Soviet Union, that Soviet influence remains dominant, and that the communist parties of the region remain in control. The fact that communist policy has not substantially raised the standard of living, and that this region, after considerable industrial growth, must now import food, cannot but have its effect on the more educated classes of the region. It seems likely that realization that bloc policy will continue to call for sacrifices in aid of bloc ambitions in the under-developed areas must also have its effect, although increased trade should do something to improve the lot of the individual. In this situation, a more liberal police and parliamentary policy risks the release of fundamental dissatisfaction. The example of the USSR where, after nearly forty years, no final solution has been found for the simultaneous increase of labour productivity and the maintenance of control, must prolong doubts in the peoples of Eastern Europe, among some of whom, particularly the Poles and the Czechs, the inferences of social logic are probably not so slow to be drawn as among the Russians and other Slavs.

The recent ferment in the satellites has been released as a result of the Yugoslav rapprochement with the Soviet Union and the new Soviet line as laid down as a result of the 20th Party Congress. There is little doubt, however, that while the new developments are in a great measure the result of Moscow's diktat and of following the Moscow lead, internal pressures of a political and economic nature, though unorganized, have had their effect. The Soviet-orientated régimes, while firmly in power, are vastly unpopular, and must have felt the need of alleviating the pressures of national pride and the unsatisfied economic needs of the people. We do not know the extent to which these various motivations have brought about the recent changes, but it is fair to assume that an element of each, in varying degrees, lies behind each development, and that some of the motivations offer possibilities for a new Western approach to the satellites.

C. PRESENT WESTERN POLICY TOWARD THE SATELLITES

The leading Western nations have differed somewhat in their policies towards the satellite governments and peoples. The United States have taken the most rigid stand. Ever since the establishment of the puppet régimes they have demanded publicly that the USSR end its domination and permit free elections in these countries. As late as December 31, 1955, a White House press statement, approved by President Eisenhower, stated: "The peaceful liberation of the captive peoples has been, is and will continue to be a major goal of United States foreign policy". In practice the United States has recognized some of these régimes while publicly disapproving of them and avoiding, when possible, close association with them. It has unofficially endorsed the aims of Radio Free Europe and officially sponsors the Voice of America.

This United States policy stems largely from internal political considerations. The Republicans will probably not wish to risk losing the votes of persons of East European origin by departing too far from this policy before the elections. This probably accounts for the fact that little publicity was given to the Dulles-Tito joint statement made after the Brioni visit in the fall of 1955. It is therefore all the more significant that in April of this year Mr. Dulles suggested that a change of U.S. policy towards Eastern Europe was necessary as a result of the recent Soviet emphasis on "different ways to socialism" and the rapprochement with Tito. He recalled the joint statement in which the right of the Eastern European states to "non-interference from the outside in their internal affairs and the right to develop their own social and economic order in ways of their own choice" was recognized. Similar statements encouraging Titoism have been made by George Kennan, former U.S. Ambassador to Moscow, the American Chamber of Commerce, and the New York Times. There may therefore be a possibility of a change in U.S. policy, though it is unlikely that it would be very outspoken until after the elections at least.

The United Kingdom and other Western governments, while sharing the U.S. dislike of Soviet dictatorship over the satellite régimes, have found the U.S. approach too inflexible and unrealistic. They have argued that a policy of propaganda which could not be backed up by appropriate action could only cause disillusionment among the satellite peoples. This point of view was borne out after the Geneva Conferences. The satellite peoples had placed their main hope for liberation on Western Europe and the United States. Some remnants of this hope remained until the First Geneva Conference when it became apparent that the Western countries were not going to use force to organize free elections. The "spirit of Geneva" resulted in a feeling of betrayal and probably resulted in even more people in the satellites deciding to come to terms with the régimes. Discontent with the régimes is widespread in the satellites but to the best of our knowledge, there are no elements of active resistance which could spark open resistance to the régimes under the present conditions of communist control. Realizing the situation, therefore, Great Britain and other Western governments have favoured giving the satellite peoples reports of life in Western countries rather than repeatedly running down the evils of the communist system with which these people are already familiar enough. B.B.C. broadcasts, for example, have been considered valuable by those who heard them because of their factual reporting. In addition, these Western governments have argued that every opportunity should be taken to promote contacts with the communist régimes as well as the satellite peoples and possibly in this way to modify internal conditions in the satellites.

The French Government in the last year has taken the lead in responding to Soviet, Czech, Polish and Hungarian overtures, especially in the cultural field. By increasing the area of contacts they hope that enough "free air" will permeate the Curtain to offset whatever political capital the communists hope to achieve from the aura of respectability and acceptance which stems from contact with the West. They have recently proposed a concerted effort on the part of Western countries to take the initiative in the promotion of cultural exchanges with the satellites. They argue that we should take advantage of the traditional interest which a number of these countries have had in Western culture and that the relaxation of tension in recent months provides the right atmosphere for such a drive. Such an approach provides some opportunity to expose subtly the arbitrary restrictions, injustices and exploitations resulting from Soviet domination and enables us to encourage a spirit of independence which may induce the satellite régimes to grant concessions.

Yugoslavia's policy towards the satellites has changed considerably since its rapprochement with Moscow and especially since the 20th Congress. It has taken advantage of these developments to point out the advantages of Titoism to the satellites. Tito has called attention to the fact that the recognition by the Soviet Union of "different ways to socialism" will enable the satellites to develop their own forms of communist régimes as he has done, though there was no indication at the Congress that this was in Soviet minds. He has taken the initiative in trying to establish old commercial and cultural ties with these countries and since the restoration of former "Titoists" to favour in the latter, there has been a marked increase in commercial and cultural exchanges. Tito has, however, made it clear that this renewed co-operation will not lead to the subservience of Yugoslavia to Soviet Bloc policies. He is perfectly aware of the advantages of maintaining a bargaining position between East and West and it will take more than such outward gestures as the dissolution of the Cominform and the rehabilitation of Titoist deviationists to alter his basic mistrust of the Soviet Bloc as a whole. He dislikes the Rakosi government in Hungary and, although there has been some rapprochement, he has not substantially reduced Yugoslav defences which are largely on the frontiers with the satellites. Nor has he proposed the dissolution of the Balkan Alliance.

D. CONCLUSIONS

The primary Soviet interest in the satellites at the present time is strategic, providing defence in depth for the USSR, the secondary interest is undoubtedly the economic contribution which they can make to the USSR, while the third is the political advantage of control of Eastern Europe. Apart from their contribution to the Soviet economy in raw materials and finished goods, the satellites are providing about fifty per cent of the total credits of the Sino-Soviet bloc to the under-developed areas. The USSR now has, effectively, complete control over the satellite régimes, exercised primarily through the satellite communist parties, but enforced also by economic, military and policy controls. With the possible exception of East Germany in the context of German reunification, it has flatly refused to consider the position of the satellites as subject to negotiation with the West. With the more pragmatic and flexible approach of the present Soviet leaders, certain modifications are possible, designed to take greater account of local conditions, to promote economic development along more national lines, and to placate national sensibilities. Nevertheless, it should be remembered that, in the general absence of popular support, the satellite governments are basically dependent for their existence on close co-operation with and support from the Soviet Union.

The communist régimes in the satellites are firmly established and the broad lines of the present social order are not reversible. Nevertheless, there is factionalism in party leadership which takes the form of national versus Soviet control, or an increase in consumer goods versus continuing emphasis on heavy industry and collectivization. We do not know the extent to which the factions favouring national control and greater emphasis on consumer goods might pursue their policies were they given a completely free hand. The memory of the only known open revolts against the régimes, in East Germany and Czechoslovakia, both springing from economic discontent, can be expected to strengthen these factions. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to assume that, even if a completely free hand were given, limits would be imposed by the eastward orientation of economies and by the subordination of satellite armed forces to Soviet training, equipment and strategic thinking since Soviet control was imposed on the satellites. The more significant consideration is that the Soviet Union would not be likely to permit a thorough-going revision of satellite policy unless there were to be, at minimum, a drastic revision of Soviet strategic and political thinking. It should also be recognized that fear of traditional enemies (Germany for Poland and Czechoslovakia, Greece and Turkey for Bulgaria) is still strong, often as strong as dislike of the Soviet Union. On the other hand, intra-regional frictions which have a long historical basis cannot be assumed to be completely overcome by the fact of Soviet control over the whole area.

Discontent with the régimes is widespread among the satellite peoples. It is offset by a tendency to become resigned to communist rule the longer communist rule persists, though recent manifestations of student unrest in both Poland and Czechoslovakia are timely reminders of the lack of success of the communist régimes in winning over the Marxist-indoctrinated youth. It is certainly not such as to stimulate important outbreaks of resistance under present or foreseeable conditions. The strongest and most tangible desire of the satellite peoples is probably an improvement in their standards of living, followed by a reduction of physical control by the government and a lessening of Soviet in favour of national control of their countries. Even relatively minor concessions in this direction would go a long way toward alleviating the discontent and enhancing the acceptability and even the popularity of the régimes.

Moscow is not prepared to abandon effective control of the satellites and their régimes, despite unpopularity, are well-entrenched. Within the limits imposed by these facts, we must consider what opportunities are available to the West, and particularly to Canada, to influence satellite policy in the period of "peaceful co-existence". Our ultimate object should be to lessen Soviet control where possible and to encourage some form of Titoism.

The first step would appear to be the abandonment, both privately and publicly, of any hope of effecting liberation within the foreseeable future. We have no intention of liberating by force, and as the satellite peoples are largely aware of this and have accepted the implications, we should cease to foster any false hopes which may exist in satellite and in emigré minds. Even talk of "peaceful liberation" (whatever that might mean) is only likely to make suspect Western intentions in the minds of Soviet and satellite leaders, and is likely to diminish the more modest possibilities of contact and influence which are open to us in the current atmosphere. We must make it quite clear that, while we dislike both Soviet control of the satellites and their forms of government, we have no intention of trying to replace the former by Western control and the latter by Western-type governments. If we hope to take advantage of some greater Soviet pragmatism and flexibility toward the satellites, we must become more pragmatic and flexible ourselves.

If we hope to encourage national rather than Soviet-controlled expression, we must cease treating the satellites as uniform appendages of Moscow with nothing to distinguish between them. They have widely different interests and traditions, despite the common denominator of communist control, and we should take this into account in our dealings with them. In particular, we should try to deal with them independently of Moscow. We might, for example, attempt frank talks with the Poles over our mutual interest in Indo-China, and with the Czechs over arms for Egypt. It might also be educative and encouraging for the others if, perhaps in negotiating a trade agreement, we showed our willingness to grant concessions to them in return for real concessions on their part and that not necessarily in the economic field.

From a political point of view, the promotion of trade with the satellites would seem desirable in order to reduce their economic dependence on the Soviet Union. It is apparent that the satellites are being encouraged to trade more outside the bloc, though primarily in the under-developed countries as part of the Soviet drive for economic penetration. I certainly do not suggest that, for the broad political advantages, we should enter into commercially undesirable agreements, for example, by a rash extension of credit facilities, nor that we ignore the security risks involved in the possible establishment of additional satellite commercial offices or consulates across this country. There is also the possibility of legitimate complaint from Canadian industries which may be harmed by imports from the Iron Curtain countries. Nevertheless, the commercial advantage for Canada in selling sizeable quantities of surplus agricultural products are matched by the political advantage of drawing the satellites in some measure away from dependence on the Soviet Union. As in all contacts with the West, commercial exchanges are likely to remove from satellite minds some misconceptions about the West and to demonstrate the higher standard of living in the West. If the West is able to provide much-needed consumer goods, especially agricultural products, and thus demonstrate the practical advantages of trade, the pressure for more trade may mount in order to provide what the Soviet bloc economy will not or cannot provide.

The broadcasts of CBC-IS should concentrate their greatest efforts on the factual reporting of Canadian and foreign news, with a judicious selection of comment from, for example, Canadian editorial writing. Insofar as it does disperse propaganda in the more limited and aggressive sense, CBC-IS should frankly welcome any developments in the satellites which seem to indicate a mellowing of the régimes or a lessening of control by Moscow. It should then pursue the course further, saying, "If you have gone this far, why do you not go a little further?" As the Economist has said, appetites have been whetted by the changes which have taken place in the last few months, and the leaders may find it difficult to call a halt to the process without resort to new terroristic methods — or to the Red Army. They are visibly concerned with the lengths to which the greater freedom to criticize has gone. It is up to us in our broadcasts to continue to whet appetites for just a little more. There should be no difficulty, now that some improvements have taken place in suggesting additional improvements which can be effected within the limits of communist control (comparison with improvements in the Soviet Union, which have by and large exceeded those in the satellites, might be useful) and in particular in appealing to national pride now that at least an element of national expression is being permitted.

Exchange of visits between Canada and the satellites may also offer fruitful possibilities. The same criteria apply here as to visits with the Soviet Union, though there is the additional advantage that they would foster a feeling of independence of the Soviet Union. Insofar as our own resources, security and otherwise, impose limitations on the total visits programme which we can envisage, I think we must give priority to exchanges with the Soviet Union. But we should not ignore satellite exchanges as well. Some progress has already been made in the exchange of films and information, and this should be encouraged in order to let any breath of free air in under the Iron Curtain. Sports exchanges have the advantage of appealing to a very large public. Canadian efforts in the cultural field will be necessarily limited, but there is no good reason why visits to Moscow could not be coupled with visits to other Eastern European centres, and at little additional expense. Our missions in Prague and Warsaw have indicated that such visits would be very welcome and that arrangements could be made for them to reach a large public.

The disadvantage of freer exchanges in enhancing the prestige and even the acceptabilities of the present régimes seem to be outweighed by the advantages of providing contact with the Western world and encouraging national expression. The régimes are not going to be overthrown, so we had better concentrate our efforts on trying to make them more acceptable from our point of view. It appears that they are willing to encourage some contact with the West in order to enhance their popularity, as long as contact does not go so far as to jeopardize their positions of power. Our policy should be directed toward encouraging independence from Moscow while making it clear that we have no aggressive intentions and no intentions of radically altering their present social and political systems. Negotiations with the satellites independent of Moscow will increase their self-respect and provide them with more incentives to modify their servile attitude toward the Soviet Union. The possible is limited, but not inconsiderable in comparison with the present situation.

Memorandum by European Division

THE CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD THE SOVIET SATELLITES

The importance of the Eastern European satellites to the U.S.S.R. has been so great during the past ten years that Moscow has regarded the maintenance of effective control over this region as an essential element in its power position. At the same time, direct Canadian interests in the region have remained relatively limited.

2. Until recently, we have accordingly regarded the satellites as integral parts of the Soviet bloc, and we have taken no initiatives to encourage closer relations with those that seemed relatively more open to Western influences. On various occasions, the Government has publicly expressed its sympathy with the lot of the satellite peoples under the Soviet yoke, and its hope that they may one day be free to choose their own governments. At the same time, we deliberately avoided any direct endorsement of a policy of peaceful liberation.

3. During the past four years, however, the same problems and pressures which have compelled the adoption of a more liberal policy within the U.S.S.R. have given rise to a similar trend within the satellites, and, in particular, to a more nationalistic and less pro-Soviet orientation, and greater freedom of contact with the West. It is the two latter aspects of this trend which last autumn attained spectacular proportions in Poland and Hungary, and which have a particular bearing on our present and future attitude toward the satellites. Since about the middle of 1956, we have felt that it would be unwise to continue to treat these countries as uniform appendages of the Soviet Union, and that it would be in our interests to recognize and to encourage hopeful trends in these countries without encouraging violence, and to modify our attitude towards each state as the situation seemed to warrant.

4. Having few direct interests in the area, except for the emergence of certain possible grain markets, we have preferred to take no forthright initiative, but we have endeavoured, whenever possible, to make clear the distinction between our attitude toward the U.S.S.R. and our attitude toward the satellites. We have attempted, for instance, to modify the character of our broadcasts toward this region. Again, although limited facilities have prevented us from encouraging an exchange of visits with the satellites on the scale of our exchanges with the U.S.S.R. prior to last November, we have not discouraged this exchange, as we have in the case of the U.S.S.R. in the past five months, and we have tried to be as accommodating as possible to satellite initiatives in this context. Similarly, we have encouraged the exchange of information with these countries. During the past few months, both Soviet and satellite missions in Canada have been less active in the "return to the homeland" movement. It is not yet clear whether this change reflects a new policy or merely temporary difficulties. Where the satellites have sought to increase their trade with Canada, we have tried to avoid placing any difficulties in their way, but the fact that more liberal trends at home have so far brought no decline in the undesirable activity of certain members of their missions in Canada has compelled us to place restrictions on the size of certain of these missions.

5. Prior to the Hungarian revolt, we had resisted Hungarian pressure to exchange diplomatic missions. Since the Soviet intervention, we have sought to avoid any action which might be construed as recognition of the Kadar régime. Thus the trade agreement which was negotiated shortly before the revolt has not yet been ratified. Our relations with the Hungarian Government will probably depend in large measure on how far it finds a more acceptable compromise with its people. Meanwhile, our national sympathy for these people has been expressed by the acceptance in Canada of over 15,000 refugees and the intention to receive as many again before the end of the year, as well as by assistance extended through the U.N. and the Red Cross.

6. It is felt that Poland merits attention at least equal to that paid to Yugoslavia, and, over the next year or so, perhaps more. In that she has offered Canada future preference as a supplier of wheat, we think that we must recognize that her desire to broaden her Western links has a direct bearing on Canadian policy, and a special credit agreement for wheat is now being negotiated with the Poles. We are also giving thought to our information policy in Poland. Meanwhile, the émigré population shows signs of a growing willingness to cooperate with the Gomulka régime, and it may be that, in the light of the improved relations between Church and State in Poland, that the return of at least a part of the Polish Treasures will be feasible within a few months.

7. The United States may have to increase its aid to Yugoslavia shortly, if Soviet economic pressures are to be offset. Canada will probably take 1,000 Hungarian refugees from Yugoslavia to ease their heavy burden. Our attitude toward East Germany continues to be determined by the fact that Canada does not recognize the Pankow régime, although the internal pressures in East Germany would undoubtedly have led to violence already, had not the Soviet Union made it unmistakably clear that any such move would be crushed at once. A revolt in East Germany would present the West, and particularly our German allies, with an extremely awkward and potentially dangerous dilemma.

8. The trend toward liberalization has thus far been less marked in Albania, Bulgaria and Roumania, and, since Canada does not maintain diplomatic missions in these countries, it is preferred to concentrate our energies for the immediate future on Poland and Yugoslavia. The effort by Czechoslovakia to develop her trade with Canada suggests that Prague may also wish silently to follow the path of Warsaw, but it has as yet taken no action to warrant greater encouragement by us.

9. It may be useful at Bermuda to explore the possibilities and risks of a concerned NATO effort to encourage Poland, the conditions under which it may become necessary or desirable to do business with the Kadar Government, and the implications of Belgrade's present difficulties for Western policy toward Yugoslavia.[57]

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE U.S.S.R.
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE SEPT. 21, 1955)[58]

12. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the Russian trade delegation, which had been invited to come to Ottawa as the result of his visit last year to the U.S.S.R., had now arrived. There would be some difficult points in the negotiations, for example points relating to security, to shipping, and probably to a Russian request to station additional representatives in Canada.

The Minister recommended, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Finance, that the Canadian negotiating team be headed by Mr. Mitchell Sharp, the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and be composed of representatives from the departments concerned. The Cabinet would be informed of the progress of the talks.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 30, 1956—Cab. Doc. 21-56†)

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said the Russians had sent a high class delegation and the negotiations might be difficult. He was proposing to insist, however, that Russia undertake to buy 500,000 tons of wheat a year for 3 years.

14. During the discussion it was pointed out that, if the Russians were allowed to station additional representatives at various points in the country, it would probably be necessary to increase the staff of the special branch of the R.C.M.Police. This problem, however, did not have a direct connection with any possible trade agreement. It was also suggested that a representative of the Department of Agriculture might be added to the delegation.

15. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and of Finance, that the delegation for the negotiations on a possible trade agreement with the U.S.S.R. be headed by Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and be composed of representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Finance, National Revenue, External Affairs, Agriculture, and the Bank of Canada, with the assistance of other departments as required.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 6, 1956

SIZE OF THE SOVIET EMBASSY IN OTTAWA, AND POSSIBLE OPENING OF SOVIET BLOC TRADE OFFICES IN MONTREAL OR TORONTO

The arrival of the Soviet trade delegation this week means that we may soon see a further expansion of the Soviet Embassy on the commercial side. The Czechs and Poles have already intimated informally that they would like to open trade offices of some kind in Montreal and/or Toronto. The security implications of these possible developments have been under study in the Department, and I believe that certain recommendations should now be submitted for your approval.

Size of the Soviet Embassy

2. Our records show that the Russian staff of the Soviet Embassy, both diplomatic and non-diplomatic, now numbers 51 persons. If adult dependents be added, the total rises to 98 Russians. A breakdown of these figures is annexed† to this memorandum. The steady growth of the Embassy staff in the last few years is shown in the following table:

January 1949 — 27
1951 — 30
1953 — 40
1956 — 51.

This staff of 51, in my view, is too large for the legitimate work it has to do, whether political, commercial or military. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Director of Military Intelligence agree. You will note that we have only 11 Canadians in Moscow.

3. Although it is difficult to find legitimate reasons for the exaggerated size of the Soviet Embassy, we know from the Petrov case[59] that Soviet embassies are still padded with personnel for recruiting and running espionage agents. The R.C.M.Police confirm that the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa is no exception. The growing size of the Soviet Embassy means not only that more Russians become available for intelligence work, but also that the resources of the R.C.M.P. for surveillance are increasingly strained, and the effectiveness of our counterintelligence effort seriously reduced.

4. We have therefore considered the possibility of imposing some limit on the size of the Soviet Embassy. Some months ago we asked the Foreign Office and the State Department for their views on this question. We learned that the United Kingdom has always recognized the right of a diplomatic representative to decide for himself what staff he needed for the performance of his diplomatic duties. On the other hand, the State Department expressed the firm opinion that the receiving country has the right to determine the size of a mission.

5. The recent experience of two other NATO governments is relevant. We understand that the German Government, which recently agreed to receive a Soviet Ambassador, was successful in obtaining an assurance in advance that his staff would not number more than 50 persons. However, when the Netherlands Government in December 1954 protested about the size of the Soviet Embassy in The Hague, the Soviet Ambassador rejected the complaint in the firmest terms.

6. The opinion of the Foreign Office, with which our own Legal Division agrees, and this Netherlands experience suggest that it would be both improper and inexpedient to attempt to set any arbitrary limit on the size of the Soviet Embassy here. Another reason for caution is that some expansion of our Embassy in Moscow will perhaps be required soon.

7. I suggest, however, that we must do something. The recent fire has drawn public attention to the size of the Embassy, as the article in the January 30 number of Time indicates. We may anticipate questions in Parliament which I believe we should be in a better position to answer than we now are. I therefore recommend that you take an early convenient occasion, if possible before the current trade negotiations are too far advanced, to observe to the Soviet Ambassador, in an informal and friendly manner, that you are concerned at the size of his staff.[60] You might take the line that you are as keen as he to see Canadian-Soviet relations improve, and for that very reason you wish to warn him that any further growth of his Embassy staff would create an unfortunate impression on Parliament and the general public in this country. You might suggest that a staff of 50, give or take one or two, would seem to be adequate. If Mr. Chuvahin fails to take the hint, we shall have to give more serious thought to what we can do next. Whether or not some solution to that problem can be found, we shall at least be able to assure Parliament, if questions are asked, that the Soviet Ambassador has been spoken to.

The Possible Opening of Soviet Bloc Trade Offices Outside Ottawa

8. An interdepartmental meeting was held on January 6 to reconcile the apparent conflict of interest between trade and security in the response to be made to anticipated approaches from Soviet bloc countries for permission to open new commercial offices across Canada. The Departments of Trade and Commerce, Finance and National Defence, and the R.C.M.Police were represented as well as several Divisions of this Department, and the forthcoming trade negotiations with the Soviet Union were very much in everyone's mind.

9. After thoroughly canvassing the commercial advantages and the security risks involved, as far as Canada was concerned, the meeting decided that if and when formal approaches were made by Soviet bloc countries for permission to open offices outside Ottawa:

(a) Our general attitude should be one of reluctance, while examining each application on its merits;[61]

(b) That those offices which were permitted to open should be at the most trade commissioners' offices, which have certain privileges but no immunities;[62]

(c) That we should insist on reciprocal rights in the Soviet bloc countries concerned, whether or not we intend to exercise such rights at this time;[63]

(d) That permission to open consulates should be withheld in present circumstances.[64]

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE USSR

The attached memorandum of February 9 was intended to bring you up to date on the position reached in these negotiations and, in particular, to ascertain your views concerning the wisdom of agreeing to the inclusion of some provision concerning the treatment of Soviet nationals and juridical persons (see especially paragraphs 8-15 and Appendix B†). The other subjects dealt with in this memorandum are not of quite the same degree of urgency although your views would also be welcomed on the question of a shipping clause which is discussed in paragraphs 3-7.

2. On the question of natural and juridical persons Mr. Howe was consulted on Friday and indicated that he would not be unduly concerned at the inclusion of a provision on the lines contemplated by the negotiating team, in the light of the opinion from the Department of Justice regarding the constitutionality of such a clause. Mr. Harris, on the other hand, was considerably troubled by the possible political reaction to the granting of such treatment to Soviet persons (see paragraph 10). Late on Friday and again on Saturday Mr. Harris discussed this matter with the Prime Minister who appeared to have doubts about both the legality and political wisdom of the proposal envisaged by the Canadian negotiators.

3. We do not yet know whether the Soviet Delegation regard this as a sticking point but it would seem evident that they attach a good deal of importance to a provision on this subject, especially since some such provision has been included in all trade agreements which they have made with Western countries in recent years. If our negotiations are to proceed we should know as soon as possible whether any provision of this kind can be contemplated. You may therefore wish to have a word about this situation with the Prime Minister and possibly also with Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris. In the meantime the Canadian negotiators are trying to work up another draft but they are not hopeful that it will be possible to produce a text which would be less troublesome than the one appended to the attached memorandum.

SECRET [Ottawa], February 9, 1956

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE USSR

The following is the present state of the negotiations with the Soviet Delegation:

(a) Substantial agreement has been reached on the standard articles exchanging most-favoured-nation tariff treatment.

(b) Substantial agreement has also been reached on an article containing two "escape" clauses, one to permit the application of discriminatory import restrictions if this becomes necessary to protect the balance of payments, and the other to provide that nothing in this Agreement shall limit the right of either party to apply restrictions or prohibitions of any kind directed to the protection of its essential security interests.

(c) The Soviet Delegation has accepted our proposal that we shall reserve (in a concurrent exchange of notes) the right to fix values for ordinary and special duty purposes to the extent necessary to prevent or remedy injury to Canadian producers if as a result of our obligations under the Agreement any product is being imported or is likely to be imported in such quantities as to threaten serious injury.

(d) So far at any rate the Soviet Delegation has not accepted our proposal that there should be an article requiring the state enterprises in either country to take into account only commercial considerations when deciding whether to make a purchase from the other country or from some alternative source of supply.

(e) The Canadian side has resisted three Soviet proposals: most-favoured-nation treatment of shipping; an article on the status of natural and juridical persons of one party in the territory of the other; and an article on the arbitration of commercial disputes.

(f) There is an important difference of view as to whether the agreement should lapse at the end of three years unless renewed (the Canadian proposal), or else should be renewed automatically from year to year after the initial three year period until terminated by either party (the Soviet proposal).

(g) Discussions are still proceeding on the nature of the Soviet commitment for the purchase of wheat. The Soviet side clearly understand that agreement on this is basic to any trade agreement between us.

2. At this point in the negotiations the Canadian delegation would find it of great assistance to receive guidance from the Ministers concerned on the following outstanding issues.

I. SHIPPING

3. The Canadian side has argued that we have not included clauses providing for most-favoured-nation treatment of shipping in any trade agreements since the war; that we consider it preferable that trade agreements should not deal with such extraneous subjects as shipping; and that in any case Soviet shipping already receives as favourable treatment in all substantial respects as the shipping of any other foreign country. The Soviet Delegation has not suggested that our present treatment of Soviet shipping is discriminatory, but they have emphasized that they attach a good deal of importance to having a shipping article in the Agreement, if only for the sake of appearance. They have stated (truly enough) that they have such an article in virtually all their trade agreements.

4. We do not yet know whether the Soviet Delegation will decide that they cannot accept an agreement without such an article, but the Canadian negotiators would be glad to know whether in such an eventuality some kind of article on shipping could be accepted by the Canadian Government.

5. While there are no significant restrictions on Soviet ships entering any Canadian ports (including Great Lakes ports) at present, the question is whether the Government would be willing to guarantee to the Soviet Union such treatment for the duration of the Agreement. From the point of view of security it would no doubt be desirable to retain our freedom to prohibit Soviet ships from entering our ports should we ever decide circumstances warranted this. The security escape clause already agreed upon (paragraph 1(b) above) would however leave us free to take such a step. We might decide for other reasons however that we did not wish to give Soviet shipping any right of access to the St. Lawrence Seaway above Montreal and the Great Lakes. In such circumstances it might be embarrassing to have to invoke the security escape clause. It might however be possible to reach a compromise on an article which would not guarantee any rights above Montreal. A possible draft of such an article is attached at Appendix A,† together with the article proposed by the Soviet Delegation.

6. It would be helpful for our delegation to know:

(a) whether, if it proved necessary for the success of the negotiations they could accept a shipping article; and

(b) in such case, whether, if a restricted article was entirely unacceptable to the USSR, our delegation could in the last resort agree to an article which applied to ports above Montreal as well as to other ports; all on the assumption that in other respects a satisfactory agreement is within reach.[65]

7. In any such discussions with the USSR we would propose to talk about merchant ships and their cargoes, not passengers or crew, and in terms of the particular facilities in respect of which the USSR would want most-favoured-nation treatment.

II. MOST-FAVOURED-NATION TREATMENT OF NATURAL AND JURIDICAL PERSONS

8. The Soviet proposal on this subject is attached at Appendix B† together with a Canadian redraft. The former would involve two commitments on Canada's part:

(a) that Soviet citizens engaged in business in Canada should enjoy personally and in respect of their property a treatment no less favourable than the nationals and juridical persons of a most favoured nation; and

(b) that Soviet citizens might sue in our courts and enjoy a free and easy access to our courts.

[We undertook commitments similar to these in three earlier commercial treaties, Japan (1913) (no longer in force), France (1933) and Poland (1935)]. In respect of commitment (a) the Deputy Minister of Justice has advised that:

"It has been suggested to me that the protection of such personal and property rights could only be effected by provincial legislation. However, the view I take is that legislation which would impair the rights of any class of aliens could not be validly enacted by a provincial legislature since such legislation would be in relation to 'Naturalization and Aliens'. Any legislation which purported to protect these rights of aliens as such would be within the exclusive competence of Parliament. I can think of no ground upon which the enforcement of such a provision would be beyond the jurisdiction of the federal authorities."

9. We feel we should point out however what might be the situation in the unlikely event that a province were to enact legislation which treated Soviet citizens in particular less favourably than other aliens and a case arose in the courts calling into question the competence of the provincial legislature in this respect. If the Court's decision were consistent with Mr. Varcoe's opinion there would presumably be no problem. If however the provincial legislation were upheld, the Government would be faced with the prospect (1) of being

could we [leave?] it up to our [own negotiators?] [L.B. Pearson] in breach of a treaty obligation or (2) of disallowing the provincial legislation or (3) of introducing legislation in Parliament to implement the treaty guarantee. In this last case if the federal legislation were challenged it would mean that the trade agreement with the USSR would be the subject of a test case on the Federal Government's power to implement treaties.

10. Apart from these conceivable difficulties you will be aware of the possibility of public criticism of such provisions in an Agreement with the USSR. We are not in a position to judge how extensive such criticism — apart from possible criticism of the fact of entering into an agreement at all with the USSR — is likely to be.

11. In respect of commitment (b), Mr. Varcoe has advised:

"... respecting access to the courts similar considerations apply as in the case of the first proposal, and I should think that the proposal is unobjectionable from a constitutional point of view since it would be clearly beyond the authority of a province to deny to Russian nationals access to the courts.

"I might add, however, that the provinces might validly impose restrictions which would not be directed towards discrimination against nationals of the USSR although they might in practice limit access to the court by such persons, among others. I have in mind such matters as rules relating to security for costs, the taking of evidence on commission, proof of foreign law and valid moratorium laws."

III. ARBITRATION

12. The Soviet proposal is attached at Appendix C†. This would provide:

(a) That persons engaged in trade transactions might agree that disputes arising thereout should be settled by arbitration;

(b) that such arbitration agreement excluded any recourse to the courts; and

(c) presumably, that the contracting parties would undertake to provide for the enforcement in their territory of an arbitration award.

13. The Deputy Minister of Justice is of opinion that "there is no reason why, if it appears desirable to do so, Canada should not agree to such a term, so long as it is clearly understood that inclusion of such terms in any particular agreement is not a matter over which Parliament exercises exclusive jurisdiction." He has indicated that (b) would have to be modified. With regard to (c) he has said "I am not in a position to state that there is a law in each of the provinces of Canada providing for the enforcement of arbitration agreements. Where there is such a law, I am satisfied that a province could not, by legislative enactment, deny to Russians the right to the remedy thereby afforded. If there is no such law, Parliament could, no doubt, under section 101 of the British North America Act, give jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court to enforce the arbitration award."

14. While it is evidently within the Government's competence to agree to an article along lines somewhat like those proposed, to do so might lead to difficulty or embarrassment in the future. The Government might not wish for example to contemplate seeking an Act of Parliament to put this Agreement on the statute books; yet this could in certain circumstances become necessary in order that the Exchequer Court might be used to enforce arbitration awards.

15. I suggest that the most we should consider at this stage with regard to these two proposed articles is whether the Canadian delegation might be authorized to indicate to the Russians, if necessary, that we might agree to an article along the lines of the Soviet proposal on the treatment of nationals, etc., but not to an article on arbitration. It is conceivable that the Soviet Delegation might regard this as an adequate attempt to meet them halfway.

If this failed, the Cabinet would then have to be asked to give consideration to the possibility of an article on arbitration, which would have to be very carefully phrased.

16. I should be grateful to have your comments as soon as possible as it is hoped to have a further meeting with the Soviet Delegation Friday afternoon.

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE USSR

I understand that there will be a discussion in Cabinet today of the possibility of including in the proposed Trade Agreement an article on the treatment of citizens and juridical persons of each contracting party in the territory of the other.

2. The Soviet proposal on this subject is attached. Also attached is a redraft the Canadian group have prepared. The principal changes are:

(a) To ensure that the rights accorded by the USSR will apply not only to Canadian citizens, but also persons domiciled in Canada carrying on business on the same basis as Canadian citizens;

(b) in the term "enjoy ... treatment no less favourable" etc., we have inserted the phrase "according to law" so as not to appear to be guaranteeing non-discrimination on the part of private firms and individuals in Canada;

(c) the third paragraph has been put in terms of most-favoured-nation treatment. We thought the term "free and easy access to the courts" could be misunderstood.

3. As Ministers had agreed, we gave the Soviet Delegation yesterday, our views on a shipping article. They found this acceptable in principle, although there may still be some discussion about individual words.

4. Also attached for your information, is a rough consolidation of the draft agreement† as it stands now (you may have received a copy of this from Mr. Howe). The text of the draft on shipping, which we presented to the Soviet Delegation, will be found on page five.

SOVIET PROPOSAL

Canadian merchants and manufacturers, physical or juridical persons constituted in accordance with Canadian laws, when engaged in business activity in the territory of the USSR personally or through their appointed representatives under conditions prescribed by the legislation of the USSR, shall enjoy personally and in respect of their property a treatment no less favourable than the nationals and juridical persons of a most-favoured-nation.

Soviet state business organizations and other juridical persons, constituted in accordance with Soviet laws, as well as Soviet citizens when engaged in business activity in the territory of Canada personally or through their appointed representatives under conditions prescribed by the legislation of Canada, shall enjoy personally and in respect of their property a treatment no less favourable than the nationals and juridical persons of a most-favoured-nation.

The nationals and juridical persons of either Contracting Party may sue in courts and shall enjoy a free and easy access to the courts of the other Contracting Party.

CANADIAN REDRAFT

Canadian citizens, juridical persons constituted in accordance with the laws in force in Canada and other natural persons domiciled and carrying on business in Canada shall, when engaged in business activity in the territory of the USSR, enjoy in respect of their persons and their property treatment according to law no less favourable than that accorded to the natural and juridical persons of the most-favoured-nation.

Soviet state business organizations and other juridical persons, constituted in accordance with Soviet laws, as well as Soviet citizens shall, when engaged in business activity in the territory of Canada personally or through their appointed representatives under conditions prescribed by the laws in force in Canada, enjoy in respect of their persons and their property treatment according to law no less favourable than that accorded to the natural and juridical persons of the most-favoured-nation.

The natural and juridical persons specified in paragraphs 1 and 2 shall enjoy access to the courts of the other Contracting Party on the same basis as natural and juridical persons of the most-favoured-nation.

TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE U.S.S.R.; PROPOSED AGREEMENT
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 2)

11. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that the negotiations with the U.S.S.R. trade delegation were proceeding well and it seemed likely that an agreement would emerge. However, there were a number of problems still to be settled, of which the most important was a Russian proposal for a clause giving to the citizens and organizations of each country, carrying on business in the other country, free and easy access to the courts of that country. The Russians had also requested clauses on arbitration and general m.f.n. treatment for shipping. He understood they had agreed to drop the former request, and would likely be willing to accept an article for m.f.n. treatment for shipping which would not apply to ports on the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence above Montreal. Even if this shipping arrangement seemed likely to lead to difficulties, the broad security clause in the agreement could always be invoked.

As regards the main problem, he felt a clause along the lines of the Russian proposal should be accepted, provided it covered not only Canadian citizens, but also persons domiciled in Canada, that the m.f.n. treatment to be granted be according to the laws of each nation, and that access to the courts be on the same basis as in other m.f.n. agreements.

12. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was no statement now in the law that aliens had normal access to the courts. If there were, this could be pointed to in answer to the Russian request. Some day it would be desirable to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to provide access for aliens to the courts in civil cases. To take such a step, however, as a direct result of the Russian agreement would be unwise and hence it was necessary to have this provision in the agreement.

(b) In practice, aliens had free access to the courts and were under no disability in this connection at all. By putting such a formal provision in a treaty with the Russians, the omission in the law might be pointed up and criticized.

(c) No request had been made to station more Russian nationals in Canada following the conclusion of a treaty. It was said that none were necessary to facilitate the buying of wheat, which would be done indirectly, through normal commercial channels. On the other hand, it could be expected that the U.S.S.R. would ask to have some extra purchasing agents sent to Canada. This was not unreasonable, but increased consular and diplomatic staffs were not necessary and such requests should be refused.

(d) Canada had similar m.f.n. treaties with most other European countries. To allow the negotiations to founder because of a refusal to include a clause which formally provided for access to the courts, would leave an unfortunate impression with the public.

(e) Most important treaties were approved by Parliament before ratification. This had not been the practice for trade treaties, but possibly it should be done in this instance. If such were the case, an extensive debate could be expected. In any event, the final document should be tabled.

13. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the trade negotiations with the U.S.S.R., and agreed that articles, as proposed by the Minister, be included in the draft to provide for access to the courts, and to give m.f.n. treatment to shipping in seaports, but not including any such ports on the St. Lawrence River or Great Lakes above Montreal.

PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE USSR

We have now reached provisional agreement with the Soviet delegation on all issues except three. One of these is the exact nature of the Soviet undertaking on wheat purchases. The other two are the shipping article and the article providing for non-discrimination on the part of state trading enterprises.

2. On shipping we have proposed an article which would provide for most-favoured-nation treatment of the ships of each country in the sea ports of the other. For the purposes of this article it was stipulated that sea ports would not include any ports on the St. Lawrence River above Montreal or on the Great Lakes. At the time, Mr. Borisov thought this would be acceptable. He has now reported, however, that Moscow has found it entirely unacceptable since it would seem to imply that there might be discrimination against Soviet ships above Montreal, which does not now exist in practice. Moreover, we ourselves have had some second thoughts about the wisdom of hinting in an agreement with any country that we may some day wish to put restrictions on access to the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes.

3. We are faced now with two possibilities — we can either tell the Soviet delegation that in the circumstances it would be better not to include any article on shipping and regard this as a sticking-point, or else we can decide to accept a general shipping clause in the knowledge that the St. Lawrence Seaway will not be open until after the expiry of the three-year term of this Agreement. The following would be the terms of the article:

"The merchant vessels of either Contracting Party and the cargoes of such vessels upon arrival at and departure from the seaports of the other party and during the time spent in such seaports shall enjoy the treatment accorded to the most-favoured-nation.

"The provisions of the first paragraphs of this Article shall now apply to the performance of harbour services including pilotage and towing, nor to coastal shipping."

4. If we adopted this course we would think it might be desirable to accompany the Agreement with a letter to the head of the Soviet delegation, putting the USSR on notice that we are not prejudging the position of ports above Montreal after the completion of the Seaway. This would be made public along with the Agreement and should serve to allay possible criticism here and in the United States, to the effect that we were letting the Russians into the Seaway. In answer to criticism that we were now guaranteeing access to Soviet ships capable of using the existing 14 foot canals if the Soviet Union has any such ships, it would probably be sufficient to point to the Security Clause which entitles us to apply prohibitions or restrictions of any kind for the protection of our essential security interests. The text of a possible letter† is attached.

5. We would welcome your views on these alternatives, and, if you favour the second alternative, on the desirability of sending the head of the Soviet delegation a letter along the lines of the attached draft.[66]

6. We had proposed an article in which each country would promise that its state trading enterprises would follow a policy of non-discrimination in all foreign purchases and sales; in other words, that a Soviet state enterprise, for example, would take into account only commercial considerations when deciding whether to deal with a firm in Canada or to deal elsewhere.

7. The Soviet delegation insist strongly that they cannot accept any such article. They argue that this would imply that their state trading enterprises make a practice of discriminating in order to fulfil other than commercial purposes. They have never included any such provisions in their trade agreements. They argue too that although state enterprises conduct all Soviet business and private enterprises nearly all Canadian business, there would be no corresponding obligation on private enterprises in Canada to take into account only commercial considerations when deciding whether to place an order in the USSR. There is some justice in this contention, although for most practical purposes one can rely on the fact that it is in a private firm's own interest to buy from the cheapest supplier of all those entitled to most-favoured-nation tariff treatment.

8. We do not believe that an article providing for non-discrimination on the part of state enterprises will really be of any practical value. We have two reasons for seeking it however. In the first place there is such an article in the GATT and in some of our other trade agreements. Some countries, such as Japan, might complain if we omitted this from an agreement with the greatest state trading country in the world, when we had insisted on

[66] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I think that the second alternative safeguarded as suggested would be acceptable. L.B. P[earson] including it in our agreements with them. In the second place, such an article might be of some importance from the point of view of presentation in Canada.

9. We may be trying on the Russians today a modified version which might appear less objectionable to them. We have no real expectation that they will accept this. Accordingly it would be very helpful to know how much importance you would attach to such an article, if as appears not unlikely, reasonably satisfactory agreement is reached on all other issues. We understand that Mr. Harris feels rather strongly that we should insist on this provision, whereas Mr. Howe may not consider it quite so important.[67]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 23, 1956

CANADIAN-SOVIET TRADE AGREEMENT

I understand that this subject is not expected to be discussed at this morning's Cabinet meeting. You might wish, however, to have a report on the position which has now been reached.

2. At yesterday's meeting with the Soviet Delegation the Canadian side presented drafts on the outstanding points (i.e. arbitration, state trading and shipping) which went as far as seemed possible in the direction of the original Soviet proposals. It appeared from the preliminary discussion on these texts that the Russians might be able to accept them.

3. We then put to the Soviet Delegation a new text of the letter† on wheat which followed their language fairly closely but made it quite clear that they would be under an unconditional obligation to buy a minimum of 400,000 tons of wheat each year during the three-year life of the Agreement. The Soviet side was apparently anxious to have the obligation in respect of the second and third year left somewhat loose and made dependent on the progress of their sales to Canada. We indicated that while we would be quite happy to have them take account of developments in their trade with Canada in determining how much wheat they might buy above 400,000 tons each year, we were not prepared to leave open the possibility that they might buy less than that amount if they were dissatisfied with the volume of their exports to Canada. Mr. Sharp stated that this was our firm position and suggested that Mr. Borisov might meet with Mr. Howe later that day if he wished confirmation of that fact or if he wished to restate the Soviet view.

4. Towards the end of yesterday afternoon Mr. Borisov met with Mr. Howe and Mr. Howe was quite categorical in asserting that this was an inflexible condition. He noted that originally we had suggested 500,000 tons of wheat per annum. In the course of the negotiations we had recognized that it might be justifiable to set the minimum amount at 400,000 tons a year and provide for a possible increase in this figure if the Russians felt that their trade under the Agreement was progressing satisfactorily. Mr. Borisov enquired

[67] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I am inclined to share Mr. Howe's view on this. L.B. P[earson] whether this was the definite position of the Canadian Government and Mr. Howe assured him that it was. Mr. Borisov then went off to consider the proposition further and to consult Moscow.

5. It is the view of all members of the Canadian negotiating team that the Government would be wise to stick on this point.[68] If the Russians accept it the resulting Agreement would be one which on balance would seem satisfactory from Canada's point of view. If the Russians reject it and the negotiations break down it will be evident that this has happened only because the Russians were not willing to agree with a condition which had been stated clearly by the Canadian side from the outset (and which the Canadian side had been reasonable enough to reduce somewhat during the negotiations).

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH THE U.S.S.R.
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 15)

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the Canadian negotiating group and the Soviet delegation had now reached provisional agreement on the text of a trade agreement and two accompanying exchanges of letters. The first exchange would give Canada the right to fix values for duty if any product was being imported in such quantities or under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers. In the second, Russia agreed to buy, during the three-year term of the agreement, between 1.2 and 1.5 million metric tons of wheat in annual amounts of between 400,000 and 500,000 tons. How much more than 400,000 tons would be taken in the second and third years would be decided by the Soviet Union in the light of the volume of sales of Soviet goods.

[68] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

The agreement itself contained the customary most favoured nation provisions and also provisions, not usually included in recent agreements, on shipping, the legal treatment of citizens and firms of each country, and the possibility of arbitration of disputes. A security escape clause was also included which was thought to be broad enough to cover any possible situation. The agreement would come into force provisionally on signature but was to be ratified within ninety days. It would last for three years unless both countries agreed to extend it for a further period. He recommended, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Finance, Trade and Commerce, and National Revenue, that the agreement be entered into and the proposed exchange of letters effected.

Explanatory material was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Feb. 27, 1956;† draft trade agreement with the U.S.S.R.† and exchanges of correspondence†)

2. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Customs duty meant very little in the U.S.S.R. because it was a state trading country and the Soviet authorities could set any value they liked on Canadian exports. This was not expected to present any serious difficulty, however, as Canada would be selling mainly wheat, for which orders were already being placed, and perhaps some barley. The principal purchases by Canada would continue to be furs and possibly manganese.

(b) Some embarrassment might arise because Canadian seamen on the Great Lakes were now required to have a security clearance, whereas under this treaty Soviet seamen could enter the same waters and not be subject to these regulations. It was noted, however, that all seamen from other countries could come into the Great Lakes now with no screening, and the security escape clause would enable Canada to take any action seen fit. In practice, no great problem would occur because the wheat would be shipped from Vancouver.

(c) It could be anticipated that the Russians would now ask for stronger trade representation, for example, the establishment of a branch of A.M.T.O.R.G. in Winnipeg.

(d) It was probably desirable that the treaty should be approved by Parliament. Practically all treaties on political matters and most of the important commercial treaties had been so approved before ratification, the most recent being the Japanese treaty.[69] On balance, it would be desirable to seek parliamentary approval of this document. The accompanying exchanges of letters as well as the treaty itself would be tabled.

3. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Finance and National Revenue, and agreed,

(a) that the Canadian government enter into a trade agreement with the U.S.S.R. in the terms submitted, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be issued with full powers to sign the agreement;

(b) that the exchanges of letters in regard to values for duty and purchases of wheat be effected; and,

[69] Voir/See Volume 20, Document 809.

(c) that the agreement be ratified within 90 days of signature after approval by Parliament, if that was considered necessary in this case.[70]

Draft Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet[71]

SECRET Ottawa, April 12, 1956

SOVIET REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO OPEN A TRADE OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

Following the conclusion of the Trade Agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the visiting Soviet officials requested permission for "Exportkhleb", the Soviet State trading corporation which deals in grain, to open a small office of some kind in Vancouver to arrange purchases and shipment of Canadian wheat to the USSR. They indicated that only about three or four Soviet nationals would be needed, in addition to locally-employed Canadian clerical staff. They said they were not asking that this office or its personnel be accorded diplomatic privileges or immunities. They indicated that there was no intention, at present, of following up this request with proposals for other trade offices.

Any such office would raise certain difficulties for us. It must be assumed that in addition to its legitimate activities it would probably be used as a centre for organizing subversive activities and would be a part of the Soviet intelligence network. There would undoubtedly be strong reactions, also, from the ethnic minorities of Slavic origin in Western Canada.

The USSR could make use of the existing firms in the grain trade in Canada. These could make all arrangements for the purchase and shipment of wheat to the USSR just as they do for other countries including Poland. If, however, as they have indicated to us, the Soviet authorities prefer not to make use of the established firms in the trade they have a plausible commercial justification for their request, and they would no doubt feel they were in a position to argue that a refusal on our part would be unreasonable after we had signed a Trade Agreement. On the other hand, there is no provision in the Agreement that requires us to accede to their request, and in my opinion they could not legitimately go back on their undertaking about wheat purchases if we turned it down.

[71] Ce mémoire, que Pearson n'a pas utilisé au Cabinet, a été préparé en consultation avec d'autres « interested departments. » Léger à Pearson, 12 avril 1956, MAE 6226-A-40.

This memorandum, which Pearson did not use in Cabinet, was prepared in consultation with other "interested departments." Léger to Pearson, April 12, 1956, DEA 6226-A-40.

It is for the Cabinet to decide whether or not to agree to the Soviet request. If the Cabinet does agree to this proposal consideration should be given to the kind of office to be permitted. There are four possible forms:

(a) A Vancouver office for the Commercial Counsellor of the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa;

(b) a Soviet Trade Commissioner's office or Soviet Trade Mission;

(c) a Soviet-owned company incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act; and

(d) a Vancouver office for representatives of "Exportkhleb".

The first of these would be the most undesirable. Such an office would have immunity of premises, etc., and the privilege of using cypher and the diplomatic bag. These diplomatic immunities and privileges would be of great assistance to Soviet espionage and subversive activities.

A Trade Commissioner or Trade Mission would have considerable official prestige which could aid the Soviet subversive effort and trouble the ethnic minorities.

A company would be difficult to close down, provided it fulfilled the not very onerous requirements of the Companies Act. Our travel regulations could not readily be imposed on its Soviet members.

A Vancouver office for three or four Soviet citizens representing "Exportkhleb" would seem to be the least disadvantageous kind of office to be permitted. It would not enjoy diplomatic privileges or immunities, or official standing in the community. The Canadian Government could close it down at any time. As its members could be considered part of the Soviet household in Canada, the travel regulations could be extended to them.

If the Cabinet decides to admit a Soviet trade office to handle wheat purchases and shipments, I recommend:

(a) That it should take the form of a simple local office of "Exportkhleb";

(b) that the number of Soviet nationals serving in the office should not exceed three, and should be taken into account in determining the number of Soviet representatives in Canada;

(c) that the office should be closed on the expiry of the Trade Agreement;

(d) that as a matter of principle we should obtain the reciprocal right to establish such an office in the USSR, even though we have no present intention of making use of such a right; and

(d) that we should specify that a condition of our agreeing to the establishment of this office would be the extension, to the Soviet nationals employed in it, of the travel regulations at present imposed upon the Soviet Embassy.

SOVIET REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO OPEN A TRADE OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

32. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Soviet ambassador had requested permission, on behalf of his government, to open a trade office in Vancouver in order to facilitate wheat shipments. This request was justified, although the U.S.S.R. could make use of the existing firms in the grain trade in Canada. Consideration would be given to the kind of office to be permitted. There were three possible forms:

(a) a branch office of the Soviet Embassy;

(b) a Soviet Trade Commissioner's office; or

(c) a Vancouver office for representatives of "Exportkhleb" which is the Soviet wheat export agency.

The Minister recommended the third alternative which would involve a small staff of two or three Soviet nationals, and no diplomatic status. In any event, it would be undesirable to grant diplomatic privileges or immunities in this case.

33. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the request made by the Soviet government to open a trade office in Vancouver, and agreed that permission be given provided such an office was organized as a small business office without any diplomatic privileges or immunities.

VANCOUVER OFFICE OF "EXPORTKHLEB"

I understand that Cabinet agreed this morning that the USSR should be permitted to open a small office of "Exportkhleb", the Soviet State trading corporation which deals in grain, in Vancouver.

I would suggest, if you agree, that when the Soviet Ambassador, is informed of this he should also be told of the following conditions:

(a) That it should take the form of a simple local office of "Exportkhleb";

(b) that the number of Soviet nationals serving in the office should not exceed three, and should be taken into account in determining the number of Soviet representatives in Canada;[72]

(c) that the office should be closed on the expiry of the Trade Agreement;

(d) that we should have the reciprocal right to establish such an office in the USSR, if we should desire to do so at some future date; and

(e) that we will extend to the Soviet nationals employed in this office the travel regulations at present imposed upon the Soviet Embassy.

I suggest that the European Division should tell the Soviet Ambassador of our consent to this proposal at the same time as they give him several less welcome messages within the next few days.[73]

OPENING OF AN OFFICE OF EXPORTKHLEB IN VANCOUVER

The Commercial Counsellor of the Soviet Embassy called on me today to request clarification of a few points in our aide-mémoire of April 27, 1956,† to the Soviet Ambassador, concerning the conditions for the opening of an office of Exportkhleb in Vancouver. He wanted to know first whether the conditions which we had laid down were in accordance with Canadian laws. I asked him what he meant by that, and he said he understood that foreign companies which wished to operate in Canada were obliged to follow certain regulations. Were the regulations which we had laid down for Exportkhleb in accordance with those general Canadian laws?

2. I replied that the situation was quite different since it was not a question of a private foreign company requesting permission to operate in Canada but of the Soviet government, and this was inevitable since all Soviet trade was in the hands of the State. In this case it was a question of negotiating between two governments the conditions under which we were prepared to grant them the privilege of opening an office in Vancouver.

3. Mr. Lobatchev then mentioned that he had heard a Czech company was operating in Canada. I told him that that was true but that it would be obliged to function according to Canadian law and to register its charter according to Canadian laws. I added that the case was quite different since it had been founded just after the war as a private company, and we are prepared to permit it to continue to operate but in accordance with certain provisions.

4. Mr. Lobatchev then said he wished to ask for some information about a few points in our aide-mémoire. First, he wished to know why we were restricting the number of Soviet nationals, to which I answered that we considered that grain was already moving to the U.S.S.R. very easily without the help of an office in Vancouver and we thought that the number mentioned was quite adequate for this work. He then asked what was the reason for limiting the term under which it could function to the period of the Soviet-Canadian Trade Agreement, and I answered that this was not my particular field of activity but I presumed that at the end of that time there would be an opportunity to re-examine the whole question. Finally he asked me if we intended to open an office in the U.S.S.R. outside Moscow, and if so, where. I answered that as in all cases of this sort it was usually considered equitable and justifiable to proceed on the basis of reciprocity and that we wished to have the right to open an office outside Moscow. I said, on prompting from him, that such an office, if opened, would be located in a city of the U.S.S.R. which had a direct bearing on the question of Soviet-Canadian trade. It would not be chosen quite arbitrarily. He seemed satisfied by this answer.

Mr. Ritchie:- this is interesting J.F. G[randy]
Mr. Grandy: I am troubled by para 2. T[rade] & C[ommerce], and Finance as well as Legal should see. May we discuss. A.E. R[itchie]

5. Lobatchev then mentioned casually the visit of the delegation from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and said he had the impression that they wished to do serious business. I told him that this was a private enterprise, but that in the talks we had had with Mr. Henderson and Mr. Wood we also had the impression that they wanted to make of this a worthwhile affair, in fact, that they would not go through with the trip unless they could be assured of the co-operation of the Soviet authorities. Lobatchev said he thought this was going to be arranged.

6. The Commercial Counsellor asked me if we had yet appointed an Attaché to our Embassy to look after the question of customs evaluations. I said that so far as I knew we had not yet done so. He replied that he hoped we would appoint a Commercial Attaché to Moscow who could look after both jobs. In his opinion this would be far more useful. I answered that it was a question partly of two different departments, and partly that there was not enough trade to justify, at the present time at any rate, the considerable cost of maintaining a Commercial Attaché at our Embassy in Moscow.

7. Finally, Mr. Lobatchev raised the question of foreign investments in Canada by saying that he was very interested in this question. He mentioned that Mr. Borisov, just prior to his departure for Russia, had talked to a Canadian Minister about U.S. investments in Canada. The Minister (I presume Mr. Howe) replied that Canada needed foreign capital and would welcome it from any source, including Russia. Now, Mr. Lobatchev wanted to know how to go about making investments in Canada. I replied that private individuals had presumably only to conform to our business laws but that I really knew very little about it, not being a capitalist myself. Investment by a foreign government was, however, another matter and I supposed would require inter-governmental negotiations.

8. Mr. Lobatchev thanked me very gravely for this information, and I have no doubt that after Mr. Borisov reported his conversation a serious study was undertaken of the question of the possibility of Soviet capital investment in Canada!

TWENTIETH CONGRESS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION

I am attaching for your information a departmental memorandum analyzing the main features of the 20th Party Congress. I am sure you will want to read it in its entirety, but I would draw your attention in particular to the opening paragraphs and to the conclusions.

Although it has not been prepared specifically for these purposes, I think it should serve you well for your discussions with Mr. Dulles at White Sulphur Springs, and also for your meetings with the External Affairs Committee.[75] It has been prepared on the basis of the texts of speeches given at the Congress and of the analysis provided by our Embassy in Moscow.

Memorandum by European Division

THE TWENTIETH CONGRESS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION

The main purpose in calling the 20th Congress of the C.P.S.U. was to lay down in unequivocal terms for the sake of Party and Government officials the new direction of Soviet policy, both internally and externally, under the present leadership. It must have been apparent to all within the Soviet Union that a new direction had been given to Soviet policy since Stalin's death and since the last Party Congress in October 1952, but to make clear what that new direction was and how it affected all aspects of internal and external policy, to remove possible doubts and ambiguities, a definitive and comprehensive statement was necessary. The fact that the 19th Congress was called in October 1952, thirteen years after the previous Congress, and the 20th Congress only 3 1/2 years later, is a clear indication that it was to serve the purposes of the new leaders in providing the platform for a clarification of their policies, and a shifting of blame for past failures onto the shoulders of Stalin and Beria.

The first impression from reading the reports of the Congress is that Stalin — and Stalinism — are indeed dead. With great frankness and with great self-confidence, the present leaders have rejected the isolation, the rigidity of thought and action, and publicly at least the terrorism which characterized Stalin's era. They have rejected one-man rule and have established firmly the principle of collective leadership, a leadership which promises a mellower rule and exhibits at least some concern for public opinion. Making virtue out of the necessity of avoiding all-out thermonuclear war, they have rejected the inevitability of war and committed themselves to a period of "peaceful co-existence" and economic competition with the non-communist world.

The leaders have not abandoned their ultimate aims for the socialization of the world. There is to be no peaceful co-existence between ideologies, and they remain convinced of the ultimate triumph of communism. New flexibility is to be permitted in the method of arriving at "socialism" and the possibility of different forms of socialism in different countries is recognized.

Heavy industry and the defence of the Soviet Union retain their priority over consumer goods. Although comparatively little was said about defence at the Congress, there was no indication there or elsewhere that the Soviet Union has any other intention than to maintain and even increase its defensive capabilities, despite pronouncements on peaceful co-existence between states and the non-inevitability of war.

[75] Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:
We would also wish to pass this on to the Prime Minister in view of his forthcoming visit to Washington, if you agree. [J. Léger]
OK L.B. P[earson]

The determination to catch up with the West industrially as quickly as possible and to use part of the product for economic penetration will continue to have precedence over the satisfaction of consumer wants within the Soviet Union. Basic to this determination is the necessity of raising the efficiency of the Soviet economic system, with more regard for pragmatism than for doctrine.

It would be agreeable to be able to lay claim in the West for the credit in forcing a change in Soviet methods. But, without minimizing the role played by Western unity in defence preparations in the face of the Communist threat, it seems more likely that it was primarily the ineffectiveness of Stalinism which caused the change. There is every reason to believe that most of Stalin's closest associates were beginning to question the validity of his methods even before his death, and some of these methods were scrapped within weeks of his demise. In the light of the developments since then it is apparent that this dissatisfaction with Stalinism has increased apace, and has little essentially to do with Western policy.

Stalin's foreign and internal policies certainly served their purpose but his fault was his unwillingness to recognize that they had to be changed to meet a new Western reaction. The new régime has shown remarkable ability in developing policies suitable for the present circumstances. It is an indication of stability in the Soviet political system that they were able to accomplish this change with a minimum (by Soviet standards) of upsets and bloodshed. This may not prove the strength of the régime, but it could scarcely have been accomplished by a group of men who felt weak or uncertain. And it must be admitted that the new policy is having considerable success and that, as the basic Soviet aims remain the same, the challenge from the USSR, while changed in character, remains strong and in some respects more dangerous than the nakedly aggressive policy of Stalin.

Foreign Policy

Two themes dominated the statements on foreign policy, and nowhere is the self-confidence of the present leadership more apparent than in this field. The first is that socialism has emerged from the confines of one country, beleaguered by hostile forces, and has transformed itself into a world system which is confident, growing and strong. The second is that peaceful co-existence between states of differing social system is not only desirable but necessary. "There are only two ways, either peaceful co-existence or the most devastating war in history. There is no third alternative." (Khrushchev). The two themes are closely intertwined.

Khrushchev has revised the Marxist-Leninist premise that while imperialism exists, wars are inevitable. He said: "The premise was worked out at a time when, firstly, imperialism was an all-embracing world system, and, secondly, the social and political forces not interested in war were weak and not sufficiently well organized, and by virtue of this could not force the imperialists to eschew wars ... as long as imperialism exists the economic basis for the outbreak of war persists ... The reactionary forces may try to let loose war. But there is no fatal inevitability of war ... There are (now) powerful social and political forces commanding serious means capable of preventing the unleashing of war by the imperialists, and — should they try to start it — of delivering a smashing rebuff to the aggressors and thwarting their adventuristic plans." Mikoyan put it more explicitly this way: "They (the Americans) are restrained — apart from public opinion, apart from the great military strength of the countries of socialism — by another new important circumstance. It is the appearance of atomic and hydrogen bombs not only in America but also in the Soviet Union, as well as the means to carry these bombs to any point on earth by aircraft or rockets." Zhukov added that the Soviet Union has diverse atomic and nuclear weapons, mighty guided missiles, among them long-range missiles, and a first-class jet air force. "The Soviet Union is now able to wreck any plans of the West to confine hostilities to the continent of Europe."

This, clearly, is the policy of the deterrent, turned to Soviet advantage. The leaders are saying in effect, that because of near-parity in the field of thermonuclear capacities, the deterrent is now two-edged. Zhukov, in his remark about Europe, may also be expressing the Soviet version of massive retaliation. If this is the case, we should certainly be taking a new look at our basic strategic planning, and at the possibility that the traffic will bear a considerable amount more Soviet "mischief" short of war, without risking the general war which both sides by tacit agreement appear to regard as unthinkable.

The world outside the U.S.S.R. is arranged in a Soviet order of merit which is quite revealing of the Soviet position. First come Communist China and the people's democracies of Europe and Asia with which closer economic relations are to be developed, closely followed by Yugoslavia. Next come the countries which have "liberated" themselves from the colonial system but have not permitted themselves to be drawn into military blocs — India, Burma, Afghanistan, Egypt, Syria and "other states upholding positions of peace" — followed by Finland, Austria and "other neutral countries." Thirdly come the countries with which relations are to be improved — United States, United Kingdom, France, Western Germany, Japan, Italy, Turkey, Iran and "other countries" — amongst which Iran, Turkey and Pakistan "will realize that normal relations with the U.S.S.R. are in their vital interest." The desire for better relations with the U.S.A. was re-emphasized.

It is significant that many of the countries along the periphery of the Sino-Soviet bloc which the Soviet Union is trying to woo by diplomacy, propaganda and economic measures are precisely those countries in whose territory are the United States Strategic Air Command medium range bomber bases. As a rough parity in thermonuclear weapons and means of delivering them is reached between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A., the major advantage of the West becomes what Paul Nitze has recently called the "geographical factor." The United States can only be bombed from bases on the Eurasian land mass; the U.S.S.R. is vulnerable to attack not only from North American but also from the ring of bases on the periphery of the bloc, from Norway to Pakistan. In taking the diplomatic, propaganda and economic offensive against these countries, the Soviet Union is doing so not only because many of them are under-developed and therefore offer good possibilities for an extension of Soviet influence. It is doing so also, and perhaps primarily, because of the existence of American bases on their territory. The Soviet offensive against some of the neutral and under-developed countries on its periphery can be at least in part explained by the desire to deny the use of their territory to the bomber and possible missile bases of the United States.

Collective security in Europe, collective security in Asia, and disarmament are singled out as the cardinal problems. Nothing new emerged on the first of these, except warnings that a "Washington-Bonn axis is increasing the war danger" and that the re-armament of Germany will reduce France to a third-rate power. There was no elaboration on collective security in Asia, merely a handsome tribute to India's Five Principles and China's proposal for a collective peace pact in Asia. On disarmament, Khrushchev re-iterated adherence to the Soviet proposals of May 10, 1955[76] and then said: "Pending agreement on the major questions of disarmament we express readiness to agree to certain partial measures in this sphere, such as the cessation of tests of thermo-nuclear weapons; not to permit the troops on the territory of Germany to have atomic weapons; reduction of military budgets." The first proposal is designed to embarrass the United States and the United Kingdom, which intend to have further tests this spring; the second would frustrate NATO plans for the use of tactical atomic weapons in Europe, which are essential for the defence of Western Europe; and the third would give tremendous advantage to the USSR which can, and does, hide military expenditures in other parts of its budget in a manner not possible in democratic countries.

As to the manner of dealing with these and other problems of foreign policy, Mikoyan, in an obvious attack on Stalinist foreign policy (and presumably on Molotov's method of implementing it) said that — "certain ossified forms" of Soviet diplomacy and foreign trade had now been discarded. The Central Committee was now pursuing an "active, flexible foreign policy high in principle, restrained, calm in tone and without sharp words". The Soviet Government had freely acknowledged "mistakes and shortcomings" in foreign policy and had rectified them.

Communism Abroad and the Transition to Socialism

Khrushchev had some particularly interesting things to say about the transition to "socialism" in other countries, both those which have already achieved it and those which have not. With respect to the former, he accepted as a point of doctrine what was implicit in the Soviet leaders' pilgrimage to Belgrade in May, 1955 and the rapprochement with Yugoslavia. He recognized that the re-organization of society along socialist lines may take different forms in different countries. As examples he cited the U.S.S.R., the people's democracies of Europe, Communist China and Yugoslavia. By so doing, he developed a much safer and more flexible theory than the Stalinist precept that all socialist countries must be modelled on the Soviet Union, a position which had become completely untenable in the light of developments in Yugoslavia and China in particular. There is little doubt that this is directed primarily at bringing Yugoslavia back into the fold, and secondarily at Communist China, where the theoreticians may have found a little bit galling the Soviet monopoly on the orthodox interpretation of the Marxist-Leninist scriptures. It does not imply, however, any relaxation of Sovietization in those countries of eastern Europe whose governments are directly subject to Soviet pressure and "advice."

Of even greater interest is the departure from the traditional stand that the transition to socialism must be accompanied by violence. Khrushchev said: "It is quite likely that the forms of the transition to socialism will become more and more variegated ... Civil war [is not obligatory] in all circumstances ... The winning of a stable parliamentary majority based on the mass revolutionary movement of the proletariat, would bring about for the working class of a number of capitalist and former colonial countries [the transition to socialism]. Of course, in countries where capitalism is still strong, and where it controls an enormous military and police machine, the serious resistance of the reactionary forces is inevitable. There the transition to socialism will proceed amidst conditions of an acute class revolutionary struggle. The political leadership of the working class, headed by its advance detachment [by which is meant the Communist Party] is the indispensable and decisive factor for all the forms of transition to socialism."

The new element in doctrine is the possibility that parliamentary action can lead to "socialist transformation" in the communist sense. This can only come about under the leadership of the Communist Party, by converting parliament from "an organ of bourgeois democracy into an instrument of genuinely popular will." Although it is not spelled out, it is quite clear that, once having achieved the socialist transformation of society, there would be no turning back by parliamentary processes. Reformism as such is just as firmly rejected as ever, even though the possibility of cooperating with the social democrats is envisaged in order to effect the transformation presumably on the Czech model. There is a clear call for renewed efforts on the part of the communists to form popular fronts particularly in France and Italy, as a means of gaining power. Of these countries, Khrushchev said: "The French and Italian working class, the French Communist Party and the Communists and Socialists of Italy have won signal successes in the parliamentary elections." No doubt the passages on parliamentary action are also directed at the uncommitted and former colonial countries, such as Indonesia, where, although there is respect for parliamentary forms, there is less understanding than in the West of how these forms could be twisted to communist ends.

The effect on the class struggle abroad is difficult entirely to foresee. In Italy we have already had an indication that the militants are not happy with the prospect of awaiting the Revolution by peaceful parliamentary means. Thus while giving to foreign Communists the means of co-operating with the Socialists, and appeasing the latter's fears of Soviet Communism, the Soviet Communist leaders may be weakening the élan which is needed to keep communism a driving force.

In spite of the stand on peaceful co-existence between countries with different political and social systems and economic competition with capitalism, there can in the Soviet view be no peaceful co-existence on matters of ideology. The passages on the transition to socialism made clear the transitory nature of peaceful co-existence, or rather that peaceful co-existence applies only to the avoidance of thermonuclear war. They merely mean that Communist power in a foreign country may be obtained by parliamentary methods; after that the Government falls automatically into the Soviet pattern of government, or something closely akin to it. And behind the policy of peaceful co-existence stands Soviet armed strength as a powerful instrument of blackmail when required. The C.P.S.U. and Communist Parties abroad are re-assured that faith in the ultimate triumph of communism throughout the world is as firm as ever.

Internal Policy

If the Soviet leaders wanted to impress one thing on the Party Congress and on the people of the Soviet Union it was that one-man dictatorship, with all it implied, is gone and that a collective leadership now governs the U.S.S.R. No single aspect of the Stalinist era came in for such widespread and thorough-going castigation as the "cult of personality", the deification of the individual, and specifically the supreme dictator who guided the destinies of the USSR with an iron hand for almost thirty years. The complete deference to Stalin was dropped within a very short time of his death. Attacks on the cult of personality have increased in the past year though as late as December 1955 Stalin was still referred to as the "true disciple and continuer of Lenin." The 20th Congress has given the coup de grace to the cult of personal leadership. One-man rule and Stalin's ideological contributions are to be completely dropped and discredited. Stripped of his ideological honours and of the mantle of omniscience, he may remain as the leader during the Great Patriotic War, perhaps flanked by a pantheon of the generals, but he no longer ranks with Lenin in communist mythology. He will, of course, provide the perfect scapegoat for any admission of errors in internal or external policy, from which the present leaders will be able to dissociate themselves.

Two of Stalin's major works came in for severe criticism, both of them most fully by Mikoyan. The first was the Short History of the C.P.S.U.(B) which has been the bible of the party since it appeared in 1939. Khrushchev said that a new party text-book was called for "based on historical facts". Mikoyan more explicitly condemned the Short History for its distorted version of the civil war of 1918-20 and the purges of the 'thirties, referring to the "alleged treacherous activity of individual party leaders of that time, who were unjustly declared enemies of the people many years after the events described." It is ironical that the present leaders survived the purges by aligning themselves with Stalin or at least by avoiding association with the purged leaders, and also were instrumental in effecting the purges. It is fascinating to conjecture which victims of the purges may now be re-instated in grace. The most important thing, however, is that the present régime is very anxious to dissociate itself from Stalinist terrorism and illegality, a fact borne out by the current emphasis on due regard for law, the large-scale releases of prisoners from forced labour camps and the diminished role of the secret police. This is not to say that the old methods of internal control could not become operative again tomorrow if the leaders felt it necessary because of a threat from abroad, a danger to the economy, or a threat to their positions. But the longer the "liberalism" persists and the further it extends, the more difficult will it be to revert to old methods.

The second major work of Stalin to come under fire has been his Economic Problems of Socialism in the U.S.S.R., a development foreshadowed by the establishment of an Institute for the Study of the Capitalist Economy and the partial re-appearance of Varga, the prominent Soviet economist who was discredited because of his disagreement with Stalin's interpretation of capitalist economics. Mikoyan referred to Stalin's analysis of the economy of the Soviet Union and the peoples' democracies as "superficial", and also said that it did not explain the growth of capitalist production in many countries since the war. Khrushchev stated that "only a timely confluence of circumstances of a favourable nature in capitalism retarded the growth of economic crises" but Mikoyan, the acknowledged economic expert in the party praesidium, warned that "we are seriously lagging behind in the study of the contemporary phase of capitalism," particularly the character and periodicity of the cyclical crises. The two themes of rejection of the major works were neatly blended in a final movement which was little more than a coda; Varga, the economist, has written an article in Pravda which re-instates Bela Kun, the Hungarian communist leader who was a contemporary of Lenin and who was purged by Stalin in the 'thirties.

The vehemence of the attacks on Stalin and Stalinism suggests that the present leaders, the successful survivors of his immediate entourage, not only lived in terror of him and of the suspicion and intrigue which surrounded him, but also disagreed strongly with many of his policies without daring to voice their disagreement. They realized the blind alley into which Stalinist isolation and inflexibility had led Soviet policy, and now have had three years which seem to vindicate thoroughly their decision to break with that policy. Three years of increasing contact with the outside world, of flexibility and imagination in foreign policy, of comparative relaxation of methods internally, have done even more than the leaders might have expected. They have regained the initiative abroad, though at the expense of a retreat from Austria, Porkkala and Port Arthur, and they have increased the popularity of the régime at home. Collective leadership is working, and there is probably a tacit understanding among the leaders that no one of them will try to break the winning combination in the immediate future.

There has been no change in the Praesidium of the Party itself, though the number of candidate members has increased from two to six. New appointments are Marshal Zhukov, Minister of Defence; D.T. Shepilov, editor of Pravda and a foreign policy expert; two protegés of Khrushchev connected with the régime's drive to increase agricultural output, L.I. Brezhnev and N.A. Mukhitdinov, of Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan respectively; and one woman, E.A. Furtseva, First Secretary of the Moscow Town Party Committee, the post once held by Khrushchev. Zhukov is the first professional military man to reach as high as candidate member in the Party hierarchy (he is still not a deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers), but it is not surprising that as important a person as the Minister of Defence should form part of the Party inner circle, first among the candidate members. No undue significance should be attached to the increase in army representation on the Central Committee. Khrushchev continues, of course, to head the Secretariat of the Party, to which have been added Furtseva and Brezhnev. The impression gained is that, while Khrushchev has strengthened his position by the addition of some of his protegés to the Central Committee, the Secretariat and the candidate membership of the Praesidium, he has not yet achieved anything like the pre-eminence of Stalin even within the Party. The Party Secretariat and Praesidium rule the USSR but no one man dominates the Party structure completely. We can expect that, for a few years at least, collective leadership by more or less the present group will continue and that the changes which occur will be relatively unostentatious.

At least through the sixth five-year plan the emphasis will continue to be laid on heavy industry to enable the Soviet Union to catch up with the West industrially, though not to the neglect of the defence potential. The strides made in this field are full justification in the eyes of the leaders for the continuance of this policy. Emphasis is also laid on the further development of the resources of the eastern regions, where the principal centres of industries consuming a great deal of fuel and power will be concentrated. Malenkov, who thought the time was ripe for greater emphasis on consumer goods, has again been rebuked. But while his theories have been rejected, the leadership sees the desirability of offering some material incentives to the people, and has announced that there will be increased production of consumer goods, a reduction in working hours, an improvement in the pension system and an amelioration of housing conditions, including a larger scale of private house-building from personal savings. (Price cuts are to be smaller than originally intended so that these measures can be carried out). It is significant that these popular measures should be announced during the Party Congress and not at the time of the announcement of the sixth five-year plan, a fact which is surely designed to enhance the prestige of party leadership. An improvement in living standards "remains the constant objective".

Agriculture remains the weakest sector of the economy and emphasis there will be shifted from more extensive to more intensive cultivation. A sharp increase in grain production, especially maize, and a doubling of cereal products, was demanded. There was also reference to more efficient agricultural production and better conditions for the collective farms. It is an indication of the strength of his position that Khrushchev, the originator of the far-from-successful virgin lands project, was able to assert blandly that the party's decision on virgin lands was correct. The failures there came in for virtually no criticism.

There is a thoroughly pragmatic approach to economic problems. Mr. Khrushchev referred to the necessity for cost-accounting, labour incentives and managerial efficiency, methods which make sense in any economic system. He also said that it was not necessary for each of the European satellites to concentrate on all branches of heavy industry; they could better specialize in the production of lines to which they are best suited, especially in agriculture and light industry, to the benefit of the whole Soviet bloc. This shows a recognition of the economic wisdom of specialization within the bloc although it does not necessarily or even probably mean a reversal of the forced industrialization which has characterized all the economic plans of the satellite countries up to date.

Nevertheless, there is no indication that the basic economic problems of the country are likely to be solved in the near future. These problems are primarily the question of labour productivity, and agriculture. Increased automation may be the answer to the first but it is a slow and costly process. And in the countryside, the Congress showed no real awareness of the necessity of improving the lot of the over one hundred million peasants if the food production is ever to be increased substantially.

Ideology

Although some important modifications of communist doctrine have been put forward at the congress, and although the leaders are propounding a thoroughly realistic and pragmatic approach to both foreign and internal affairs, there is no indication of any abandonment of ideology as such. There is, in fact, considerable emphasis on ideological purity and a refurbishing of Leninist doctrine to lend suitable doctrinal support for the policies of the present leaders.

Khrushchev made a strong point of distinguishing between peaceful co-existence and economic competition on the one hand, and co-existence of ideologies on the other. The former is the touchstone of current foreign policy, but the latter is condemned roundly. Khrushchev's emphasis on this latter point and an article on the same subject which appeared recently in Party Life suggest that all the talk of peaceful co-existence has been having its effect within the Soviet Union and that not all Soviet officials were drawing the clear distinction which Khrushchev has drawn. Such a blurring of distinctions would make more difficult the Party's control of orthodox thinking on the ultimate "universal triumph" of communism, and also, perhaps, weaken the zeal of the cadres. The Congress was the place to set matters straight, and in order to show how the triumph of communism will come about, Khrushchev has gone into some detail as to the nature of the transition in various countries. The inevitability of civil war in all cases and the "one-road-to-socialism" approach are modified to bring them into line with present facts, but a new doctrine is propounded to replace the outmoded one.

Molotov's public recantation of his erroneous statement that only the "foundations of socialism" had been built in the U.S.S.R. was brought up by Khrushchev as a further rebuke to the Foreign Minister. He reiterated that socialist society had been built "in the main" by 1936 and had continued to develop along socialist lines since then.

We are not left without doctrine. It is quite unrealistic to think that ideology, a powerful weapon in the techniques of control, will be dropped just because the Soviet state seems to be moving into a new stage in its development. It is mildly encouraging, however, to find some evidence that, as we hoped would be the case, the emphasis on peaceful co-existence does not play entirely into the hands of the régime, and that it creates some problems for the Soviet leaders as well as for ourselves.

Conclusions

It must be admitted that the Soviet leaders have some cause for the self-assurance which has permeated the atmosphere of the congress. The Soviet Union is no longer the lone socialist state, backward in industrial development and wracked by purges and terror, surrounded by the hostile forces of the capitalist world. The socialist camp extends territorially from the middle of Europe eastward through China to the Pacific Ocean. Around the borders of this huge area are a number of neutral and uncommitted nations many of which, while not aligned with the Soviet Union, are not actively hostile to it and certainly are not actively aligned with the Western democracies. In the under-developed countries of this area, the Soviet Union has made a disturbingly successful beginning at economic penetration, a much subtler and in many ways more dangerous form of potential domination than the ideological or the cruder military. Beyond this area again, the Soviet Union is seeking means of extending its influence by offers of bilateral agreements, by offers of cooperation with democratic socialist forces, and by removing from communist doctrine some of those features which have helped to rally the opposition of the non-communist world to communism. Internally, they are seeking to make the Soviet system efficient and even to a degree popular; externally, they are seeking to make it appear respectable and genuinely peace-loving. There is some doubt as to how successful they can really be on either count, since the Soviet system is hardly likely to be able to change very fundamentally.

To sum up, the following may be construed from the Twentieth Party Congress:

(a) The present leaders in the Soviet Union are exuding self-confidence because they believe in the correctness, and the success, of their policies, though we can over-emphasize this. It would be natural in such a gathering for the leaders to indulge in considerable self-praise. It may be the Soviet version of the United Kingdom Conservative Party's slogan "Invest in Success".

(b) The principle of collective leadership is firmly established, at least for the time being. Khrushchev is the dominant figure, but he gives no indication of trying to set himself up as the successor to Stalin. The cult of the individual is thoroughly discredited.

(c) Stalin has been discredited for his policies and his doctrine. Lenin remains as the interpreter par excellence of Marxism-Leninism but the present leaders are sure enough of themselves to be prepared to modify even some Leninist precepts in the light of current conditions, e.g. the doctrine of inevitable war between socialism and capitalism.

(d) Some slight mellowing of the régime is apparent in both internal and external policy. Internally, the discontent of the intelligentsia with the Stalinist straight-jacket may be one of the causal factors. But the most important reason is that the present leaders feel so sure of themselves and of the system that they find a mild increase in liberalism contains no threat to their position, and indeed strengthens it. Externally, the mellowing springs from a realization that "normal" relations and a more civil approach are likely to contribute to, and succeed in, a period of détente. Yet this mellowing cannot go far without undermining the very foundations of the régime.

(e) Heavy industry will continue to get priority over consumer goods to enable the Soviet Union to catch up with the West industrially, but some concessions will be made to the people to ensure their support of the régime without recourse to terrorist methods.

(f) Peaceful co-existence between states of differing social systems will continue to be the theme of Soviet foreign policy. The Soviet Union will concentrate its attention on the neutral and uncommitted nations, particularly by economic means, but will try to enter into bilateral negotiations with the Western democracies in an attempt to weaken their unity in opposition to Soviet communism.

(g) In spite of the talk of peaceful co-existence there is every indication that the USSR intends to maintain and even increase its military capabilities. These capabilities will not be jeopardized by the demands of heavy industry, of consumer goods or of economic assistance to underdeveloped countries.

(h) The implications of thermonuclear warfare are recognized by the Soviet leaders. The inevitability of war between socialist and capitalist powers is rejected because of the supposed deterrent effect of Soviet thermonuclear warfare capabilities and Soviet economic strength.

(i) Despite co-existence between states, there can be no co-existence between ideologies. The communists will continue to attack capitalism, and are convinced that eventually their version of "socialism" will triumph.

(j) The transition to socialism is expected to come about in various ways and not necessarily by civil war. In some countries, it may come about by parliamentary means, though the communists will always lead the transition, and once in power will see to it that there is no turning back.

(k) Different forms of socialism are recognized. Not all countries will achieve it on the pattern of the Soviet Union. Yugoslavia and Communist China are valid expressions of the socialist state.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 27, 1956

A FEW THOUGHTS ON THE DESTRUCTION OF THE STALIN MYTH

The developments in the U.S.S.R. during and since the end of the Twentieth Party Congress mark the latter as a milestone in Soviet history as important in its way as the death of Stalin. We have very little precise information about the Khrushchev attack on Stalin at the last closed session of the Congress, and the reported riots and demonstrations in Tbilisi and other Soviet cities as a result of the demolition of the "little father". Therefore, the following comments must of necessity be purely speculative. In view of the confusion that always seems to reign over events in Russia they are submitted at the risk of creating "obscurum per obscurius".

2. There can be little doubt that the myth of Stalin is being completely demolished. It started, after all, within a few weeks of his death, and has continued slowly, and often unobtrusively, ever since. Until now the body of Stalin — like that of Oliver Cromwell, is, post-mortem, likely to be hanged, drawn and quartered. Why?

3. It is difficult to do much more than speculate on the reasons why Khrushchev and his colleagues felt it was necessary to put the finishing touches in such a brutal way to the job of rewriting the history of the Russian revolution. It is hopeless to try to arrive at any real estimate of the feeling of the various peoples of the U.S.S.R. towards Stalin, and is therefore very difficult to analyze what may be their reaction to his "exposure". They had all been indoctrinated for nearly thirty years to accept him as a demigod. Many of them in the best Russian tradition no doubt accepted him as the personification of the Czarist myth and excluded him personally from their hatred of the bosses who brought misery on Russia. Others, good patriots, may have associated him in their minds with the great Russian victories. Even among the members of the Party there must have been a good deal of ambivalence in their thinking. But surely the kind of indoctrination given to the Komsomols and Party members during the last two decades would be hard to eradicate.

4. Among the more intelligent members of the Party, and throughout the educated classes as a whole, however, there must have been many who, even while Stalin was at the summit, felt humiliated and terrorised by the kind of oriental despotism, with all its manifold absurdities, which Stalin imposed. Many thinking people doubtless managed to give the impression of complete conformity, who never secretly accepted what their brains told them was impossible. The best example is the case of the botanist Lysenko.[78] When Stalin accepted his patently false theory of heredity, every scientist in the U.S.S.R. agreed with Lysenko. This continued for some eight years. The day after Lysenko's theories were denounced, all the scientists reverted to botanical orthodoxy — and were no doubt relieved to be able to do so.

5. Even in 1953-54 one could feel in Russia a great longing to return to normality. Stalin's death seemed to remove a great incubus from the whole country. Particularly among the "upper" Communist classes we could guess that the time was coming when they would want not only the relative material comforts they had gained, but greater intellectual freedom; above all the hope of security, and the possibility of passing on their advantages to their children. The natural tendency towards a consolidation of the gains made by the new upper classes was postponed for almost two decades by Stalin. I think his death released all the pent-up longing of the Communist bourgeoisie towards conservatism, inevitable in any revolution.

6. Khrushchev may well have had four things in mind in destroying the Stalin myth. First, he wished to give satisfaction to this upper class; the people who hold the future of Russia in their hands. The present rulers know very well what these people want, and Khrushchev may think it is easier to give the impression of clearing the air intellectually than to give them something more concrete.

7. Second, he may have had in mind the top members of the hierarchy, the Presidium of the Party, and the Central Committee, which is undoubtedly more influential now than it ever was in the past. The fear among them of a return to the arbitrary régime of Stalinism may have been so great as to force a complete demolition of Stalin in the hope that it would become completely impossible for any one man again to establish a personal dictatorship, though it must be noted that the machinery by which Stalin established his personal rule still exists intact. There must also have been many secret disagreements by the hierarchy with Stalin's policy, even before his death, so that this decision to do away with the old now can hardly be new. I imagine also that the shooting of Voznesensky in 1949,[79] now announced for the first time, must have played a major role in their thinking since he could by no stretch of the imagination have been a traitor. Head of the State Planning Commission, he simply differed from Stalin in his estimate of Soviet economic capacities. Khrushchev and his friends may have lived in genuine terror during the last months of Stalin. They may have decided to destroy Stalinism so as to prevent the emergence of a new Stalin among them with the same power to terrify and purge. They may want "collective security" in a personal sense.

[78] Trofim D. Lysenko, agronome ukrainien, a rejeté la génétique traditionnelle pour soutenir que l'environnement a provoqué des changements structurels chez les plantes et chez les animaux qui étaient transmis à leur descendance en l'espace d'une ou de deux générations. Entre 1948 et 1953, par exemple, il prétendait que le blé cultivé dans un milieu adéquat produisait des grains de seigle.

Trofim D. Lysenko, a Ukrainian agronomist, rejected orthodox genetics to argue that the environment caused structural changes in plants and animals that were transmitted to their offspring within one or two generations. Between 1948 and 1953, for instance, he claimed that wheat which was grown in an appropriate environment produced seeds of rye.

[79] Nikolaï A. Voznesensky était président de la Commission de planification de l'État et membre à part entière du bureau politique lorsqu'il a été tué par balle, sur l'ordre de Staline, pendant l'épuration du parti communiste de Leningrad de 1950.

Nikolai A. Voznesensky was Chairman of the State Planning Commission and a full member of the Politburo when he was shot on Stalin's orders during the 1950 purge of the Leningrad communist party.

8. Third, the majority of the politically semi-literate people, and particularly the peasantry, had a deep-seated hatred of either communism or the régime. There may have been a tendency to exclude Stalin himself from this hatred and to blame the people around him for the difficulties of their lives. This was certainly the tendency in old Russia. Even up to 1917 the majority of the people did not blame the Czar for their troubles. They blamed the men around him who had misled him into wrong policies. Khrushchev and his friend may now hope to deflect all this criticism from them to Stalin himself, thus making it possible to increase their own popularity.

9. Finally, the Soviet leaders may have had in mind trying to help their foreign policy aims; not only by eradicating the more obnoxious aspects of Stalin's handling of foreign affairs, but more positively in connection with the attempt to woo left-wing parties abroad. The Russians must know that it will not be as easy now as it was in the thirties to organize popular fronts. There is no common enemy ready-made. You cannot at the same time praise the U.K., French and Italian peoples and even governments and be very successful in portraying them as a menace to the existence of international communism. The fifteen or so years since then have pretty thoroughly disillusioned most of the socialists. But if the Stalinist era can now be portrayed as merely a horrible mistake, the Russians may hope that the socialists throughout the world will forget it and return to the period of the popular fronts. To use a rather far-fetched analogy, the present Soviet leaders may be compared to a woman who has been the mistress of a gangster for many years — partly because she was forced to live with him, partly because she liked the material comforts that went with it. When the gangster dies she is a bit bewildered. She wants at the same time to hold on to her gains, and yet to be accepted back into polite society. So she starts painting the gangster in the blackest colours, say she was forced at gunpoint to live with him, and wants to return to normal with other people, if necessary by contributing to the Red Cross, maybe even agreeing to put her gun away!

10. The next thing to consider is how successful Khrushchev is likely to be in these aims. To take the fourth point first. I think it will be some time before the full impact of the rewriting of history and ideology in the U.S.S.R. can be gauged. It can hardly fail in the long run to have some effect on socialists everywhere, and on neutralist countries, particularly Yugoslavia. No one has said very much about China, but the effects of the new line there could be far-reaching. And in the satellites, where the cult of Stalin continued far longer than in the U.S.S.R. itself, there may be serious difficulties in adjusting to the new policies. If Soviet handling of foreign affairs should continue to be relatively polite and in accordance generally with international ground-rules, it could have considerable effect in Western Europe, even in centre and right-wing circles. At the same time it will inevitably influence the nature of western communist parties. In the short run the idealists may be bewildered, and the militants may resent the new instructions. (The tough wing of the Italian Party has already rebelled). In the long run the aura of respectability may not sit well on a movement which surely requires a high degree of militancy and revolutionary ardour. Its "mystique" may be effected, but in the short-run the new line gives it a greater chance to play an open and possibly more effective role in Western political life.

11. As far as Russia itself is concerned it would appear that the leaders are moving cautiously in trying to explain the new line. The riots and protests in Georgia and elsewhere are as yet unconfirmed. Yet they may well have taken place. It is not an easy thing to reverse the thinking of a people, conditioned completely over a long period of time. Total reversal is, however, typical of a race that seldom does things by halves, as is the Russian way of life.

12. I think the present leaders would not have decided on this course without pretty careful calculations as to its effect. Certainly in the army they must have counted on full support, and this may explain the rehabilitation of Tukhachevsky.[80] By laying the blame for weakening the army in the thirties on Stalin, and for failing to prepare for war in 1941, the army can absolve itself from criticism for the disasters of 1941-42.

13. Curiously enough, little, so far as we know, has been said about the Nazi-Soviet pact, up to now defended as essential to prepare the U.S.S.R. to resist the Nazi invasion. I wonder if the Russians will next denounce it. This would leave the foreign communists out on a very long limb.

14. To return to Russia itself, I presume the leaders, with the huge resources of their propaganda machine, will be able to handle the situation, and the new orthodoxy will be accepted in due course without too much trouble. It does seem, however, that Khrushchev and company are exposing themselves to very real dangers in the long run. The first and most obvious is that, by asking everyone to believe that there was hardly one word of truth in everything presented to the Soviet peoples over the last twenty or thirty years, the leaders are surely planting a very big grain of doubt and skepticism in the minds of the people about future propaganda.

15. Second, it seems difficult to believe that the present leaders, who were closely allied in the public mind with Stalin and his policies, can persuade the people that they were in no way responsible for the crimes he is now said to have committed. Khrushchev himself was the special agent of Stalin in the brutal repressions in the Ukraine after the war. At the moment most of the leaders are in the same boat, but if differences arose it would be relatively easy to accuse one of them of having in fact been a willing aide of Stalin.

16. A return to absolute dictatorship now seems difficult. But the man who controls the Party apparatus, Khrushchev, will certainly be able to exercise a preponderant influence in policy. How it would work out if Khrushchev, who has the vigour and personality to dominate, were removed, is difficult to say. It still seems that really collective rule, while possible with the present team, cannot continue indefinitely. It is against the Stalin tradition as well as Communist ideology.

17. The biggest effect is likely to be felt among the intelligentsia and the younger members of the Communist Party; the latter because new ideas are being introduced into their thinking, and because there must be a certain resentment among them at the kind of closed corporation of the hierarchy.

18. The new wind being permitted to blow through the musty corridors of intellectual thought in Russia may for the time being satisfy the intelligentsia, but in due course this could be dangerous to the régime. I do not mean dangerous in the sense that it is likely to spark a revolution, but in that it is more likely to make it impossible to turn back. Once you have advanced down this path it is impossible to predict where it will lead.

19. The important thing is that the atmosphere is changing rapidly in Russia. Even one year after Stalin's death one could feel that this vast country was stirring. I am sure that one could hardly recognize the situation now as resembling that in, say, 1951.

20. But if Russia is becoming more "normal", if you can ever apply that adjective to Russia; more interested in practicalities and less in the strict application of Marxist doctrines, it does not necessarily mean that it is less of a threat — not in a revolutionary way, but simply as a great power — to its neighbours. Indeed utilization of the brains and intelligence that certainly exist in Russia, instead of the rather sterile beating of them on Stalinist stone-walls, may make Russia far more difficult to contain. But the tremendous drive and resolution may gradually be dissipated, or rather diverted from one tremendous public end to the consummation of millions of private aims.

21. What we cannot ignore is that something very important and fundamental is taking place in Russia. What we must do is to try to exploit it in the interests of peace and freedom. If the Soviet leaders are capable of such flexibility in their thinking on internal affairs, and if they become pre-occupied with the problem of adjusting the Russian people to the new line, and of solving their many economic problems, which there is no reason to think are near solution, then we ought to assume that this may well be the best occasion to try to tackle seriously with them some of the problems of foreign policy on which we have not so far made any progress. I mean in particular disarmament; the Middle East, Indochina and possibly even German reunification. But to make any progress in exploiting the new Russian situation to our own advantage, I think we would have to take them more, if not into our confidence, at least into consultation; treat them more as a member of the group of great powers — at the United Nations and elsewhere.

22. In Stalin's day we were faced with the paradox that the Russians wanted to be members of the group while not prepared to abide by the rules or to use membership for any but diversive and subversive purposes. I do not think we should any longer assume that that situation still exists, at least in the simple form to which in the past we have become accustomed. Nor should we assume, of course, that it on the other hand has changed — so far as the ultimate objectives of Moscow are concerned.

23. What we should do, as I see it, is to try to find out, and this requires a most forthcoming attitude to — a greater willingness to talk with and seek solutions to problems with the new rulers of Russia who are operating in a new way.

24. As long as we do not blind ourselves with wishful thinking, slacken our defence efforts or weaken our unity, we would have nothing to lose by such a change of tactics on our part in responding to the change in Moscow. We may have much to gain.

LETTER NO. 5-289 Ottawa, June 18, 1956

KHRUSHCHEV'S DENUNCIATION OF STALIN

The alleged text of Khrushchev's speech, in which he denounced Stalin at the end of the 20th Congress of the CPSU, and which runs to about 85,000 words, has recently become available. It was released to the press by the State Department on June 4 last, and a copy is attached.[81] This would appear to be the text which was released to the communist parties of Eastern Europe, and may be identical with that circulated within the Party in the USSR. It is not known whether it records all of Khrushchev's remarks at the Party Congress.

2. The text reveals that the Central Committee of the CPSU established a Commission to inquire into Stalin's behaviour shortly after his death. The wealth and variety of the materials released point, consistently, to an inquiry which has been under way for some time; but the anecdotal nature of the evidence offered for the later period of Stalin's life suggests that the examination had not progressed far beyond 1937. The composition is possibly even looser than is typical of most of the Soviet leaders' speeches, and this may testify to a last minute decision to assemble the available materials, as well as to the emotional disturbance of the author.

3. There is no attempt to evaluate Stalin's positive achievement, though we have reason to believe that this was done in a first part of the speech not available to us. But the published portion of the document is designed to demonstrate the evils of his behaviour and to indicate some of the consequences. It is as though the energies of the writer are consumed in the indictment. For this constitutes the bulk of the address, and the treatment of the consequences adds little to the generalities already published in the Soviet press.

4. After recalling that Marxist ideology is opposed to the "cult of personality" (an expression coined by Marx himself), Khrushchev read letters by Lenin and the latter's wife which documented Stalin's tendency in this direction shortly after the Revolution. Stalin is attacked for the ruthless suppression of ideological opponents even after the Party had consolidated its position. A number of cases are cited over the whole period of Soviet history, where individuals have been liquidated on fabricated charges. Apparently plausible explanations of old mysteries emerge, e.g., physical torture, officially condoned by Stalin, explains the incredible "confession" of the purges.

5. The speech stresses that it was the collaboration between Beriya and Stalin that resulted in the terror of the recent past, though this we may be justified in treating skeptically. Stalin's incapacity as a war leader is demonstrated at some length, and many of the country's difficulties during the Second World War are attributed to him. There is a crushing indictment of Stalin's megalomania in the description of his own amendments to his official biography. Especially after 1945, the late leader was wholly out of touch with reality, became pathologically suspicious, and almost certainly plotted the removal of the present leaders.

6. Khrushchev took rather more pains to explain the role of the Politburo during the Stalinist misrule than the West has been led to believe. But his explanation of its inaction reduces simply to the fear of liquidation, which was shared by the topmost levels of the hierarchy. He ostensibly assures that this will be adequate for his people. But there surrounds the document as a whole an aura of indirect speech. The reader is left with the suspicion that it is really an apologia by the present leadership for having sped the late dictator on his way. In any case, in this respect, the document is an unique revelation of the real climate of political life in the USSR.

7. The document has thrown little light on the apparent motives of the denunciation. These motives are implicit in the effects of Stalin's methods: a general loss of élan and the sterile bureaucratization of the state. The references to his influence on foreign policy are notably slender: the schism with Yugoslavia is attributed to Stalin, and the régime has "paid dearly" for this; and one-man decisions caused complications and threatened peaceful relations with other powers. There is a compelling inference that more could and may yet be released.

8. It may be that the speech emphasizes the circumstances behind these motives, and suggests the weight of the pressures on the present régime. Ostensibly, the Soviet people in general had no idea of how far the evils of the past were to be attributed to one man, rather than to the government collectively; even the leaders had to mount a commission of inquiry to learn all the facts, nor are all the consequences yet clear.

9. The burden of the speech is the indictment of a monster; yet, at the end, Khrushchev defends Stalin as having acted in the interests of the nation as he saw these! The necessity for this ambivalence is quite inexplicable, unless the document reflects collective drafting.

10. The Russian people have been vouchsafed only one short official editorial in Pravda, though it is clear that the speech has been used extensively by Party propagandists in explaining the new line to Party members, and possibly to factory workers, collective farmers, etc. The press reports that the full text was released to Yugoslavia on March 15, and it may be that the Soviet Government has decided to permit a "leak". But the presence in the text of the statement stressing the need to confine this to the Party, and to deny "ammunition to the enemy" seems inconsistent with this.

11. The foregoing remarks are advanced as tentative observations on this text. Your comments would be appreciated.

COMPETITIVE CO-EXISTENCE AND WESTERN AID TO THE UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

We had hoped to have ready for you, before the visit of Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd,[82] an agreed paper (a) reviewing the methods and degree of Soviet economic penetration in the uncommitted and under-developed countries between Cairo and [82] Pour un rapport sur la visite Eden-Lloyd, voir volume 22, les documents 695 et 696.

Djakarta, and (b) considering in a preliminary way some of the possible Western responses to the new competitive co-existence in this area.

Unfortunately we have not yet reached complete agreement within the Department in our appreciation of the dangers of the new Soviet tactics nor on the more fundamental question of whether, in our own thinking, Western aid policies may be viewed as a response to Soviet activities without detracting from the basic purposes for which we assist the under-developed areas.

I should naturally have preferred to have given you an agreed paper, and less reading, but in order to let you have, before the visit of the United Kingdom Ministers, the Department's reflections on these questions, I am enclosing two papers both of which take into account the comments of the other Divisions.

(a) a paper prepared by Economic Division examining the possible effects of Soviet economic activities in the under-developed areas and suggesting various ways in which Western aid to the under-developed countries might be stepped up and made more effective; and

(b) a paper prepared by European Division analyzing current Soviet objectives and activities in the light of recent intelligence and suggesting that it would be in the interests of the Western powers to internationalize the competition as much as possible, starting with the establishment of SUNFED, although this would be only one of the responses which deserve study.[83]

We are all agreed, I should add, that new Western initiatives in this field should not be taken at the expense of existing programmes such as Colombo and U.N. Technical Assistance.

We are also agreed that any element of "response" in future Western actions should so far as possible be publicly played down lest what we do be tainted, in the eyes of the people we are helping, with political motives. This is one reason why we are all in favour of giving more sympathetic consideration to SUNFED this year.

I assume you will not wish to show either of these papers to the United Kingdom Ministers, since the papers have not been discussed with other Departments.[84]

FUTURE AID TO THE UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES
IN THE LIGHT OF RECENT SOVIET MOVES IN THOSE AREAS

The following notes are intended for possible use by Mr. Pearson in his discussion with Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd concerning specific steps which the Western countries might contemplate taking in the situation described in the various intelligence papers and commented on in the memorandum prepared by other Divisions in the Department.

2. It would seem unwise for us to assume that people in the under-developed countries necessarily regard the recent flurry of Soviet activity as overshadowing the less publicized aid which has been reaching them over the past several years from the West. The ordinary people and official circles in those countries may well recognize that the Soviet offers are a rather belated response to what we have been doing for some time, provided that we ourselves do not appear to be accepting the Soviet thesis that they are the pioneers in this field. Our aid has of course been much more substantial and has reached widely scattered localities. It has probably made a much deeper and more lasting impression than we realize. The fact that we have not indulged in a great deal of fanfare may well be appreciated by the people of these countries and may be contrasted favourably with the behaviour of the Soviets. If our future aid operations were to be too evidently designed to counter these recent Soviet activities we might contribute to the impression which the Soviets are undoubtedly trying to create, that they have started the whole thing and that directly or indirectly they deserve the credit for everything which may follow. Any real or apparent increase in our assistance and any softening in our attitude toward such projects as SUNFED (Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development) might then be represented as something which would not have happened if the Soviets had not provoked us by their example.

3. We might fairly warn our friends that there may be more strings attached to Soviet assistance or trade than may be evident on the surface. While undoubtedly many of the Soviet technicians may be real experts, the recipient countries should be aware that the acceptance of large numbers of Soviet "technicians" might present a real danger from the point of view of internal security. Even in the case of goods received from the Soviet countries there is the risk that the economy of the recipient country may become too dependent on Soviet sources for repair and maintenance parts, especially if the specifications are not similar to those employed in one or another of the Western countries. The very fact that the credit terms offered are apparently generous may incline some recipients to overextend themselves and become hopelessly in debt, with the result that they will be vulnerable to various pressures from the USSR. (Although experience has shown that in relations between international creditors and debtors the advantage is not always on the side of the former, it would appear that where the Soviet Union is involved it would be in a position to exert a good deal of leverage on any country which was heavily in its debt.)

4. While issuing these friendly warnings in a discreet manner, we should probably not deplore, at least publicly, the fact that the Soviets are offering these opportunities for the under-developed countries to receive assistance or to expand their trade. Most of these countries are badly in need of more aid than the West can supply and for more markets for their basic products than are accessible to them in the West. At a time when assistance from the West is considered by them to be insufficient and when it is evident not only that sales opportunities in our markets are limited but some of our surplus commodities, (eg. U.S. cotton and rice), are reducing their chances to sell abroad, these countries could hardly be expected to take in very good part any suggestion from us that they should reject all offers from the Sino-Soviet bloc. Our relations with the under-developed countries would hardly be improved if we were to adopt such an attitude and express it publicly.

5. Moreover, it is not clear that acceptance of such Soviet offers will necessarily work against our long-term interests. To the extent that aid from, or trade with, the Soviet bloc will increase the resources available to the present governments of some of the underdeveloped countries, they may be better able to carry their development programmes forward with less direction of their economies or regimentation of their people than would have been the case if these added resources had not been received. The Indian economy, for example, is probably less likely to develop along Soviet lines if more resources are at the disposal of the Indian Government, whether those resources come from the Soviet side or from the West. The more rapid improvement in living standards which such increased resources would make possible might also be expected to serve our purposes rather than those of the Soviet bloc. The expansion in exports to the Soviet bloc (especially in cases where the West is not able as a practical matter to offer sufficient markets) may also not be unwelcome from our point of view provided that the trade is of such a character that it can be terminated at will if that is desirable for political reasons or if alternative markets develop in the West. There would seem to be no substantial reason why in such cases the under-developed countries concerned should not enjoy the full benefits of this trade with the Sino-Soviet countries in the meantime. These longer term material advantages from our viewpoint in a careful development of trade with the Soviet bloc may turn out to be much more important than the temporary propaganda gains which the Soviets may hope to achieve by these activities. They do not of course provide any excuse for us doing less than the maximum of which we are capable in terms of either aid or trade. It would undoubtedly be best if the bulk of the resources required by the under-developed countries from outside were to come from the West. It is probably better, however, that some of these resources should come from the Soviet bloc than not come at all.

6. In any consideration of what the West should be doing in view of these recent Soviet activities, it would seem most important not to lose sight of the fact that our main interest continues to lie in the provision to the under-developed countries of the largest volume of resources which we are able to make available and which they are capable of absorbing effectively, with a view to strengthening their economies and improving living conditions. This has been repeatedly declared by ourselves and others in the past to be our objective and it would still seem to represent the soundest and most promising approach. It would seem most imprudent for us to depart from this objective in response to these Soviet manoeuvres. Their purposes rather than ours would probably be best served by any tendency on our part to distort our aid programmes in order to counter their twists and turns on political or military grounds. These moves should not determine our judgments of what we should do and whom we should help. Over the long run (and not too long a run at that) the programmes of the West are surely likely to have the greatest and most lasting effects if they are based primarily on economic needs and potentialities and if they are not, and do not appear to be, unduly affected by political and military calculations. Even in the very short run it would seem evident that our aid activities would be less effective if they were regarded mainly as responses to Soviet ventures. There is probably nothing the Soviets would like better than to have us admit by implication that our aid was motivated mainly by political and military considerations. This is what they and the local Communist parties have been alleging. We would be giving credence to these allegations and would thus make it more difficult for the under-developed countries to accept our assistance in preference to Soviet aid.

7. When the Soviets are receiving a large amount of publicity in the under-developed countries for their reputed generosity it might be tempting for us to press for more public notice of the helpful things which we are doing and have been doing for some time. Within limits it would no doubt be desirable for the Western countries to receive rather more credit than they have in the past for the contribution which they have been making both through the provision of aid and through the wide range of commercial and trading relations which they have with the countries of Asia, the Middle East, Africa and Latin America. We should probably not, however, go so far in seeking publicity for our efforts that we appear to detract from the achievements of the governments of those countries themselves.

8. Against the background of these rather general observations the following comments might be made on the detailed points which might be raised:

A. Actions to Offset the Temporary Propaganda Effects of Soviet Gestures

9. As suggested above, it might be agreed that somewhat more publicity than has so far been given might now be encouraged without, however, approaching the point where we were getting so much credit as to reflect on the position and prestige of the local government. It would seem desirable generally to place emphasis on the joint and co-operative character of our economic relations with the under-developed countries. In this connection it may be that increased use could be made of the Information Unit in Colombo for spreading public information on these matters more widely in South and Southeast Asia.

10. As increased effort might be made to field more and better technicians whose presence in the under-developed countries could bring greater attention and credit for the West. The various United Nations and Colombo Plan programmes might be used for this purpose. While the assignment of such experts should obviously be based mainly on technical needs of the countries and on our own ability to supply really competent people, some emphasis might unobtrusively be given to those fields and countries where the Soviet appeared to be particularly active. (We feel that our nomination of Dr. Keyfitz for the Directorship of the Bureau of Technical Co-operation in Colombo gives some evidence of our desire to see Technical Assistance matters in that area approached more imaginatively. We would hope that the United Kingdom would find it possible to support suggestions that Keyfitz might feel able to make for improving the effectiveness of our Technical Assistance programmes under the Colombo Plan.)

11. Visiting teams of distinguished Western technicians and scientists might be organized to impress the people in those professions in the under-developed countries with the quality of the work which we are doing. (In this connection, following and improving on an example set by the United Kingdom earlier, we are making plans for a medical mission to India and possibly Pakistan and Ceylon which might be headed by someone such as Dr. Penfield or Dr. Frappier. Similar teams might be organized in other fields possibly involving joint participation by several Western countries.)

12. Possibly we and the other countries of the West should reconsider our rather passive attitude towards trade fairs in the under-developed countries. The Soviets have not hesitated to provide lavish exhibits even where there was little intention of following up these displays with an expansion of trade. Canada and other Western countries might consider it appropriate in these circumstances to participate much more actively in these fairs and to publicize both what we are able to offer for sale and also (and probably equally important from the point of view of countering the Soviets) what we have been customarily buying from such countries.

B. Longer Term Actions

13. It might be desirable to impress on United Kingdom Ministers the importance which we attach to the Colombo Plan as a vehicle for providing assistance to countries of South and Southeast Asia. The United Kingdom has of course always expressed warm support for the Plan, has played a constructive role in the Consultative Committee meetings and has provided a good deal of technical assistance. It might be doubted, however, whether the United Kingdom's heart is really in the Plan, especially since the United States became an active participant. The very fact that the United States is somewhat inept occasionally in handling its aid programmes and the fact that United States aid tends to be rather suspect, would seem to us to increase the value of the Colombo Plan as an instrument for providing the maximum amount of assistance to this critical area in the most acceptable and effective manner.

14. It might not be too early to give some preliminary consideration now to the possibility of other Western countries joining in some major projects which would greatly assist the economic development of the countries affected,[85] substantially influence political relations in the area where they would be located and at the same time dramatically overshadow the projects in which the Soviet bloc are involved. (In a modest way we might regard our Indian reactor project as in this category.)

15. The High Aswan Dam in Egypt is already under consideration and the importance of early joint action on this project (along with the International Bank) is probably fully appreciated although there is evidence that the requirements of the Western countries concerned may be rather severe. It is still possible that this venture will be taken on by the Soviet bloc instead.

16. An equally or even more constructive joint project to which the Western countries probably should be giving increased attention is the financial, engineering and construction requirements of any settlement of the Canal waters dispute between India and Pakistan. An indication by the Western countries at this stage of a willingness to share in this project might hasten a settlement. The effects on the position of the West in the sub-continent could be very substantial and out of proportion to anything which the Soviets are likely to accomplish. The carrying out of this project, unlike the activities of Messrs. Khrushchev and Bulganin, could at the same time greatly improve relations between India and Pakistan and contribute to the stability of that region.

17. In the same category it might be desirable to ascertain what the United Kingdom attitude is towards the Johnston project for the Jordan Valley and what they understand the intentions of the United States to be towards this project.[86]

18. The possibility of using the United Nations Technical Assistance programmes more extensively for securing experts and training opportunities for United Kingdom dependent territories (particularly those which are on the verge of independence) might be discussed. It might be indicated that we for our part would be anxious to do our best to meet requests which we might receive in respect of such territories through these programmes. If the United Kingdom authorities were troubled by the prospect that Soviet experts might work their way in through the United Nations programmes it might be possible for some understanding to be reached in advance about our intention to meet particular requests which we were in a position to fill.

19. We would also, of course, as suggested above, have in mind the desirability of countering Soviet activities in determining in which cases we would supply experts or training facilities to various under-developed countries or territories under these programmes.

20. Perhaps the major question in this field which might be explored with the United Kingdom Ministers has to do with the attitude of the industrialized Western countries towards an international economic development fund under the United Nations (e.g.

SUNFED). In the past the United States, United Kingdom and ourselves, as well as several other Western countries, have been pretty negative in our views, and expression of views, on such proposals (even though, unlike the Soviets, we were taking a constructive part in such related international arrangements as the International Bank and the International Finance Corporation). It might be questioned whether this is still an appropriate attitude. While it is not possible at this stage to be very definite about the position of the Canadian Government as this subject has not recently been discussed among Ministers and is only now being reviewed by officials, it would seem desirable to suggest that perhaps our traditional views should be re-examined. It would seem fairly evident that SUNFED is either going to come into being very soon or there is going to be a sharp and serious division among the members of the United Nations. The delaying process has probably gone about as far as it can go and the bringing in of the 16 new members has probably increased the likelihood that this issue will come to a head this year.

21. In deciding our attitude towards SUNFED and determining how we should conduct ourselves in any international discussion of this proposal, it would seem desirable for us to have very much in mind such considerations as the following in connection with the activities of the Soviet bloc in this field:

(a) We should be careful to avoid giving any impression that we regard the value of this project to the underdeveloped countries themselves as a less important factor than the opportunities which it may provide for outmanoeuvreing the Soviet bloc.

(b) As the same time we should endeavour to avoid a situation in which the Soviets are able to appear passive or even sympathetic towards this proposal while we seem to be standing out against it when it is clearly supported by the bulk of the members of the United Nations.

(c) If we decide that SUNFED is going to come into being and that we are going to participate, we should join actively in the preparatory discussion in order to exercise our influence and ingenuity to shape the organization in such a way that the resources at its disposal will be used most efficiently and in the places where they will have the most value.

22. In the light of such considerations as these we should regard, and represent, SUNFED as intended mainly to mobilize funds from as many sources as possible for use in as many areas of the world as may seem desirable. Such an organization would have the advantages over other existing grant-aid arrangements (e.g. Belgium, France, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, etc.) in that it would cover more under-developed countries of the world (e.g. Africa, the Middle East and Latin America as well as South and Southeast Asia). Our decision to support it, if that turned out to be the case, should presumably be based on those advantages and on the fact that the creation of such a fund is favoured by a large majority of the membership of the United Nations. In supporting it we would of course also have in mind its usefulness in connection with current Soviet activities in the under-developed countries. If we are able to take a positive attitude towards it, and to declare our intention to do so at a fairly early date, we shall incidentally improve our position in relation to the Soviets in the eyes of the under-developed countries. The Soviets' bluff would then be called. They would either have to declare their inability to participate, in which case their rather hypocritical attitude towards those countries would be exposed. Alternatively, they might decide to come in, in which case at least some part of their activities in the under-developed countries would be brought under a degree of international discipline.

23. It is of course possible that by participating in such a fund the Soviets might get more credit than they deserve, as probably happened in the case of UNRRA. Some countries might tend to regard SUNFED as something which the Soviets were responsible for. The likelihood of such an outcome could be minimized if we (with the co-operation of the under-developed countries themselves) succeeded in getting the contribution required from the Soviets set at a fairly high figure. The Soviets would also be deprived of excessive credit for the creation of SUNFED if we were to adopt a sympathetic attitude very soon and thus avoid the impression that we were going along with the project only reluctantly and only because of the political necessity of matching or countering the Soviets. On the general reasoning set forth earlier in this memorandum it would in any event seem logical to consider SUNFED as more likely to serve our longer range purposes than those of the Soviet bloc since it would have the effect of increasing the resources available to the under-developed countries, thus enabling them to accelerate their economic development and improve their living standards more rapidly. From an immediate propaganda point of view, however, the balance of advantages in SUNFED as between the West and the Soviets will depend very much on how we handle ourselves in the international discussions on this subject over the next few months.

24. There are other actions which might be taken in the present situation but which it probably would not be particularly profitable to discuss with the United Kingdom at this stage.

25. For instance, it may well be that we should contemplate some bilateral semi-commercial loans or credits to certain of the under-developed countries (particularly India) to finance individual projects which are included in the development programmes of those countries and which are attractive from our own point of view (e.g. a fertilizer or cement plant).

26. The possible relevance of commodity agreements and stockpiling arrangements to the marketing problems of some of the under-developed countries which have to rely on sales of a few primary commodities, may also have to be examined in the period ahead. As a matter of record Canada has generally co-operated in such arrangements in the past although we have had our doubt about the efficacy of some of them (and are now wondering whether even the International Wheat Agreement is as satisfactory a device as it appeared to be previously). This is not, however, a subject which it would be worthwhile exploring with the United Kingdom Ministers on this visit.

27. The effects which the general commercial policies of the major trading countries can have on the economies of the under-developed countries and on their dependence on markets in the Sino-Soviet bloc is also a matter of considerable interest. Here again, however, it might be questioned whether there is a basis for any useful talk with the United Kingdom Ministers at this time.

Note de la Direction européenne

Memorandum by European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], January 31, 1956

"COMPETITIVE CO-EXISTENCE"
THE NEW SOVIET CHALLENGE IN THE UNDER-DEVELOPED AREAS

In their year-end messages, the Soviet leaders clearly restated both the theoretical foundations and the practical applications of their current emphasis on competitive co-existence. Messrs. Bulganin and Khrushchev maintained that the success of their Asian tours showed the correctness of the Leninist principle of "peaceful co-existence of nations with different political and social systems." Lenin had predicted that the time would come when the tens of millions of people of Asia would play a part in deciding "the destinies of the whole of humanity." "This time has now come," Bulganin resoundingly declared.

2. Last October the Soviet periodical Communist published an authoritative exposition of current Soviet policy towards the West which was defined as "prolonged co-existence and economic competition between the two systems.... The future development of society is determined in the last analysis not by means of war but through peaceful economic competition. Only in such competition can a historic superiority of one or other social system be proved in practice."

3. Nothing could more clearly reveal the fundamentally political motivations of competitive co-existence, Soviet style. As always, trade and foreign economic policy is to serve political objectives. In the under-developed areas of South-east Asia, the Middle East, and now Latin America, a serious attempt to step up trade with the Soviet bloc is being made in order to achieve the following principal objectives:

(a) the penetration of these countries through trade missions and technicians imported in order to train local people in the setting up and operation of heavy industrial equipment;

(b) the demonstration that by means of the Soviet economic system under-developed countries can achieve the most rapid rate of industrialization without having to depend on the financial and technical resources or methods of the former colonial powers; and

(c) ultimately to detach some of the neutralist or uncommitted countries of South-east Asia, the Middle East and Latin America from their economic and political association with the West and if possible to bring them into the Soviet sphere, though the Soviet Union would no doubt be satisfied if they could counter Western diplomatic action in these areas which have traditionally been beyond the sphere of Russian influence.

4. In the West, there has been a tendency, reflected even in President Eisenhower's State of the Union Message,[87] to interpret the new Soviet initiatives which have been greatly accelerated since the Geneva Conference last summer, as if they were the forerunners of large scale Soviet foreign aid programmes in the under-developed areas. But Soviet leaders have been at pains to make it clear that they do not contemplate a foreign economic aid programme in the Western sense. As Mr. Khrushchev said emphatically in his statement to the Supreme Soviet on December 29:

> "The colonizers give a dollar in the form of 'aid' so as to obtain ten dollars later in return through exploitation.... They then enslave the peoples politically ... not only in the under-developed countries ... but more and more in Europe.... In essence this is not aid but handouts from the master's table made conditional on enslaving obligations.
> The Soviet Union condemns such a policy. It builds its mutual relations with all countries on the basis of equality of rights and mutual advantage and non-interference in internal affairs".

5. Protesting over much, Mr. Khrushchev insists that the U.S.S.R., having no surplus capital because its economy is planned, has no economic interest in exporting capital to foreign countries; nor does it have to export goods, for economic reasons. Indeed, unlike the capitalist countries, the Soviet Union (their leaders repeat) is not embarking on a capital development programme.

[87] Voir/See United States, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1956, Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1958, pp. 1-28.

6. At the same time Messrs. Khrushchev and Bulganin are paradoxically maintaining that the Western countries are guilty of withholding from the under-developed areas the means to industrialize themselves, since it is in the interests of "the colonizers" to draw upon the primary products of the under-developed areas, whereas the U.S.S.R. seeks to assist their industrialization. The Soviet alternative to capital assistance is to offer capital goods, either as gifts or on highly competitive terms. Apart from wishing to avoid being labelled as "capitalists" themselves, the Soviet Government no doubt prefer to offer a factory or a steel mill (with all its accompanying technicians) rather than playing the role of financier. It has a double advantage: repayment in goods and in political gains.

7. Our information on the Soviet bloc's economic penetration of the under-developed countries is as yet incomplete and only partially digested. But apart from a few relatively small gifts and vague offers of aid, the pattern emerging from specific agreements so far concluded by countries of the Soviet bloc cannot in any sense be described as a "give away" programme. It is Soviet-style trade, not Western aid. Whether it was arms for Egypt or a steel mill for India, something of economic value to the Soviet bloc was generally asked in return. Although the terms for such exchanges have not always been economically advantageous to Soviet bloc countries, the commercial losses were more than counterbalanced by the political gains. Even so, there has been no evidence of what might be called Soviet dumping, although Hungarian locomotives, for example, are probably being sold to Egypt at below cost (certainly below competitive West German costs). Even in purely economic terms the Czechs may have been justified in selling at cut-rate prices arms which for them were becoming obsolete in exchange for Egyptian cotton which they are going to need over a long period.

8. Similar considerations may apply to the sale of capital equipment for heavy industry. With the growth of automation in the U.S.S.R., they will be able to unload in underdeveloped countries a good deal of plant machinery they no longer regard as economic.

9. As compared with the West and particularly with the United States, the Soviet Union is, of course, in the happy position that they can make use of many of the raw materials which the under-developed countries are anxious to sell — rice, cotton, sugar, beef. The United States, on the other hand, has its own surpluses; and Western countries generally shy away from the bulk purchases and State trading agreements characteristic of the Soviet bloc deals. In these circumstances, the Soviet bloc is entering into the arena of competitive co-existence at a favourable time. Its purchases of Burmese rice, Cuban sugar, Argentine livestock, and Egyptian cotton make sense in economic terms alone, although the motivation is undoubtedly political. Moreover, it offers credits at much lower interest (usually 2 1/2%) and on longer repayment terms than Western governments or international agencies.

10. From the point of view of the under-developed countries, expanded trade with the Soviet bloc is in many ways preferable to continuing or increased dependence upon Western capital or United States foreign aid programmes. Any self-respecting country would prefer to trade, even when it suspects that the terms of trade may have been somewhat rigged. It may realize only later that the objects of Soviet trade — as in the case of military aircraft or industrial plant equipment — are as full of agents as the Trojan horse. Knowingly or unknowingly risking some political and economic penetration through such trade, the under-developed areas nevertheless avoid the innumerable administrative and political headaches involved in meeting the requirements of United States aid. There is no accounting to inquisitive visiting missions nor is it necessary to be humbly grateful to touring Congressmen. Though a deal with the Soviet bloc would in fact be much more dangerous for the political independence of the country concerned, as compared with a foreign aid agreement with the United States, it is superficially an agreement between trading equals rather than a charity hand-out.

11. United States foreign aid programmes are at present operating under a further serious disadvantage in that they are liable to contain — certainly if Senator Knowland has his way — unacceptable strings attaching aid to military commitments. The timing of the new Soviet initiative may have been dictated first of all by the necessity to postpone such a programme until the internal economic and military needs of the bloc had been more or less met. But it was obvious from the tour of the Soviet leaders in India, for example, that they were able to capitalize in 1955 on the political opposition to the system of regional military alliances built up by the United States and the United Kingdom in South-east Asia and the Middle East during the two previous years. This combination of circumstances makes military strings attached to foreign aid programmes doubly unattractive. Interest in the new Soviet alternative is correspondingly increased.

12. The most important advantage enjoyed by the U.S.S.R. in their new form of competition with the West among the under-developed countries is that the Soviet government can control and direct their economic efforts to a degree quite impossible for Western governments. They can afford to ignore domestic consumer demands to a degree that we cannot; and they can solve what is fast becoming a major problem in the technical assistance programmes of the Western countries — the shortage of technicians willing to go to unhealthy parts of the world at lower salaries than they can command in the domestic market — by simply directing their experts to go where they wish them to go. Indeed, technical assistance — including offers to train large numbers of engineers and technicians in the U.S.S.R. — may be one of their strongest suits, as well as one of the least costly. For trade will surely follow in the wake of their trainees.

13. Partly because of the Soviet capacity to direct goods and personnel, and partly because of the very rapid progress bloc countries have made in industrialization, United States and United Kingdom intelligence appreciations consider that it would be a mistake to underestimate the capacity of the Soviet bloc to make good their present contracts and offers of trade and economic aid to the under-developed countries. Soviet bloc assistance could be doubled and perhaps trebled during the current five year plan period. India can be provided with a modern million-ton capacity steel mill, and the Aswan High Dam can be built, without significantly affecting the planned defence effort, internal economic expansion and external trade of the Soviet bloc. They have the capability; and it will increase substantially by 1960, though in absolute terms it will still be well below that of the United States.

14. Soviet capabilities are, of course, greatest in the under-developed and politically uncommitted countries adjoining the Sino-Soviet land mass. Discounting for the next few years the possibility of any economically significant volume of economic aid from Communist China to these countries, we may expect that Soviet bloc efforts will be directed chiefly to the Middle East and to South and South-east Asia. (Penetration in Latin America and Africa has not been analyzed in detail in this paper for lack of information, but it is at a much earlier stage.) At present, in terms of the dollar value of Soviet bloc deals, economic penetration has gone furthest in Egypt, India, Syria, Indonesia, Afghanistan, Burma and the Sudan — in that order. But in political terms, there has been much more serious penetration in Afghanistan, and, to a lesser extent, in Egypt, than in the other countries.

15. Soviet offers and deals have been handled with such astuteness that they have received publicity in the under-developed countries out of all proportion to their importance in economic terms. By good timing and careful selection of politically important projects, Soviet propaganda has tried to derive as much political advantage as has accrued to the West from far more massive undertakings.

16. By adapting Western foreign aid and technical assistance methods to their own purposes, the Soviet bloc is in a position to give the West stiff economic political competition in the under-developed areas. Yet we — and we hope the under-developed countries — must retain a sense of scale. We must remember that a much higher proportion of Western aid is given free. It is much larger and economically more significant. In spite of strings and conditions attached to much of the bilateral aid from Western countries, the scale, quality and reliability of Western help to the under-developed countries very greatly exceeds that offered by the Soviet bloc. And though we now give them the capability, the Soviet Union has in the past not always been able to fulfil satisfactorily even the limited agreements it has undertaken — to wit the Soviet-Argentine agreement of 1952, and its agreements with Yugoslavia before the break in 1948. Even without such doubts as to Soviet performance, most of the uncommitted and under-developed countries would much prefer other things being equal, to deal with the West; for their leaders are not unmindful of the necessity for those who sup with the Soviets to use a long spoon.

17. During the present calendar year, the United Kingdom Joint Intelligence Committee recently estimated, Soviet bloc countries may provide about $140 million worth of capital equipment (non-military) to South-east Asia and the Middle East. Their major deal last year was the Czech-Egyptian arms agreement valued at another $140 million. A $10 million arms deal with Syria is in the offing.

18. We do not have precise comparative figures, but United Kingdom effort in the same area is at present running at about the same level (about $212 million annual outlay). United States aid, however, is measured in many hundreds of millions of dollars and in most cases requires no economic return. Some Western technicians may have been irritating and officious in their attempts to introduce Western methods too quickly in some of the under-developed countries; but there can be little doubt in the minds of those governments which have had practical experience of Western assistance that their experts are genuinely trying to improve the basic economic position of the assisted country. Parallel Soviet activities have often been clumsy, and blatantly political — for example the paving of the streets of Kabul — with little regard for purely national economic priorities.

19. From the information at present available to us, it seems fair to assume that over the next five years the USSR will be able to increase its capabilities in the foreign aid field to the point at which (if Soviet aid to China is included) they may be able to approach the Western effort even in terms of scale, though probably not in terms of quality and reliability as well. The chief reason for this expectation is, as noted above, their capacity to direct their economic enterprises for state purposes regardless of the individual. The new five year plan gives further proof of their intention to concentrate on the development of their economy largely at the expense of the individual. It would therefore be most imprudent for us to under-estimate, as there has been some tendency to do in the press, Soviet capabilities in "competitive co-existence". Their leaders have chosen the form and timing of their new challenge deliberately and with the facts before them.

20. During the period in which Western programmes had a virtual monopoly in the foreign aid field, their inherent limitations and even their mistakes did not greatly matter. The under-developed countries which were being assisted were grateful to the only group of countries who felt able and inclined to help. But now that the Soviet Union is entering this field — though on its own terms — the situation is bound to change radically. Comparisons will be made both in political and economic terms. The principal Western countries already involved in either national or international foreign aid programmes should, if the foregoing analysis is approximately correct, be considering how they are going to meet the new challenge. For much hangs on the success of the response.

21. It was perhaps no coincidence that before going to the Middle East Secretary-General Hammarskjöld threw out the suggestion at his press conference in New York on January 13, that in place of rival bilateral economic aid programmes, members of the United Nations should agree to channel their efforts through the United Nations.[88] He maintained — and with some reason — that the United Nations was better equipped than any single nation to assist in this field and that a United Nations programme could best avoid competition developing "in an atmosphere of strife." He also implied that economic aid given through the United Nations was more objective and less suspect because there was no national axe to grind — nor, he might have added, any military or political strings attached.[89]

22. It would need very careful consideration and consultation, first between Departments and later between Governments, but there may be a good deal to be said for a United Nations approach as a partial answer to competitive co-existence, especially if the initiative could come from the United States. If competitive co-existence is permitted to develop very largely on a national basis, the Soviet Union may be able to exploit more skilfully the political advantages of direct national programmes, for the reasons which we have already analyzed. Soviet penetration in Afghanistan and in Egypt, where the West has spent and given substantially more than the USSR, gives us no grounds for resting on the good work already accomplished by the West in the under-developed areas. An international programme developed through the United Nations would provide for a more or less effective set of "ground rules" for the new type of competition — and since the Western countries, by and large, respect these ground rules anyway, they would serve principally to curb Soviet penetration by means of their national trade, aid and technical assistance programmes.

23. To secure the optimum result, the West should try to secure Soviet agreement to internationalize a significant part of their efforts outside their own bloc (in which we of course include China), leaving them a correspondingly reduced capability to devote to national programmes outside the United Nations.

24. This approach would seem to require, as a prerequisite, Western agreement on a proposal to be made in the United Nations offering to devote a substantial sum to the capital development as well as the technical assistance of under-developed countries. Such an offer might, or might not, be made on condition that the Western contribution be matched by the contribution of the Soviet bloc members, in proportion to their ability to pay — judged perhaps, on a GNP basis. It would be premature to suggest a more precise formula at this stage.

25. From the point of view of demonstrating the purity of Western motives, an unconditional Western offer to support a United Nations programme would be more effective in the under-developed countries. Objectively, it is something that should be done, even if the Soviet challenge had never arisen. If the West present their action as an overt response to the U.S.S.R., the Soviet leaders are ready to claim the credit — indeed, Mr. Khrushchev has already done so, in anticipation, in his statement to the Supreme Soviet on December 29. The fact remains, however, that without United States support a United Nations approach would be of little value. Congressional approval, even after the elections, is unlikely unless there is an anti-communist element in the presentation. The principle of requiring a Soviet contribution proportional to that of the United States would have a greater appeal in the United States than an unconditional proposal. Moreover, the Americans will be quick to see the risk of making an unconditional offer which, if the U.S.S.R. does not participate, would commit the United States and other Western countries to a sizeable and continuing financial outlay under U.N. administration. By tying a proportion of Western resources to a U.N. programme, without insisting in advance that the Soviet bloc does likewise, some flexibility in programming would be lost. This loss would have to be weighed against the greater impact on the under-developed countries of an unconditional offer by the West to establish SUNFED. Though our estimate of Soviet capabilities is still based on incomplete information, it is clear that the West should not expect an automatic Soviet refusal, whether or not our offer was conditional. The Western countries should be prepared to be taken up on our offer and to follow it through.

26. One possible means for doing so already exists. The under-developed group of countries in the United Nations — the Latin Americans and the Afro-Asians — have already drawn up the blueprints for such a scheme in SUNFED.

27. With the addition of sixteen new members, most of them under-developed countries, it seems unlikely that the more prosperous members of the United Nations will be able to continue to fend off the demands of the under-developed countries indefinitely. At the next session of the General Assembly, SUNFED may either come into being or a sharp and serious division may be created among members of the United Nations. This issue will have to be faced before long by the Canadian delegations to ECOSOC and to the General Assembly. If in our judgment SUNFED is likely to be established with Western (and possibly with Soviet) participation, Canada should join actively in the preparatory discussions in order to influence and shape the organization in such a way that the resources at its disposal will be used most effectively and in the places where they will have the most value. This objective approach, rather than any attempt to out-manoeuvre the USSR, will have the greatest impact on the under-developed countries themselves.

28. Moreover, the establishment of SUNFED would bring in Western contributors who are not at present participating in foreign aid operations (e.g. Belgium, France, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, etc.) and it would cover not only South and South-east Asia but the Middle East, Latin America and Africa.

29. A further reason for considering this suggestion of the Secretary-General's carefully is that if the West does not decide to take the initiative soon, it would be quite in line with current Soviet policy for the Soviet Union to announce, say, at the next General Assembly that they had effected a further reduction in their armed forces and were prepared to devote the savings to an initial SUNFED programme. Such a Soviet initiative will become increasingly likely as the sixth Five Year plan's objectives are realized and the Soviet economy develops more "fat" which could be devoted to fairly large scale foreign aid programmes and not merely to politically managed trade.

30. By choosing our own terms and timing for challenging the Soviet Union to "put up or shut up", the Western Powers would stand to secure for themselves the following principal advantages:

(a) a major diplomatic initiative which would once more leave the Soviet Union on the defensive; if the proposal were rejected by the USSR, their pretensions would have been unmasked with maximum publicity and propaganda effect;

(b) if the Western proposal were accepted, we would have an opportunity of exposing the USSR to the test of serious competitive co-existence in the practical field on terms we could largely control;

(c) we could count on a United Nations programme being politically much more acceptable to uncommitted under-developed countries than national programmes of either stripe;

(d) a United Nations attack, on a sufficient scale, on the massive problems of poverty in the under-developed areas would be of more help in effectively raising living standards than all the present Western programmes put together; by the same token such a programme would help to reduce the inroads of Communism among the under-developed peoples;

(e) political and economic penetration of the under-developed areas would be more difficult for the USSR to achieve by means of their contributions to a United Nations programme than it would if they were to devote the same effort to a bilateral programme; and

(f) the capacity of the under-developed countries to "shop around" and bargain between East and West (as Egypt has been doing rather successfully over the Aswan High Dam) would be reduced.

31. Whether the Russians refused or accepted, the West would stand to gain. If the Russians are prepared on a bilateral basis to assist the under-developed countries on a large scale with technicians and capital equipment (but not capital), it is in the interest of the West to try to draw them away from competitive give-aways or credits which open the door to subversion and political blackmail. If the Russians nevertheless prefer to go ahead on their own, it might still be preferable to handle an important proportion of Western aid through the United Nations and other international channels such as the Colombo Plan, rather than through purely national agreements. But if the Russians "go it alone", the balance of advantage might shift from SUNFED to an expanded Colombo programme. (In any case, Colombo and UN Technical Assistance programmes should not be reduced).

32. It may be argued that the Western propaganda to be derived from a large-scale bilateral programme might be dissipated if it were partly diverted to a Fund administered by the United Nations in which the under-developed countries now have increased representation. This would certainly be a difficulty for the colonial powers, including the United Kingdom and France. In any event, it would be strongly resisted in the United States by many members of the present Administration. There are, however, indications that Mr. Stevenson may be well-disposed towards a SUNFED programme. If he made it an election issue, there appears to be some chance that President Eisenhower might counter with a more sympathetic response to SUNFED than his Government has previously given. (The United States' contribution would be of the order of $100 million on the basis of a programme of $250 million a year requested by the under-developed countries.)

33. A further complication — although by no means an insuperable one — is that for obvious reasons China, in present circumstances, could not be included in a United Nations programme. It would in any case be contrary to the aim of Soviet propaganda to put China in the same category as South-east Asia. Whatever happened, China would remain a recipient of Soviet aid and its demands for technical assistance and capital requirements would presumably continue to be one of the principal foreign calls on the Soviet economy, and the USSR would be under pressure to increase its assistance to China as it expanded its aid to non-Communist countries.

34. The development of a United Nations approach in which the Western countries would be challenging the Russians to join them in an international attack on the economic problems of the under-developed areas is one way in which the Western countries might respond to "competitive co-existence". As already mentioned, a good case could be made, even without the spur of Soviet competition, for international co-operative activity on a greater scale than anything so far realized through the United Nations, the Colombo Plan, or other arrangements. Indeed, as Mr. Denis Healey has pointed out in an article in the January issue of International Affairs:

> "Such 'peaceful competition' may be an invaluable asset to those in the West who believe that large scale economic aid to non-Communist Asia is desirable for moral, political, and economic reasons. Just as postwar Soviet military pressure provided the West with an indispensable incentive for building NATO, so nothing but active Communist intervention in Asia will force the rich Western states to do their duty by the under-developed areas."

35. Interest has also been expressed in a NATO approach. At the last Ministerial meeting of the NATO Council in December several Ministers felt that NATO should take fresh initiatives in the non-military field in response to the new Soviet tactics.[90] The Italian Foreign Minister thought that NATO members should co-ordinate their technical, financial and manpower resources for intensifying their assistance to under-developed countries in the vulnerable areas of the world, while the Greek Foreign Minister proposed that NATO countries should embark on bulk purchasing of surplus raw materials to forestall Soviet deals in the under-developed countries. Although the Netherlands Foreign Minister thought that the Western response should be to support SUNFED, the French Foreign Minister felt that NATO should first study the possibility of proposing to the United Nations a world plan for under-developed countries. In accordance with the Council's Resolution on Article 2, the NATO Secretariat may shortly be preparing an analysis of Soviet economic penetration efforts, as a background paper for the further study of this question in the NATO Council.

36. SUNFED, Colombo, and even NATO, do not, of course, exhaust Western possibilities. More effective and imaginative use could be made of national programmes — Canada's NRX reactor for India is an example — and greater efforts could be made through existing international programmes — to start the Aswan High Dam, to undertake the Canal Waters project affecting Kashmir, India and Pakistan, or to press the Jordan River development plan. These and other suggestions are considered in greater detail in a supplementary paper,† attached.

37. Without alarm or undue haste, all these possible responses to the needs of the under-developed areas and to Soviet "competitive co-existence" will require further study; but the Western countries should not defer action too long. Soviet competition is at present being manipulated artificially so as to have a greater impact than its quality or quantity justifies. But their capacity is increasing and it may not be long before the Western countries find that they cannot easily call what is still partly Soviet bluff.

For a report on this meeting, see Volume 21, Documents 235-240.

38. Finally a word might be said about what the Western countries should not do:

(a) We should not depart from our general objective of securing for the under-developed areas all the economic aid which they can absorb and which the Western countries can afford to supply; this aid should continue to be administered with regard primarily to the economic needs of the area.

(b) Although it may be appropriate in certain cases to convey discreet warnings to some of the under-developed countries of the dangers we see in certain types of Soviet economic penetration, we should not advise them to reject all Soviet trade and aid offers; not only would such advice backfire, but, provided it is carefully handled, there are categories of Soviet trade (e.g. short-term exchanges of raw material surpluses for Soviet finished products) which may strengthen the economies of the under-developed countries without running undue risks.

(c) Above all, we should make no attempt to intimidate the under-developed countries, threatening to cut off Western aid or trade if they deal with the Soviet Bloc — as the Egyptian Ambassador in Bonn has recently charged the Federal Republic of Germany with doing, whether rightly or wrongly.

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 22, 1956

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SOVIET UNION AND YUGOSLAVIA

I enclose a memorandum on this subject prepared in the Department. It attempts to survey the changing nature of the relations between these two countries since the Soviet leaders made their pilgrimage to Belgrade a year ago and set in train a series of events calculated to detach Yugoslavia from its position of neutrality and bring it back once more into the Soviet bloc.

2. Our conclusions are briefly that the Yugoslavs have proceeded with considerable skill and circumspection but that there are obvious dangers ahead. The situation in Eastern Europe is, however, beginning to become less static, and the role of Yugoslavia in attempting to encourage more independence of the U.S.S.R. by the satellites is clearly of paramount importance. It is therefore in the interest of the West to follow developments in Yugoslavia very closely, and to give all aid and encouragement possible to the Yugoslavs, first to prevent them from slipping more towards the U.S.S.R., and second in order eventually to adopt a more forward policy vis-à-vis the satellites by pressing home the advantages of Yugoslav-type socialism. On this latter question I hope later to be able to submit an analysis of the latest developments in Eastern Europe and a few suggestions of possible ways of exploiting the situation.[91]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 22, 1956

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SOVIET UNION AND YUGOSLAVIA

With the public admission in Belgrade by the Soviet leaders that the U.S.S.R. had been in the wrong in its policy towards Yugoslavia since 1948, the chief obstacle in the way of repairing the breach between the two countries disappeared. The process of restoring normal relations with Yugoslavia had been undertaken by the Soviet Union soon after Stalin's death in 1953 and the groundwork for the Belgrade meeting was laid by a series of conciliatory moves on the Soviets' part which demonstrated a reversal of their previous policy. These moves included the stopping of propaganda hostile to Tito's régime, the acknowledgment of the partisans' contribution to the liberation of Yugoslavia, the reopening of communications from Eastern Europe across the Yugoslav borders and the lifting of the blockade on Yugoslav-Soviet Bloc trade. The joint declaration made at the end of the Belgrade meeting laid down the lines which the further development of relations between the two countries should take. It envisaged the expansion of economic co-operation, the promotion of cultural exchanges, the establishment of mutual co-operation in the employment of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and, finally, the fostering of "co-operation among the social organizations of the two countries — through the exchange of Socialist experiences and the free exchange of opinions".

2. The purpose of this paper is to examine the extent to which these specific intentions expressed in the Belgrade Declaration have been realized in practice to date, and to assess the present condition of Yugoslav-Soviet relations.

Economic Co-operation

(a) Trade

3. An economic agreement was concluded between the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia on September 1, 1955. This was followed by a protocol on trade, signed at Belgrade at the beginning of January, which provided for an annual level of trade between the two countries over the next three years of $70 million ($35 million each way). Both parties will take steps to increase this level in subsequent years. The principal goods to be exchanged are coke, coal, crude oil, cotton, ferrous metals and capital machinery from the U.S.S.R., and bauxite, hemp, lead, tobacco and agricultural products from Yugoslavia.

4. The implementation of this agreement will represent a doubling of the 1955 volume of trade between Yugoslavia and the U.S.S.R.; the dollar-value to be established will approximate that of 1948, the last year before the breakdown of economic relations. Similar trade agreements have been concluded, involving less substantial amounts, between Yugoslavia and most of the satellite countries. While the agreements negotiated thus far will mean some reduction in Yugoslavia's trade with the West, they will not restore the commanding position which the Soviet Union and the satellites enjoyed in the immediate pre-1948 period, for Yugoslavia's foreign trade with the rest of the world has of necessity developed quite substantially in the last seven years. The following table illustrates the changes in the pattern of Yugoslavia's exports between 1948 and 1954 and shows that a very substantial further increase in its trade with the Soviet Bloc, particularly with the satellites, would have to take place before its Bloc trade would assume its former dominant position.

Yugoslav Exports — in millions of U.S. Dollars

Year	Total World Exports	To U.S.A.	% of Total	To Western Europe	% of Total	To USSR	To other East Eur. countries	Exports to Bloc as % of Total
1948	303.4	7.8	2.6%	102.1	34.0%	45.4	104.3	50.0%
1950	158.6	21.4	13.5	83.6	52.8	–	–	–
1951	183.6	26.8	14.6	102.4	55.9	–	–	–
1952	246.5	36.1	14.7	153.6	62.3	–	–	–
1953	185.9	26.0	14.0	118.8	64.0	–	–	–
1954	235.6	22.5	9.6	154.7	65.7	1.5	5.3	2.9

5. On the basis of the figures available Yugoslavia's trade with the Soviet bloc should not, as a result of agreements concluded thus far, exceed 25% of Yugoslavia's total foreign trade over the next three years. It is on Yugoslavia's trade with West Germany that its expanding trade with the Soviet bloc is likely to have the most pronounced effect; in 1954 the total volume of Yugoslav-West German trade amounted to $105 million. In this context the Yugoslavs' expressed desire to increase their multilateral trade and develop economic co-operation with OEEC and EPU should be borne in mind.

(b) Investment Credits

6. Early in January another agreement was signed between the two countries under which the Soviet Union will extend the following credits to Yugoslavia, to be spent in the next three years and repayable in ten:

(i) $54 million for the purchase of raw materials in the Soviet Union;

(ii) $30 million in gold or Western currency to meet balance of payments difficulties;

(iii) Additional credits amounting to $120 million for the construction of two fertiliser plants, a thermo-electric power station and the renovation and expansion of three mines.

7. Besides the above credits, the U.S.S.R. announced in July the cancellation of Yugoslavia's $90 million debt in respect of raw materials and arms delivered by the U.S.S.R. between the end of the war and 1948. When to these credits are added those which the satellites have extended ($20 million from Poland and $75 million from Czechoslovakia) the total line of credit made available to Yugoslavia by the Soviet Bloc thus far amounts to very nearly $300 million. The credits described above carry an interest rate of 2%, and the Yugoslavs have not been slow to emphasize the favourable nature of these terms in comparison to the higher rate applicable to Western credits (which run, however, for a longer period); Western credits and loans had reached a total of $400 million dollars in 1955. While there is nothing to indicate whether Yugoslavia has also received or will receive military and economic aid from the Soviet bloc (e.g. by virtue of secret agreements), the western figures up to 1955 alone are 600 million dollars (85% U.S., the balance, French and U.K.) in economic and grant aid and one billion dollars in U.S. military aid.

(c) Technical Co-operation

8. An agreement on technical co-operation was signed in December between the two countries. Technical documents and licences are to be exchanged. To finance the exchange of experts, technicians and students, a joint fund, to which Yugoslavia and the U.S.S.R. will contribute on an equal basis, is to be set up.

(d) Co-operation in the Field of Nuclear Energy

9. At the end of January of this year a general agreement on co-operation in this field was signed. The Soviet Union will extend the necessary technical, scientific and financial assistance to permit the Yugoslavs to construct a nuclear reactor which should come into operation towards the end of 1957. The Soviet Union will also provide Yugoslavia with a supply of nuclear fuel at world prices to assure the continuous operation of the reactor.

10. In announcing this agreement, Vice-President Rankovic, the head of the Yugoslav Federal Commission for Nuclear Energy, emphasized that Yugoslav experts would participate in the reactor project right from the beginning and that part of the necessary equipment would be manufactured in Yugoslav plants. At the same time he stressed his government's desire to see the development of co-operation on nuclear matters between Yugoslavia and as many countries as possible. It seems probable that Yugoslavia is aware of the danger of becoming dependent solely on the U.S.S.R. in this field.

Cultural Relations

11. In the months preceding the Belgrade meeting there had been a good deal of activity in this field, but since last spring the number of delegations, visiting artists and so on, exchanged between the two countries has increased substantially. Delegations of parliamentarians and journalists, folk-dancers and ballet groups have been exchanged, and this type of co-operation appears to be receiving active encouragement on both sides.

Communist Party Contacts and "Ideological" Co-operation

12. This very important aspect of the development of Soviet-Yugoslav relations is also the most difficult area to discuss with any degree of certainty at the present time. Before the Belgrade meeting the Yugoslavs had made clear their unwillingness to discuss ideological matters with the Soviet leaders. Despite this, Khrushchev concluded his address on his arrival at Belgrade by saying that it would be his delegation's duty to foster mutual understanding between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Yugoslav Union of Communists. It is generally agreed by observers that Tito did not take kindly to this initiative on Khrushchev's part, and that the Russians were rebuffed in their attempts to pursue further the question of ideological contacts at the Belgrade meeting. Only an oblique reference was made to the matter in the communiqué issued at the end of the conference, which contained a brief mention of the desirability of the "social organizations" in the two countries establishing contacts and exchanging "socialist experiences". In the subsequent talks between the Yugoslav Government and the United Kingdom, French and United States Ambassadors, the Yugoslav Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs admitted that the discussions on inter-party relationships had gone farther than the Yugoslavs had desired due to the persistence of the Soviet leaders, but M. Prica emphasized that any contacts which might be established between the respective party groups would in no way compromise the independence of the Yugoslav Union of Communists. It remains to be seen, however, whether the Yugoslav communist party will be as successful as one would wish in resisting the influence of the Soviet party; certainly the ideological "gap" between Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union has been narrowed, if not almost completely bridged, as a result of the new line adopted by the Soviet leaders at the 20th Congress of the Communist Party in February of this year.

Implications of the 20th Party Congress for Yugoslavia

13. The Moscow Party Congress was an event of the first importance in the development of Soviet-Yugoslav relations, incorporating as it did into the formal body of current Soviet policy many of the elements implicit in the Soviet approach to effect a reconciliation with Tito. An early recognition by the Yugoslavs of the themes developed at the Congress was extended in the form of a letter of "comradely greetings" from Tito to the Congress. The letter played up the identity of the aims of Yugoslavia and the U.S.S.R., and acknowledged the latter as "a great socialist country" which had made enormous advances by adhering to

"Leninist consistency". This marked a significant departure from earlier Yugoslav accusations that the Soviet Union had deviated from the true spirit of Marxist-Leninist teaching by establishing a monolithic state claiming authority over the growth of socialist movements in other countries.

14. The results of the Congress were enthusiastically welcomed in Belgrade as convincing proof of a definitive break by the U.S.S.R. with Stalinist policies and practices. The Yugoslavs feel that there are signs of internal changes in the Soviet Union which will permit some degree of decentralisation and will impose a curb on the arbitrary and independent authority of the Secret Police. The Yugoslavs see at least the possibility of an internal system emerging in the U.S.S.R. which would be closer to their own. Particularly important, of course, for Yugoslavia was the acceptance at the Congress of the doctrine that there are many roads to Socialism. They realize probably that their own interpretation of this doctrine is broader than that given it by the Russians, but have nevertheless greeted the abolition of the Cominform as a sincere move on the part of the Soviet leaders to give substance to their professions on this score.

15. The new Soviet line developed at the Congress, and particularly the denunciation of the Stalin legend, has already had important repercussions on Yugoslavia's relations with its satellite neighbours. From the time of the Belgrade Declaration until the Moscow Congress the satellites in general lagged behind the Soviet Union in the process of "normalizing" their relations with Yugoslavia and it was left chiefly to the latter to take the initiative in settling points of difference and fostering concrete co-operation with its bloc neighbours. Now that the anti-Stalinist line has been unambiguously laid down as official doctrine by the Congress, the process of re-establishing normal relations between Yugoslavia and the satellites has been accelerated. A striking case in point has been the deposition of Chervenkov in Bulgaria, who had been a particular bête noire for the Yugoslavs. An analogous pattern is being followed in the other satellites where former leaders (like Rajk in Hungary), who were accused of "conspiracy with Tito" at the time of Yugoslavia's break with the Cominform, are being rehabilitated. While in a satellite such as Hungary a "stalinist" leader has thus far succeeded in retaining his position, Tito now appears to hold an undisputed upper hand in regulating his country's relations with these satellites and is able to effect a reconciliation on his own terms. In Hungary's case, this means that Rakosi will probably see himself obliged to agree to Tito's demands for financial compensation for the damages inflicted on Yugoslavia's economy by the rupture of Yugoslav-Hungarian relations in 1948.

16. It is understandable that the Yugoslavs should view these developments with profound satisfaction. Convinced, as he seems to be, that the recent changes in Soviet policy represent a real reversal of attitude and not merely an alteration in tactics, Tito believes that publicly the line taken at the Moscow Congress should receive the maximum of encouragement. However, the Yugoslavs have indicated to Western representatives that they are aware that the new Soviet approach is not without its dangers and that prudence is necessary in responding to Soviet initiatives. Thus Mr. Spaak, who went to Belgrade recently with doubts concerning the ability of the Yugoslavs to resist the forces which are pulling them towards a closer alignment with the East, returned convinced that Tito has no intention of allowing Yugoslavia to be drawn within the Soviet orbit. While condemning in public the existence of power blocs, the Yugoslavs have intimated in private that they attach great importance to the maintenance of a strong and unified NATO, at least until a general security system involving disarmament has been worked out. This is not say that Yugoslavia is still fearful of Soviet aggression; the significant reduction in their defence budget for 1956 and the utilization of military plant capacity for the production of civilian goods provide good evidence that Tito is confident that the Soviet Union does not currently pose a threat to his country's security. But at the same time he appears to recognize the justice of the Western argument that the repudiation of Stalinism stems from a realization on the part of the U.S.S.R. that it was the aggressive tactics of Stalin which forced the West to unite, and that in continued Western solidarity and strength lies the only valid guarantee at present for continued "good behaviour" by the Soviet leaders.

Conclusion

17. The successful and rapid implementation of the measures for developing relations between Yugoslavia and the U.S.S.R., which the Belgrade Declaration formulated on paper, and to which the Moscow Congress gave added impetus, must be a cause of concern for the West. The conditions which forced Yugoslavia to seek Western support, — its political and economic isolation following the break with the Soviet Bloc in 1948 — have, it must be recognized, been largely removed. On the other hand there is no reason to believe that Tito intends to permit the present trend of Yugoslavia's relations with the U.S.S.R. to lead to the absorption of Yugoslavia within the Soviet Bloc, even should the U.S.S.R. be prepared to offer his country the status of a "most-favoured" satellite. He would also probably steer clear of any attempt to revive the pre-1948 scheme to establish a south Slav Union to include Bulgaria and Yugoslavia with the latter exercising hegemony in the confederacy. He is probably fully aware that the Soviet leaders took the initiative in restoring friendly relations as a result of Yugoslavia's vigorous assertion of independence vis-à-vis both blocs. However much he may believe that the U.S.S.R. has abandoned the policies and practices of Stalin, he probably realizes that in the long run Yugoslavia has more to gain by maintaining its independent position than by entering the Soviet fold, no matter how favourable the conditions which the U.S.S.R. offered to induce him to compromise that independence. Moreover, he probably realizes that his own personal position of leadership would be gravely imperilled should he permit the current rapprochement with the U.S.S.R. to go too far. Other strong bulwarks against Soviet domination will be the Yugoslavs' intense nationalism and their pride in the leading role they feel they have assumed among those nations which have not identified themselves with either of the two blocs. I believe that they would be most unwilling to abdicate this role in which they cast themselves as leaders among the independent nations of the world, a role which has paid off in terms of the very tangible benefit of being courted by East and West alike, in favour of the dubious advantage of becoming a Soviet satellite.

18. That Yugoslavia welcomes the current trend of its relations with the U.S.S.R. and its satellite neighbours is indisputable and we must probably expect to see a considerable further development of these relations. More especially in the field of trade and economic relations, its heavy import requirements, its deteriorating balance of payments, and its financial arrears with Western nations, will induce Yugoslavia to cultivate opportunities for wider co-operation with the Soviet bloc. Since the Yugoslavs are apparently intent on maintaining domestic consumption and industrial investment at a level which their own resources cannot accommodate, and often have difficulties in selling their products competitively in Western markets, a situation exists which the Soviets will know very well how to exploit. Militating against the possibility of Yugoslavia becoming economically dependent on the Soviet bloc, will be (a) their appreciation of the catastrophic economic consequences after 1948 which resulted from their earlier complete reliance on Soviet Bloc trade, (b) their greatly expanded markets in Western Europe, (c) their realization of the political disadvantages involved in economic subservience to the Bloc, and (d) their obvious interest in developing their trade on a multilateral basis.

19. Seen through Yugoslav eyes, the Soviet Union's initiative in restoring normal relations with their country is convincing proof of their contention that the Soviet leaders are sincere in the profession of their peaceful objectives and their repudiation of aggressive methods in extending their influence. Consequently, Tito will now tend to view more critically the reaction of Western powers to future Soviet manoeuvres. The leverage which Western economic and military aid formerly exerted on Yugoslavia's attitude has diminished, and many Yugoslav communists will undoubtedly feel relieved now that they can endorse the social and economic goals of the Soviet Union. The Western powers may, therefore, meet with more outspoken criticism from the Yugoslavs, particularly concerning the "anti-communist bias" of NATO. Tito will not wish to forfeit Western economic and military assistance, but he will probably be even more insistent than formerly that no strings are attached to such aid. As far as military aid from the West is concerned, Tito probably regards it as less vital than before, since the threat of aggression from the Soviet Union, in his view, is now much more remote. He will continue to play down the military aspect of the Balkan Alliance, but will probably not contemplate abandoning this tie with his non-communist neighbours to the south, since it provides a useful counterbalance should Soviet friendliness show signs of changing into Soviet pressure.

20. The Yugoslavs have for some time insisted that the only hope of detaching the Soviet satellites from complete subservience to Moscow was by concentrating on the attraction of Tito-type national communism. The recent developments in the U.S.S.R., and their reaction in most of the satellites gives some hope that there is greater possibility for this than existed before the 20th Party Congress. The key role of Yugoslavia in this approach to Eastern Europe need hardly be exaggerated; we shall develop this theme at greater length in a subsequent paper on developments in the Soviet satellites.

21. Real long-term dangers exist in the present development of Soviet-Yugoslav relations, which might rapidly become present realities should Tito die and an internal conflict develop in Yugoslavia over the leadership of state and party. In such a situation one of the contenders for power might be tempted to assure his own position by calling on Soviet support — for which Yugoslav independence would be the price. Barring some such upheaval we think that Tito is well aware that he must set limits to the extent of Soviet-Yugoslav co-operation if Yugoslavia is to continue to prosper as a national entity on the international scene. It will continue to be in the best interests of the West to do what it can to assist the Yugoslavs in their desire to preserve their independence intact, although it will be more difficult to know what course should be adopted to this end, now that the more obvious props to mutual understanding between Yugoslavia and the West have been removed.

RELATIONS OF NATO WITH THE U.S.S.R.

I attach a paper entitled "New Departures in Soviet Foreign Policy — Some Suggestions for a Positive Response", which is a first attempt to answer the first question you have posed as part of the work of the Committee of Three;[92] i.e. "What should be the aims of NATO in the light of current Soviet policy, and what should be the relationship of NATO to the Soviet bloc?"

2. NATO's first aim is clearly to tighten the alliance and prevent the centrifugal forces from sundering it. Its second aim, in my opinion, should be to try to work out a reasonable basis of living together with the Soviet bloc; and the third aim should be to try to restore as much as possible of the ancient cultural and political unity of Europe.

3. It would be natural to assume that we should not attempt the second and third aims, (which are in fact barely separable), until we have achieved the first. But I think we must proceed simultaneously partly because time is short, and partly because we may not be able to maintain the unity of the NATO alliance unless we show a willingness to move on to the subsequent aim of taking the initiative with the Russians.

4. The attached paper presents the arguments why we must do so, and makes some suggestions as to how it could be done. We hope later to make some proposals on the substance of matters to be discussed with the Russians, which could be throughly thrashed out in the NATO Council before an effort is made to re-open negotiations with the U.S.S.R.

NEW DEPARTURES IN SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY — SOME SUGGESTIONS FOR A POSITIVE RESPONSE

The North Atlantic Council is well advised to re-examine the alliance in the face of changing Soviet tactics and conditions in Europe. But I think it would be a mistake to concentrate exclusively on ways and means of holding the alliance together and meeting the challenge of the U.S.S.R. in new fields. In my opinion it is equally important for the alliance to take the initiative with the Russians and to try to exploit the present situation in the same way the latter are trying to take advantage of the changing atmosphere in the West.

[92] Pour des documents sur les travaux du Comité des Trois, voir volume 22, chapitre III, section 3. For documentation on the work of the Committee of Three, see Volume 22, Chapter III, Section 3.

2. In the first place it does not seem to be sufficiently appreciated that the recession of a direct military threat to the West is a tremendous step forward over the situation in 1949. And if there is one aspect of Soviet policies of which we can reasonably be sure it is their belief that a global war between the two blocs must be avoided.

3. The latest indication of their seriousness on this point, in my opinion, is their attitude towards the Middle East. It seems likely that they came to the conclusion that the United Kingdom was no longer able to control the Arabs and that unqualified Soviet support of the latter could lead to hostilities which it would be difficult to prevent from involving the big powers. And for this they were prepared to pay a big price — their hitherto considerable prestige with the Arabs.

4. We can now be reasonably sure that the Russians wish to avoid war and that they may be prepared to pay a political price to avoid unnecessary risks. (This is also upheld by the remarkable forbearance of the Chinese Communists over Quemoy and Matsu.) It has also been said in the West, however, that it was even more important for the Russians to know, as a result of the Summit Conference last July, that the West equally wished to avoid a global war. But before this conference, our intelligence experts argued that the main dangers of a Soviet attack came from the possibility of a Soviet assessment that the West might attack the U.S.S.R., thus leading to a decision to launch a preventive war, or through local wars involving the big powers inadvertently. If we accept this intelligence judgment, then the mutual understanding is of great importance to the West, since the latter clearly does not intend to attack the U.S.S.R.

5. The Soviet theory of war has always been quite cautious about the circumstances in which the Soviet motherland should aid a foreign revolutionary movement. Even in Stalin's day it was admitted that the safety of the U.S.S.R. came first. Therefore, today I think it highly improbable that the U.S.S.R. has any intention of launching any military adventure even if there should be a Communist revolt in some western or non-committed country.

6. All this surely is a great advance over the situation a few years ago. But the West seems only grudgingly to admit it and is too pre-occupied with the dangers presented by peaceful competitive co-existence to see that there has been an advance which we could, I think, exploit even further to our advantage. The difficulty lies in the difference between our private assessments and our public positions, but there is some evidence recently that Mr. Dulles, for example is beginning to narrow this gap. Furthermore, if we do not recognize the nature and the extent of the changes in Soviet policy we may be in danger of losing what advantages we now have.

7. I have been saying for some months now, and I am more convinced than ever of my view, that the changes inside Russia are of very great and far-reaching importance. They may have started as political tactics but their effect is to change very considerably the atmosphere in Russia, and to start a train of events which, barring the rise of a new Stalin, can have the long-run effect of creating a more decent, and even "bourgeois" type of society in the U.S.S.R., one which will certainly bear little resemblance to western society (it did not even before the Revolution), but one which it might be possible to live with. I believe we are witnessing the beginning of that mellowing process which George Kennan as long ago as 1947 said was the only hope for the West.[93]

[93] "X", [George F. Kennan], "The Sources of Soviet Conduct," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 25, No. 4, pp. 566-582.

8. Mr. Kennan also said that we could make no advance in the containment policy unless it were possible to bring a double pressure to bear on the Soviet Union — a pressure from outside coinciding with pressure from inside, and I do not think he envisaged this as being necessarily military and/or revolutionary pressure.

9. It would be a serious mistake to think that there was a weakening of the régime, but there is a new and more pragmatic feeling among the Soviet leaders, combined with a very great desire on the part of the bulk of the population to return to normality. It is my belief that this greater flexibility and sensibility extends, or could be made to extend, to the conduct of Soviet foreign relations as well. I am preparing a list of the measures taken by the present Soviet government in the past three years to eliminate the more unacceptable aspects of their domestic and foreign policies, and I think we will be surprised at their extent, though, of course, they have not been prepared up to now to abandon any positions they consider essential to the security of the U.S.S.R. At the same time, the Russians are not abandoning their basic aims as Communists, but the practical limitations on Marxist theory are becoming very considerable.

10. There are, of course, very compelling political reasons why the West must not permit its peoples to jump to premature conclusions about Soviet intentions. There are two dangers, however, inherent in the present policy of reasserting that the changes in Soviet policies are purely tactical and that the threat to the West remains as great as ever. The first is that the average person may become skeptical if the Russians continue their present skillful line, and press ahead with the semblance of unilateral disarmament, and so on. The second is that the Soviet leaders, some of whom at any rate seem to be governed to a large extent by emotions, may decide that they have been unable to make any headway with the West through a "peaceful" policy, and counsel a reversion to tough tactics. A Stalinist wing appears to remain in the Soviet hierarchy, and a Western failure to respond to Soviet advances could well play into the hands of this group. I doubt if anyone would wish to argue that a return to Stalinist policies in foreign affairs would be an improvement for the West.

11. There are then, it seems to me, two conflicting aims in the minds of the Soviet leaders. The first is the orthodox Marxist aim of extending the area of Communism by peaceful means. The second is to restore the self-respect of the Russians, to regain the position of Russia as a member of civilised society, at the same time, of course, advancing its policies as a great power. These two aims are in some, but not in all, senses contradictory. I think our aim should be to strengthen the position of those in the U.S.S.R. who would put the second aim as the primary one.

12. To do this I would like to suggest that the West once again take the initiative in suggesting diplomatic conversations with the Russians. I am wondering if the way to do it might not be by an invitation to Moscow to revive the Council of Foreign Ministers, set up at the Potsdam conference and still theoretically in existence. The Russians would be very flattered at the revival of an organ which was originally constituted at the moment of allied co-operation, and in the atmosphere of big power equality they may be better disposed to discuss seriously questions outstanding between East and West.

13. If no attempt is made to re-establish direct diplomatic negotiations with the United States, then the only prospect for the coming year is of sporadic and not very satisfactory talks with the French and British, and later the Scandinavians and others. Indeed the Franco-Soviet talks have pointed in a direction potentially very dangerous for the Western alliance. Khrushchev has already hinted that these contacts are all very well but what they really want are conversations with the Americans. There can be no other interpretation of his speech at Moscow Airport on his return from the United Kingdom. Naturally, what the Russians would like above all is a direct two-power relationship with the United States, but, as a second-best, I think they would be very pleased with a revival of the Council of Foreign Ministers which would certainly be preferable from our point of view, though in the unlikely event that the U.S. seemed disposed to try out direct talks with the Russians then I do not think the West should object.

14. NATO itself is obviously not in a position to institute talks with the Russians, but a decision to authorise the reconstitution of the Council of Foreign Ministers might be taken up in the NATO Council where the matters to be discussed with the Russians could also be reviewed.

15. If the Council of Foreign Ministers were revived, there is a good chance I think that the Russians might agree to the general lines of a settlement in the Middle East, which seems to me the most promising ground to start on. If any progress were made there, the Ministers might then have another go at German re-unification, disarmament and European security. Even if they failed to reach agreement, the purpose would have been served of keeping these subjects constantly in the public mind and of reminding the world of where the blame for stalemate lies.

16. But specifically the most important aspect of this type of move would be related to Germany. Reports from the Federal Republic indicate that there is already considerable misgiving, though not in official statements, about the ability of the Federal Republic to hold the line on re-unification in the light of two Soviet moves — unilateral Soviet disarmament, and the efforts towards making the East German régime "respectable". The feeling is bound to grow in Western Germany that the U.S.S.R. is pushing the West towards a détente in Europe in which the question of re-unification will become lost, and at the same time the pressure in Germany to commence direct negotiations with the East Germans is going to become well nigh impossible to resist, particularly as the coalition of Herr Adenauer becomes weaker. It thus becomes very important for the NATO alliance to regain the initiative with the Russians.

17. We perhaps have not exploited sufficiently the clear Soviet desire to wish to avoid war. This might be stressed again, first in the Middle East, and then in Germany by urging the inconsistency of refusing to settle problems which could in time produce the global war they wish to avoid. The explosion of an H-Bomb from an inter-continental bomber by the Americans makes it even more important to follow up this display of power by a manifestation of peaceful intentions.

18. It would naturally be unwise for the West to propose the revival of the Council of Foreign Ministers before it had clarified what it was prepared to offer on either the Middle East, German reunification, disarmament or European security. On the Middle East there is considerable room for scope. On the other three questions there may be nothing new to be said. NATO could at any rate restudy them (disarmament in relation to the other two) and at least agree on a bargaining position. If progress were made in an area where the lines have not yet been rigidly drawn — the Middle East — it might just be possible to proceed with more hope of success in other areas.

19. I realise it may not be politically feasible to consider reopening negotiations with the Russians on the basis of the Council of Foreign Ministers during an American election year. But an attempt to keep at the Russians on the important outstanding issues would certainly be very acceptable politically to most Europeans.

SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

I attach herewith a paper prepared in the Department which attempts to review the course of Soviet foreign policy since the death of Stalin, to help in our appreciation of whether the West is in a more or less favourable position now than it was at the beginning of 1953. You will see that our conclusions are generally that, in spite of some advantages gained for the USSR as a result of new and more flexible tactics, the Western position, strictly in terms of relations with the Soviet Union, has improved. This does not mean that the West will necessarily be able to maintain its position in a much more fluid situation. What is done about it now is a question for the Western statesmen to decide.[94]

SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY SINCE THE DEATH OF STALIN: A BALANCE SHEET

In my memorandum of May 23 entitled "New Departures in Soviet Foreign Policy — Some Suggestions for a Positive Response", I said that I was preparing a list of the measures taken by the present Soviet government in the past three years to eliminate the more unacceptable aspects of their domestic and foreign policies. The purpose of this memorandum is to examine the changes which have taken place in Soviet foreign policy since 1953 as a means of comparing the situation prior to the death of Stalin and the situation today.

At the time of Stalin's death, there was a virtual deadlock on Soviet-Western relations affecting both major and minor differences. The Soviet take-over of the Eastern European countries in the immediate post-war period, Soviet intransigence over a peace settlement for Germany and Austria, the Berlin blockade, Soviet refusal to negotiate over disarmament, the Chinese Communist successes on the mainland of China, and Communist aggression in Korea and Indo-China — in short, Soviet and Chinese Communist refusal to reach a settlement with the West on any outstanding issue was the dominant characteristic of the "Cold War" period. The "tough" policy of Stalin led to a "tough" policy on the part of the Western world, the concrete manifestations of which were on the military side, the establishment of NATO in Europe and of comparable defensive arrangements in Southeast Asia and the Middle East; and on the economic side, the Marshall Plan for Europe and the

[94] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Colombo Plan and the UN Technical Assistance Programme for the under-developed countries. Soviet isolation from and intransigence toward contact with the Western powers were such that virtually their only means of communicating with the West was by propaganda broadsides in whatever form and through whatever medium offered itself for those purposes. But the main point to be borne in mind is that, both at the time of the Berlin blockade and of the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, it was generally feared that we were perilously close to the outbreak of general war, and that this situation no longer applies. We should therefore examine the events of the past three years to see what has brought about this all-important improvement in the world situation.

With the death of Stalin on March 5, 1953 and his succession by Malenkov, there was an immediate softening in the tone of foreign policy pronouncements. Malenkov said there were "no disputes or unsolved problems which cannot be resolved by peaceful means", including those with the United States. At the time, it was thought that this indicated a desire not to run the risk of further foreign troubles until the matter of succession was settled and the new leaders had picked up the reins of government in the USSR. We can now safely assume from the speed and thoroughness of the new approach that many of the Soviet leaders under Stalin realized even before his death the blind alley into which Stalin's tough policy had led the Soviet Union and the impossibility of extending Soviet influence by the means which had worked well before the West became aware of the nature of the Soviet threat. Inflexibility of opposition and isolation from contact and negotiation left very little room for manoeuvre. They were, no doubt, also disturbed even at that date by the possibility that the tough policy might lead to the outbreak of global — and thermonuclear — warfare, with the attendant threat to the Soviet Union because of the superiority of the West in that field.

Almost immediately following Stalin's death, there were a series of minor concessions designed to reassure the West of the USSR's good intentions. Exit visas, long denied, were granted to the Soviet wives of British and American nationals. Travel restrictions on foreign diplomats in Moscow were relaxed. Attempts were made to restore normal relations by appointing Ambassadors to Yugoslavia and Greece. Diplomatic relations, broken off at the time of the fantastic "Kremlin doctors' plot", were restored with Israel. Normal diplomatic relations, in the form of an exchange of Ambassadors, were restored with Canada. Territorial claims against Turkey, put forward in 1946, were withdrawn.

Efforts were also made in more important fields to repair the damage done by Stalinist foreign policy. The Russians showed a particular interest in international conferences outside the United Nations and reminiscent of the war-time Grand Alliance whereby the major powers effectively ran the world. This seemed a more useful means of pursuing Soviet objectives, and particularly of eliminating the risks of war associated with dangerous trouble spots like Korea and Indo-China. The Soviet Union gave immediate support for (if it did not actually initiate) Chinese Communist and North Korean suggestions for resumption of talks which led to the conclusion of a truce in Korea.

At Molotov's suggestion, the Big Four met in Berlin in January 1954 to discuss the German and Austrian peace treaties. The Soviet initiative was a reaction to the spectre of German re-armament and the Federal Republic's incorporation into the Western defence structure. Molotov made it clear, in proposing a European security organization in place of the proposed European Defence Community, that the Soviet Union would not loosen its grip on Eastern Germany and Austria and that peace treaties were only possible with the guarantee, at minimum, of complete neutralization of Germany and Austria. Nevertheless, in spite of qualifications, it was significant that the conference had even assembled for a discussion of a major outstanding difference.

In April 1954, the Big Four met in Geneva to discuss Far Eastern affairs. Discussions on Korea confirmed the stalemate. The Soviet Union was content to see the continuation of the armistice arrangements and had no intention of weakening Communist control of North Korea. On Indo-China, there was a clear Soviet desire to reach a negotiated settlement even though there was a military situation on the whole favourable to the Vietminh forces. The truce left Communist forces in control of northern Vietnam; but the Soviet retreat from their earlier insistence on the 14th parallel as the dividing line and substantial regroupment areas in Laos and Cambodia indicated that the Russians and the Chinese Communists were clearly anxious to prevent the Indo-China war developing into a more dangerous source of conflict between East and West.

In another Far Eastern trouble spot, the island of Formosa, the Soviet Union has endorsed China's policy, but has been careful not to commit itself to open support of a Chinese attack on Formosa or the off-shore islands. There is some reason to surmise that the Soviet Union has, in fact, acted as a restraining influence on the Chinese Communists.

It now seems clear that Soviet-Chinese relations were not good during the last years of Stalin's régime, partly because Stalin had not been enthusiastic about Mao Tse-tung's plans for the conquest of the whole of mainland China, partly because Stalin probably had a tendency to treat China as little better than a satellite instead of as a partner. In mid-1954, Khrushchev, Bulganin and Mikoyan paid a visit to Peking in an effort to improve relations with China. The result was the Joint Declaration of October 12 which provided for consultation on all matters of mutual interest, the evacuation of Port Arthur by Soviet troops, the construction of new railway lines between the two countries, the transfer to China of Soviet shares in Sino-Soviet mixed companies and Soviet economic and technical aid to China. The new Soviet leaders recognizing the importance of China as a Far Eastern power whose friendship was important to the USSR, made these several concessions, which must have been very satisfactory to the Chinese, and thus sought to ensure that China would remain a close ally.

Early in 1955, the Soviet Union, which did not participate in the San Francisco conference leading to the signing of a Peace Treaty with Japan, offered to negotiate a separate peace treaty. Talks were begun in London in May 1955, and have continued sporadically since that time. While the Soviet Union has pressed for the establishment of diplomatic relations as a first step, leaving the questions of territorial adjustments, the repatriation of Japanese prisoners-of-war and fishing rights for later negotiations, the Japanese have proved tough bargainers and have, at least until now, insisted that outstanding issues must be settled as an integral part of an overall settlement. A temporary understanding has been reached on fishing rights, but failure to find agreement on the other outstanding issues has so far blocked the conclusion of a peace treaty and the establishment of diplomatic relations.

Reverting to the European scene, the defeat of the EDC proposals in France led to the London talks and the signing in October 1954 of the Paris agreements on Western European Union. For the next few months before ratification had been effected, the Soviet Union concentrated all its attention on blocking German re-armament. A note to the Western powers suggested a new four-power meeting on Germany and Austria. A conference on European security, attended only by the USSR and its satellites, met in Moscow to discuss an integrated command structure in the event the Paris Agreements were ratified. Subsequently this developed in the East European Treaty Organization with the signing of the Warsaw Pact in May 1955. The Soviet Union threatened to annul the Franco-Soviet and Anglo-Soviet agreements and asserted that there would be no further opportunity for negotiation on Germany if the Paris Agreements were ratified. The Soviet tactics failed and the agreements were ratified, but the Soviet Union did not maintain the strict intransigence it had threatened in all fields, although the treaties with France and the U.K. were denounced.

In the spring of 1955, a peace treaty was negotiated with Austria more favourable than anything which the Soviet Union had previously been willing to consider. Military neutrality was the price Austria paid, but the Soviet Union gave up its earlier insistence on maintaining occupation forces in Austria until a German Peace Treaty was signed and in fact withdrew its forces well within the stipulated 90 day period. The Austrian state treaty was no doubt intended among other things to demonstrate to the Germans the advantages of direct negotiation with the Russians and to suggest that neutralization might be a solution to the German problem.

Starting with the London talks in the spring of 1954, the Soviet Union has shown a substantial interest in disarmament as more than a propaganda gambit and has, for its own reasons, made significant concessions to the Western point of view, for example that on the levels of forces. Whatever the reasons, the Russians have, within the last year, swung around from the demand that total prohibition of thermonuclear weapons must precede any general disarmament to a phased disarmament programme in which reductions in both the conventional and the thermo-nuclear fields would take place simultaneously. But the Soviet position on the essential question of an effective inspection and control system is still not acceptable to the West as it does not offer the proper safeguards. In the absence of a general disarmament agreement, the Soviet Union has made two unilateral declarations of reductions in its armed forces, one last summer in the amount of 640,000 men, and one recently in the amount of 1,200,000 men to be demobilized by May 1, 1957, but it must be assumed that these have not substantially affected the real armed might of the Soviet Union.

The major significance of the Geneva meeting of Heads of State in July, 1955, is that it seems to have convinced the Russians that the West does not intend to initiate an attack on the Soviet Union. Global war involving thermonuclear weapons, which they probably already realized would be a war of mutual annihilation, could be ruled out, at least under present conditions, and certainly could not be regarded as an instrument of policy. The friendly atmosphere in which the Heads of State met, however, did not mean that there had been any fundamental change in Soviet foreign policy. Before the conference, the Soviet leaders made it clear that they were not prepared to discuss either the position of the satellites or the role of international communism. Nor has there been any indication since that time that these two are the subject of discussion or negotiation with the West. Discussion at Geneva in July was in fact limited to German re-unification, European security and disarmament. With the exception of President Eisenhower's proposals on the exchange of military blue-prints, neither side advanced any new proposals for the solution of these problems.

Between the two Geneva conferences, the Porkkala naval base was returned to Finland prior to the expiration of the Soviet lease. The base no longer had great strategic significance, so that its return must be seen as a gesture aimed at improving relations with Finland and convincing the rest of the world of the peaceful intentions of the Soviet Union.

During the same period, the USSR took the initiative on the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Federal Republic of Germany. The chief reason was to try to promote, through direct contact with the West German Government, the reunification of Germany on terms acceptable to the Soviet Union. The expectation is that this will have a greater chance of success the longer it is apparent that four-power discussions on Germany are failing to lead to agreement on German reunification. The establishment of relations with West Germany was followed almost immediately by the granting of full "sovereignty" to East Germany, which thus assumed full satellite status and subsequently became a full member of the Warsaw Pact.

A number of German prisoners-of-war who had been held in the Soviet Union since the cessation of hostilities were allowed to return to West Germany as a condition for the establishment last autumn of diplomatic relations between the USSR and the Federal Republic. Since that time, a number of other foreign nationals have been released from the Soviet Union and there is even a thin trickle of exit permits being granted to Soviet nationals going to join close relatives abroad. This encouraging sign is counter-balanced to some extent by the "Return to the Homeland" campaign being conducted by the Soviet Union and other Soviet Bloc countries. Its main purpose would appear to be to disrupt and demoralize the émigré groups who are most vociferous in their anti-communist propaganda.

The Geneva Meeting of Foreign Ministers in October-November 1955, brought the Soviet Union and the West no closer to agreement on major issues. Its chief advantage was the opportunity it afforded for a clear statement of Soviet and Western positions, particularly on Germany but also on the matter of East-West contacts. Neither side made any concessions of substance. The Soviet Union seems to have accepted, for the time being, the continuing division of Germany and the firm incorporation of a strengthened East Germany into the Soviet bloc in the pattern of the other satellites. Its terms for reunification are still the preservation of the social and economic structure of Eastern Germany in a unified Germany.

In spite of Mr. Molotov's rejection at the Geneva meeting of the far-reaching Western proposals on East-West contacts, there is no indication that the Soviet Union intends to return to the extremes of post-war isolationism. The USSR continues to promote a controlled programme of contacts within its chosen limits. The primary purpose is to obtain scientific and technical "know-how" from the West to assist in Soviet economic development, and in order to achieve this objective, the Soviet Union seems to be willing to share at least some of its knowledge in fields where it is ahead of the West. A secondary purpose is to create a good impression of Soviet accomplishments and to foster the idea of the Soviet Union's peaceful intentions and general reasonableness in dealing with the outside world. It has been comparatively forthcoming in permitting journalists and "casual" visitors into the USSR, and arranging theatrical and artistic visits from Western countries. Tourist visits to the USSR are encouraged, and some Soviet citizens are travelling as tourists outside the Soviet bloc, though in both directions the Russians prefer group to individual tourism. The exchange of parliamentary delegations is also being encouraged, though visits to the Soviet Union greatly exceed those of members of the Supreme Soviet to other countries. It is also worth mentioning that the jamming of BBC broadcasts has recently ceased, and that the United States will shortly resume publication of its magazine Amerika in the Soviet Union.

After a period of apparently considerable suspicion about the motives behind President Eisenhower's "Atoms for Peace" proposal late in 1953, the Russians, beginning last summer, began to show serious interest in international co-operation in the atomic energy field. Their scientists were remarkably forthcoming about Soviet experience at the U.N.-sponsored conference on exchange of atomic information at Geneva in July 1955. The Soviet Union has since shown itself prepared to co-operate in the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which will be concerned not only with exchange of information but, more important, with the provision of atomic assistance to underdeveloped areas.

Although it was foreshadowed as long ago as the 19th Party Congress in 1952, we have only become generally aware in the last year that the Soviet Union has embarked on a new programme for the extension of Soviet influence, a programme of economic penetration. The new drive for foreign trade and technical assistance, directed primarily at the underdeveloped countries, has some economic motivation, though its primary purpose is political — to convince the target countries of the advantages of a policy of neutrality in the East-West conflict and of the possibilities of close and safe relations with the USSR. The Soviet Union has been at pains to emphasize that it is offering trade, not aid, without political or military strings attached. Its offers, therefore, have consisted of such things as the purchase of surplus supplies of basic products and long-term, low-interest loans for development purposes. The economic drive has already done much to convince the underdeveloped countries that the USSR is a peace-loving state with no aggressive designs upon them, and that it can and will assist them in their economic development without endangering their national independence.

The economic offensive has been most aggressive in South Asia, followed by the Middle East, with Africa and Latin America as lesser targets for later exploration. The effectiveness of the economic drive in Asia was greatly assisted by the Bulganin-Khrushchev goodwill tour of India, Burma and Afghanistan last year, and by the more recent trip through the same area by Mr. Mikoyan. Although there is no present prospect that India or Burma might align themselves firmly with the Soviet Union, the results of economic penetration in Afghanistan are a very worrying indication of the potential effectiveness of this new type of Soviet imperialism.

One aspect of Soviet foreign policy which has been deeply disturbing to the West, and particularly to the United Kingdom, has been its recent active participation in Middle East affairs. The Soviet entry into this area, in which it has, until recently, shown almost no interest, was pointed up clearly in the provision of Czech arms to Egypt. This activity should be seen primarily as an attempt to embarrass the West in the area and to weaken Western influence, but there are indications that there may be some genuine Soviet concern about the intentions of the West in establishing the Baghdad Pact. Recently, however, it seems that the Russians have become worried lest their support of the Arab nations in the Arab-Israeli dispute might lead to the outbreak of hostilities and that the hostilities might not be confined to the area. They do not wish to run the risks of provoking global war at this time, and they have therefore begun to talk seriously about a solution through the United Nations. The Molotov declaration of April 17 and the limited degree of Soviet co-operation in the Security Council are hopeful signs. The Russians are not going to drop their interest in an area which is of direct concern to them for strategic, economic and political reasons, but at least there is an identity of Soviet and Western interests in the Middle East to the extent that both sides want to avoid a renewal of Arab-Israeli conflict lest it lead to general war.

There are also some slightly encouraging signs in the European satellites. For military, political and economic reasons, Moscow almost certainly regards the maintenance of effective control over the European satellites, though not necessarily in its present form, as an essential element in its power position. The satellite régimes, though unpopular, are firmly entrenched, and there is little possibility at present that dissidence will lead to a reversal of the social system. Nevertheless, there has recently been evident a ferment in the area as a result of the Soviet rapprochement with Tito, the new Soviet line as laid down at the 20th Party Congress, and some pressures of a national and economic nature within the satellites. Moscow may now be willing to allow a greater degree of national independence to the satellites out of deference for Tito's demands and the new line on different roads to socialism. On the other hand, it is making new efforts to co-ordinate economic planning in the bloc as a whole in order to rationalize bloc production.

The Soviet approach toward the United Nations Organization has improved somewhat since Stalin's days. The Russians have taken a new interest in the specialized agencies, joining ILO and UNESCO for the first time and making some contribution to the UN Technical Assistance Programme. Starting with the General Assembly in 1955, the tone of Soviet statements at the United Nations has been considerably softened and is on the whole in marked contrast with the vituperations of Vishinsky's day. The Russians are less blatant in using the United Nations as a propaganda forum and have given some signs of wanting to use the United Nations for constructive purposes in spite of a penchant for bilateral negotiations.

The Soviet attitude toward the United States has also shown some improvement, though United States policy is still the main object of international attack. The Russians in the last few years have repeatedly expressed their desire for better relations with the United States and their admiration for President Eisenhower. They still attack many specific U.S. policies, castigate the "imperialist and reactionary forces" in the United States, and, despite protestations to the contrary, seem still to be bent on dividing the United States from its allies. Yet even this is an improvement over the wholesale denunciation of anything and everything American which was the key-note of the late Stalin era.

The new methods of conducting Soviet foreign policy, the new pragmatism, the new willingness to discuss problems with the West have all been characterized by the establishment of personal contact between important Soviet leaders and their opposite numbers in the West, thus ending the almost complete isolation of Stalin's days. This does not mean that their basic views have changed, but it is at least a relief, and a step forward, to be able to discuss problems with comparative frankness instead of communicating by means of propaganda broadsides. The propaganda itself and statements by its leaders have on the whole been much less aggressive, less vituperative since Stalin's death. Though there are still some very jarring notes, such as Khrushchev's statements during his South Asian tour, the Russians seem to be learning that extravagant propaganda tirades are not conducive to the solution of East-West problems and that they also tend to alienate the more thoughtful statesmen of the neutral countries.

In general, the West can welcome all these developments. If we look at them as a whole, certain general conclusions can be drawn.

(a) Right after the death of Stalin, the Soviet Union set about remedying situations which held the danger of leading to global war. This process has continued, and we can expect that it will continue as long as relative strengths are such that global war would be mutually annihilative. The avoidance of war is the key issue, and we are therefore in a much better position than we were in March 1953.

(b) The development of the H-bomb and the carrier are of central significance in assessing the reasons for the new Soviet tactics.

(c) With the possible exception of the Indo-China settlement and, although it is still too soon to say, the discussion of Middle East problems, no major concessions have been made to the West as a result of negotiation, in the sense that the Soviet Union has not said to the West, "We shall abandon this position if you will abandon that position."

(d) Most of the welcome developments have either cost the Soviet Union little or have even increased the strength of the Soviet position. Some, in which reduction or withdrawal of troops are concerned, have been forced on the Soviet Union by changing strategic concepts and the tight labour situation.

(e) With the exception of the Geneva meeting on Far Eastern Affairs, the Arab-Israeli dispute, and "atoms for peace", bilateral negotiations, for which the Soviet Union seems to have a preference when it really wants to get things done, have yielded more positive results than multilateral negotiations.

Many outstanding points of difference remain now as they were at the time of Stalin's death:

(a) Refusal to recognize the legitimate desire of the Atlantic nations to band together in a defensive alliance before the threat of Soviet territorial aggrandizement.

(b) Refusal to recognize the legitimate interest of the U.S.A. and Canada in the Western European scene, economically and militarily.

(c) Refusal to consider the reunification of Germany under conditions which would leave it free to align itself with either West or East.

(d) Refusal to accept the key consideration in disarmament viz., an effective system of inspection and control.

(e) Refusal to discuss the position of the satellites and of the international communist movement.

We can, if we put ourselves inside the Soviet mind, see why they have refused to make any substantial concessions on these vital issues, but the fact of their refusal remains.

Recognizing that there are still major outstanding issues, we should not forget that there has been in the last three years, for whatever the reasons, not only a marked change in the method of conducting Soviet foreign policy but also a whole series of foreign policy developments which are, in themselves, welcome to the West. The great advantage of the new methods is that they offer some opportunity of having discussions with the Soviet leaders; and it is surely not naïve to hope that, as there have been some positive developments which are welcome to us, there may be more and that we, by our actions and policies, can encourage or discourage them.

George Kennan pointed cut in 1952 in Moscow that diplomacy had been completely discarded by the Russians. There was no attempt to use their diplomats for any traditional purpose whatsoever, and practically all other contact had been severed with the outside world. The result was that there was little chance of avoiding a direct clash since the margin for error was almost nil. This danger has now been mitigated and it is surely a considerable improvement to be able to deal with the Russians in a way which permits the use of those traditional methods in which the Western powers are supposed to be skilled.

SOVIET DOMESTIC POLICY SINCE STALIN

Since the death of Stalin there have been a number of important developments within the U.S.S.R. which together point in the direction of very sweeping changes in Soviet domestic policy.

2. The shape and ends of Soviet society remain unaltered; all the new departures since Stalin have been meliorative. But, together, these constitute a radical change in the function of Soviet society for the better. In due course, if this trend continues, as I think it probably will, this will have an important effect on the relations of the U.S.S.R. with the outside world. A more "normal" Russia will be at the same time an easier power to deal with, and a more difficult one in that its approach to international events will be more skilful and flexible.

3. The attached paper prepared in the Department was written before the recent developments in Poland and Hungary. It is, nevertheless, of considerable relevance in explaining some of the Soviet background to the decision to adopt a "softer" line towards the satellites. Whether the Soviet leaders will be frightened by these events into reversing their policies remains to be seen, though I believe they have gone too far down this road in internal policies to revert to full Stalinism.

SOVIET DOMESTIC POLICY SINCE STALIN

Since the death of Stalin, there have been a number of important developments inside the USSR which taken together point in the direction of very sweeping changes in Soviet domestic policy. This memorandum attempts to survey and to assess this new situation.

Summary

There can be little doubt that collective leadership has replaced the dictatorship of one man. If there is a contest for supremacy it is as much a struggle of ideas and policies as it is of personalities. The collectivity principle has, as yet, not extended much lower than the top echelons of the Party.

The Government itself has been extensively reorganized, streamlined, and to a certain extent decentralized to adapt itself to new security, labour, social and investment policies.

The effort to lend an appearance of greater vitality to the Supreme Soviet is less promising for any progress toward a more democratic legislature than is the attention being given to the proper function of the local Soviets.

Economic policy is directed to a more rapid correction of an admittedly grave imbalance between consumers' and producers' goods; important innovations have been necessary to cope with a shortage of manpower, and the most liberal labour policy in about twenty years is designed to raise productivity. A supreme effort is being made to solve the serious agricultural problems, with as yet uncertain results.

Security policy has been relaxed in several respects, a most significant effort has been quietly made to end the terror, and the first steps towards "socialist legality", if limited, are encouraging.

In defence, while pushing toward nuclear parity with the West, the régime has adhered to its conservative policy of building up and modernizing the conventional forces. Effective cuts enforced by economic difficulties have been confined to personnel, although there may have been some slight retrenchment in research and development.

The régime has fostered at least the appearance of a more liberal policy toward the minorities and of some concessions to religious belief.

Those aspects of ideology with the most pressing implications for domestic policy have been drastically altered. In education, the emphasis has fallen on still broader opportunity and a larger and more immediate contribution to the labour force. In the arts, the dilemma of creative freedom versus ideological prostitution remains, but there have been developments surprisingly critical of the régime.

The shape and ends of Soviet society remain unaltered, but the function of the mechanism has changed for the better. Collective leadership reflects, among other things, the survival of an inchoate desire for a broader system of government. The régime has been forced to pay more attention to the consumer, and has discovered the utility of law, of a relaxation of excessive controls. Recent years have revealed how far Stalin himself was under pressure before his death to accept these changes. The fact that Soviet policy has begun to lower its sights from the impossible to the possible must be recognized and encouraged.

The Leadership

The dominant position of Stalin as Secretary-General of the CPSU and as Chairman of the Council of Ministers has not yet been occupied by a single successor. In fact, the former post has apparently been allowed to lapse about six months prior to his death, leaving the position of the senior member of the Secretariat as the premier Party appointment. For a short time, Malenkov held the latter post as well as the Chairmanship of the Council of Ministers; but, a fortnight after Stalin's passing, he relinquished the Party post to Khrushchev, who has held it ever since. Some two years later, on February 8, 1955, he resigned the Chairmanship of the Council of Ministers to Bulganin, who remains the present incumbent.

Since Stalin's death, the Party and the Government have repeatedly claimed a return to "collective leadership". In addition to the sharing of Stalin's most important appointments between two personalities, all of the available evidence (which has been examined in a separate memorandum†) supports this claim. There is, of course, no question of the existence of collective leadership within the executive or legislative; supreme power explicitly continues to reside in the Party. Within the latter, "collective leadership" officially means the leadership of the Central Committee. but it is by no means clear that this is yet functioning as a proper forum, and it seems unlikely that collective leadership yet extends beyond its Praesidium, though there are indications that the Central Committee is playing a more important role than in the past.

In this situation, it is clear that Khrushchev is the dominant personality. But he has been at pains to dissociate himself with some of the external symbols of Stalin's personal power. As for the real sources of that power, it is unlikely on the one hand that he can yet exploit the services of the secret police; on the other hand, he probably enjoys the personal loyalty of most of the Party apparat. It is possible that he may one day feel compelled to use this to enforce a personal supremacy; but there is no evidence that he is yet in a position to do so, nor, indeed, that he covets the autocratic position held by Stalin.

The contest for supremacy, while partly a struggle of individuals, is probably also a contest of ideas. While we can only speculate as to the questions around which factions may be grouped, it seems clear that some at least are: the division of the limited resources of the USSR; military policy; foreign policy (Tito, and the satellites); de-Stalinization; and the role of the Party and the Government. With regard to the latter, for example, there was an obvious attempt after Stalin's death to assert the supremacy of the Government over the Party. But with the rise of the influence of Khrushchev there was a quick reversal of this policy which made it abundantly clear that the Party took precedence. Presumably Malenkov, and others of his type in the hierarchy, still consider the duplication of Party and Government officialdom as wasteful.

The Party

In February 1956, at the XX Congress of the CPSU, a special Bureau was created to supervise Party affairs throughout the RSFSR, the first of its kind since the formation of the USSR in 1924. With these exceptions, the organizational structure of the Party has not been changed since Stalin's death, and remains as it was ordained at the XIX Party Congress in October of 1952. But the size of the central organs (the Central Committee, its Praesidium and the Secretariat) has been radically altered. The speed and smoothness with which the change-over was made within twenty-four hours of Stalin's death tends to support Malenkov's later claim to the Supreme Soviet that a consolidation of the leadership had been agreed upon (presumably by Stalin's successors) while Stalin was yet alive. The Praesidium and the Secretariat, unaccountably expanded at the XIX Congress, were reduced to something like their former size. Since March 1953, the Praesidium has increased by only one full and two candidate members, and the Secretariat has grown from five to eight. Similarly, the number of Party secretaries in the Ukrainian, Georgian and Turkmen organizations was slightly raised in 1954. At a lower level, the political sections in the Machine Tractor Stations have been abolished and Khrushchev has condemned the uselessness of these sections in industry. In the Armed Forces, the authority of the commanding officer has been emphasized, at the expense of the Party indoctrination apparatus. In 1956, it has been announced that the Party apparat is to be reduced by 20-30%.

In striking contrast with the relatively stable organization of the Party, its personnel have been subject to frequent and extensive change. In 1956, about half of the Central Committee elected under Stalin were replaced. Many of those dropped appeared to be followers of Malenkov, and the bulk of the newcomers seem to be supporters of Khrushchev. Five of the seven Secretaries who assist Khrushchev have been appointed since his rise to power; and four of them, along with himself, are members of the Praesidium. Throughout the past three years, a very large number of changes have been made throughout the lower levels of the Party hierarchy, notably in the non-Russian border Republics. The turn-over has been especially marked in Georgia, where the purge lasted into 1954 and, in the course of some seventeen months, about 3000 members were expelled.

The Party has continued to expand at a rate about equal to that of the growth in population, and has reached a record of over seven millions. Growth in the RSFSR has been clearly below the national average (hence the new Bureau), and has been unsatisfactory in the rural areas. Although most of the membership is probably still drawn from the privileged strata of Soviet society, the educational level remains low (more than 60% have not completed secondary school), although probably higher than that for the population as a whole. The proportion of female membership has increased, but the rise is not yet sufficient to reflect a major change in policy.

Particularly since the fall of Malenkov, the Party has emphasized its control over the whole of Soviet life. Since Pospelov's address in January 1954, it has made increasingly frequent reference to the pursuit of the policies of Lenin. By contrast, public allusion to Stalin and his policies began to cease within a few weeks of his end, and this tendency culminated in Khrushchev's violent denunciation of his personality and methods at the close of the Party Congress in February 1956. It should be noted, in passing, that the denunciation by Khrushchev followed a bold indictment by Mikoyan, and that the latter had drawn an enthusiastic response from his Congress audience. But, apart from this, a precise and formal Party programme, integrating all the changes of the past three years, has not appeared. In February last, it was announced that the publication of such a programme, which had been ordered four years ago, would be delayed pending the completion of long-term economic plans.

The Government

The Government has continued to show the extraordinary dynamism which characterized its structure during the 'thirties and 'forties. The whole machinery of state was drastically streamlined when Stalin died, but, within months, there began a gradual process of expansion which has continued up to the present.

Both of these trends were naturally reflected in the Council of Ministers. In March 1953, the ministerial membership was reduced from 71 to 29. Within less than two years, additional appointments were made at the level of First Deputy and Deputy Chairman. The concomitant expansion of the number of Ministries and of other agencies has yielded a Council of Ministers of about 60 members, with a controlling group of fourteen (Chairman, five First Deputy Chairmen, and eight Deputy Chairmen).

A number of factors have caused the frequent re-organization of the ministerial structure. In the past, the need for greater co-ordination has often led to mergers at the top, and the contrary need for closer contact between the administration and the enterprise has, in turn, caused the split-up of the top structure. The tension between these two needs, which has long characterized the Soviet public service, has remained unresolved under Stalin's successors. By April 1954, Khrushchev was again calling for the division of several ministries, particularly those concerned with the economy. The number of the latter had risen from 18 in 1953 to 42 by 1955. The effort to reduce the power of the security organs led to their re-organization. At first, the MVD and the MGB were merged. Then the responsibilities of the MVD were curtailed and some of these transferred to the Ministry of Justice. The territories in the Khabarovsk Kray which had been anomalously administered by the MVD were incorporated into the new Magadan Oblast'. Finally, the MGB was reduced to a Committee (KGB) attached to the Council of Ministers. By September of 1953, the problem of raising the standard of living had compelled the re-organization of the Ministries dealing with the production and distribution of mass consumption goods. The need to decentralize some of the authority which, under Stalin, had been concentrated in Moscow, led to the redesignation of a number of "All-Union" Ministries as "Union-Republican" Ministries in 1954 and again in 1956. This process entailed the creation of new ministries in some cases at republican level. Again, the need for decentralization, together with the need to separate current from long-term planning, has forced the Government to revamp the planning machinery. Immediately after Stalin's death, the State Planning Committee re-absorbed the procurement functions which had been taken from it in 1948. The planning process was greatly simplified, especially in agriculture, the responsibilities of the ministries for detail were increased, and the Gosplan was directed to confine itself to the larger structure of the plan. Finally, in early 1955, the Gosplan was split into two organs, one to deal with current planning, the other with long-term projections. As the administrative and planning structure again assumed some of its former complexity, new problems called for special extra-ministerial co-ordinating machinery. In May of 1955, State Committees were set up on the Introduction of New Technology and on Questions of Labour and Wages. Sometime prior to the middle of that year, the foreign trade offensive compelled the creation of a Chief Directorate on Foreign Economic Relations, which appears to answer to the Council of Ministers rather than to the Ministry of Foreign Trade. Similarly, during the same year, the drive to develop atomic sources of power led to the establishment of a Chief Directorate for the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy.

One of the most important developments of the period, and one which attracted little attention outside the Soviet Union, has been taking place since 1954. This is a major reduction of the grossly inflated Stalinist bureaucracy. About 6000 superfluous and overlapping government offices, extending over all levels of the civil service, have been abolished, and their work divided between a much reduced establishment. In 1956, the Karelo-Finnish SSR was reduced to an ASSR, and the total number of rural soviets cut by nearly 25,000. This attempt at rationalization is easily the biggest in Soviet history.

The re-organization of the Government has been accompanied by a number of important changes in personnel due to deaths, purges, transfers and dismissals. Beriya was allegedly executed in December 1953. Kruglov, who headed the MVD under his supervision, survived his fall until 1956, when he was replaced by Duderov. His previous subordinate, Lieutenant-General Serov, was named to the new KGB and later elevated to Cabinet rank. Rudenko, who had been Chief Soviet Prosecutor at Nürnberg, was named Procurator-General in June 1953, and it was he who handled the indictment of Beriya. Vyshinsky died in November, 1954. Malenkov resigned his post as Chairman of the Council of Ministers in February 1955, to assume the portfolio of Electric Power Stations. Bulganin was replaced at the Defence Ministry by Zhukov. Kosyachenko, who lost his job on the editorial board of Planovoye Khozyaystvo when Voznesenskiy fell in 1948, was put in charge of the re-organized Gosplan in 1953. He was later succeeded by Saburov and Baybakov, when this body was split in 1955. Mikhaylov replaced Aleksandrov as Minister of Culture in the same year, amid rumours of scandal and possible indictment. In January of 1956, Mikoyan resigned the Ministry of Domestic Trade to Pavlov and Ryzhkov replaced Kosygin at the Ministry of Industrial Consumers Goods. In the following June, prior to the Tito visit, Molotov was succeeded at the Foreign Ministry by Shepilov, the former editor of Pravda. Kaganovich later gave up the Committee on Wages to Volkov, and in 1956, assumed the important portfolio of the Building Materials Industry.

The most extensive changes have taken place at the lower levels of the administration. Throughout 1953 and 1954, the governments of nearly all the republics were subjected to a marked turnover, especially that of Georgia. The process began with the MVD and the MGB, and many appointments newly made after Stalin's death were again changed after the fall of Beriya. Under Malenkov's régime, the changes continued, extending through many branches of the administration.

The Legislature

After Stalin's death, Voroshilov immediately replaced Shvernik as Chairman of the Praesidium of the Supreme Soviet. Since then, there has been some effort to instil a greater appearance of vitality into the functions of this body. It may be that in respect to the democratization of the political process, Malenkov wished to go faster than Khrushchev: whereas Khrushchev has explained his policy at Party meetings, Malenkov proclaimed his "new course" before the Supreme Soviet. When this body, the fourth to be elected since its inception in 1936, assembled in 1954, the latter duly resigned. Some of the commissions which had been inactive under Stalin have resumed their function. Thus the 1956 Budget was considered by the Budgetary Commission before it was tabled at a plenary session of both chambers. In July 1956, the Third Session of the present Convocation was marked by dim suggestions of debate on the new pensions law.

The official purpose for the elaborate and expensive facade of soviets remains a device for education of the masses to the democratic process; and the authorities have shown something resembling sincerity and realism in concentrating their major effort during the past three years on the local soviets. It has been announced that the right of recall is to be enforced against inefficient deputies. The executive committees are being urged to make more frequent reports to their soviets and the practice which has led to the position where more than 10% of the chairmen, vice-chairmen and secretaries of the executives are not chosen from among elected deputies has been castigated. There has also been a very large reduction of the machinery of local government. The total number of rural soviets, which reached a peak of 74,863 in 1950, was cut to 50,516 by 1956, as part of the house-cleaning of the bureaucracy.

The Economy

The new Government first revealed its assessment of the economic problems with which it was confronted when Malenkov spoke to the Supreme Soviet on August 8, 1953. This speech was a more frank appraisal of its difficulties than anything since Lenin's day. The policy proclaimed constituted a radical departure from that of the previous twenty-five years, in that it gave new weight to the needs of the consumer. Yet the Government was extremely cautious about propagandizing the significance of the change, and it was left to Voroshilov in the following November, anti-climactically, to recognize "a new stage in the development of the Soviet economy" after East Germany had already hailed a "New Course". When Khrushchev and Bulganin returned from China in 1954, Western attention was diverted by the former's proclamation of continued priority for heavy industry, and the fall of Malenkov in the following January was popularly taken to represent a split on that issue. Khrushchev later intimated to a foreign diplomat that, under Malenkov, they had tried to switch the emphasis to consumer goods too fast and that some retrenchment had proven necessary. This implied some modification of long-term priorities, rather than a complete abandonment of the "New Course". The Sixth Five Year Plan, announced in December 1955, clearly reflected such a change. While the rate of industrial growth is to continue to rise — and it is to be noted that the 1960 targets for the main industrial items are well above those set by Stalin in 1946 — it is to do so less sharply than in previous years, due to a more liberal labour policy and to increased emphasis on housing and agriculture. Unrealistically high rates of growth are posited in the latter field, but consumer income and consumption are clearly intended to rise more rapidly, and the economic perspectives outlined at the XX Congress in early 1956 were largely oriented in this direction.

Finally, the Stalinist dictum that consumer demand must always exceed supply in a socialist economy has been formally abandoned.

It is in the detailed developments of the past three years, rather than in published generalities on policy, that the real gravity of the situation and the real impact of the changes emerge most clearly.

The new Government at once turned its attention to agriculture, which is the key to the supply of the most vital mass consumer goods, and this branch has absorbed much of its energy ever since. First, farm taxes were reduced and procurement prices were raised, in order to stimulate production. In 1953, these measures were aimed primarily at labour-intensive processes (livestock products, fruits, vegetables), i.e., at those items which were in short supply and which were derived to a great extent from the private sector. The Government tried by fiscal manipulations to make the farmer more "market-conscious" and to reduce some of the old discriminations against his private plot. In 1954, it was the turn of the collective sector: planning was simplified, credit was expanded, prices were reduced to quicken the flow of equipment to the farms, the relations between the collectives and the machine tractor stations were altered to raise profits, and an effort was made to put both collective and state farms on a paying basis. In 1955, greater attention was paid to the supply of social capital in the countryside and new construction in urban areas appears to have been somewhat checked. The team (rather than the brigade) system of cultivation was restored to stimulate individual initiative. All of these measures were consistent with the emphasis in the Fifth Five Year Plan on the intensive development of agriculture. In 1954, with the decision to sow 30 million hectares of marginal land in Central Asia and Siberia, the emphasis swung to extensive development, in a search for quick results. At the XX Party Congress, Mikoyan sharply condemned attempts to hasten the "transition to Communism", as Stalin had prescribed, by instituting the direct exchange of goods between the factories and the collectives, as this would interfere with rational cost calculation. It seems that the Soviet economists are indeed moving from "cost accounting" to the notion of "scarcity" which for so long has been absent from their thinking. The order published after the XX Party Congress in 1956, to make cash advances to collective farmers, much resembles a step toward the transformation of these into wage labourers.

Initially, the supply of consumer goods was expanded by depleting stocks and possibly state reserves. In view of the traditional priority of industry, the supply of consumer durables increased more rapidly than that of non-durables. Malenkov was explicitly ordered to ensure the steady supply of electricity to light industry. The considerable effort to expand the fisheries industry, which supplies the bulk of the protein in the Soviet diet, was continued, and led to drastic measures to check Japanese inroads in Pacific sources of supply in March of 1956. Since 1953, consumer raw materials have figured more prominently in imports, particularly in those derived from the recent trade offensive in the underdeveloped areas. In October of that year, Mikoyan ordered a new retail policy, a more accommodating attitude toward the customer. Investments were increased to modernize retail and catering machinery and attention was given to those aspects of the transport system which had impeded distribution. In 1956, the exchange of faulty goods was facilitated.

The price cuts, which had been an annual feature since 1950, were greater in 1953 than in any previous year, declined in 1954 and ended in 1955. The state loan, cut in half when Stalin died, has since resumed its former size. While there has been an obvious increase in purchasing power and in consumption, the last Party Congress was forced to admit the existence of an inflationary situation.

No census of the population has been taken since 1939, and it appears that the Government never began to realize the demographic situation with which it was confronted, until about the time of Stalin's death, when its attention was forcibly directed to manpower and food. During this period, the Government finally felt it necessary to release significant numbers of former Axis prisoners of war. At the same time, the age-classes annually becoming available to the economy were reduced in size, due to their origin in the years of collectivization, when the birth-rate had fallen. At the same time, the conference of construction workers revealed the need for 300,000-500,000 men to man the new developments in the East and North. In 1954, 120,000 had to be found for the farms, and it was calculated that the marginal lands would entail the shift of 3,000,000 people. Towards the end of the Fifth Five Year Plan, it became clear that about one third of the growth in industrial output had been due to an unplanned expansion of the labour force, rather than to increased productivity. The Government was clearly faced with an inadequate supply of labour; it also failed to secure the voluntary mobility necessary to replace forced labour which had been released from remote regions by the amnesty of 1953. In these circumstances, some demobilization took place quietly in 1954 and further cuts totalling 1,840,000 men were announced in 1954 and 1955. The rationalization of the bureaucracy yielded about 700,000 people for productive employment and the very recent cuts in the Party apparat should make a further contribution. Against this background, it is barely possible that the campaign for a return to the homeland has not been entirely motivated by the standing disgrace of a hostile emigré element abroad. In January 1955, Khrushchev openly advocated a pro-natalist policy, and, at the Party Congress of last February, the administration began to prepare its people for the shocking revelation that the population totalled only about 200 millions. This was the approximate level of the population within the present boundaries in 1941, and implied a total demographic loss in the last war of about 40 million people.

These circumstances explain the series of measures adopted to stimulate an increase in productivity which together make up the most liberal labour policy since 1938. These range from the usual exhortation at special conferences of Komsomols, construction workers and industrial management through the creation of new state committees to overhaul wages and to co-ordinate technological improvements, to immediate and material incentives. Management has been given greater responsibility in planning, and the discouraging differential between top and middle salary brackets, and between academic and industrial wages has been reduced. Since 1954, stakhanovism has been pointedly ignored. The role of the trade unions in the conclusion of collective agreements has been partially restored. The working week has been shortened, and further reductions are contemplated. Maternity leave has been increased, criminal liability for certain common infractions of labour discipline has been abolished, and a more liberal pensions law has been adopted. Cuts in the price structure and the remission of rural taxes must also have had their effect in this respect. Finally, a recent decree, establishing a minimum wage for the first time in Soviet history, should bring substantial benefits to millions in the lower wage brackets.

As a measure leading to greater efficiency, the railways have begun a long-term programme of dieselization and electrification. The construction of major pipelines has begun, for the first time, and expansion of the merchant fleet is under way. The production of electric power from atomic fuel began in June 1954.

National Security and Law

The restrictions on access to official data which were previously regarded as sensitive have been considerably reduced and more are now available to the Soviet people and to the West. As noted above, the stenographic reports of the sessions of the Party's Central Committee are receiving a wider distribution. Since 1954, the government has released a growing body of information on its research activity in the Central Arctic Basin. The Sixth Five Year Plan was more informative than any of its post-war predecessors. It is to be presumed that access to MVD archival materials must be enlarged, if history is to be re-written, and one provincial official of that Ministry has called for this. The provincial press now contains frank reports on cases affecting public safety and adolescent hooliganism. In June 1956, the Government released a statistical manual, the contents of which go beyond anything published since the 'thirties. The location of certain minorities deported during the war has been revealed.

The new régime has shown itself more prepared to permit its people to make contact with the outside world. In June 1953, restrictions imposed in 1948 and 1952 on the movement of diplomats were reduced. The decree prohibiting marriages with foreigners was revoked in December of that year. A very large number of official delegations have been sent abroad and received within the USSR, and tourism in both directions has received some encouragement. In 1955, Soviet radio "hams" again began calling their American counterparts and the jamming of BBC broadcasts was stopped in the following spring. Recent visitors nearly all testify to a greater ease on the part of the Soviet people in their association with foreigners. Some exit and emigrant visas have been granted.

The Government has made a very obvious effort to reduce the air of tense belligerence which had been associated with its reaction to alien penetration and subversion. Except in the military press, the campaign for vigilance against foreign machinations died out about two months after Stalin's death. Moscow confined its reaction to the American balloon campaign to notes and aircraft which later intruded in Soviet "air space" have not been intercepted. The control of territorial waters has become somewhat more lenient.

At the funeral of Stalin, none other than Beriya himself announced a return to "socialist legality" and the régime has repeatedly protested adherence to this principle. The illegality of the Stalinist régime was most spectacularly evident in the operations of the MVD and MGB. The old order, in popular parlance, is the "Beriya régime", rather than the "Stalin" régime. But the present scene reflects not only a general revision of the policy for the prosecution and suppression of political opposition but a basic recognition of the utility of justice in all aspects of public order. The "doctors' plot", which lent to the closing weeks of Stalin's life an atmosphere of the Grand Guignol, was quashed immediately after his death. Large numbers of those detained in correctional labour were amnestied, criminal responsibility for certain acts was eliminated and lightened for others, and the régime in the camps was humanized. In the same year, the Special Department of the MVD, the instrument of administrative sentence, was abolished. The responsibilities of the national security organs were reduced and their operations were placed under the scrutiny of the Procurator-General and the Supreme Soviet. Military tribunals were set up to review sentences and large numbers have been rehabilitated. In September 1955, an amnesty was proclaimed for all collaborators in exile. In 1956, a visiting French Socialist delegation was told by an MVD official that all internment camps would be abolished within a year or eighteen months, and that, in future, convicts would be committed to ordinary prisons or to corrective labour colonies with factories attached to them. Finally, the XX Party Congress in February 1956 was notably silent about the old theme of vigilance against the vestiges of internal class enemies.

It is reported that the redrafting of the Criminal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure, promised in March 1953, is nearing completion, and that the changes will reveal a general humanization of the law. Soviet jurists have stated that Article 58, which defines counter-revolutionary crimes, is to be amended. Certain definitions may be tightened, the word "counter-revolutionary" may be dropped, and the abolition of the provision for trial in absentia and without counsel in cases of espionage is contemplated. Since November 1953, the restrictions on abortions in medical establishments and criminal responsibility for consent to these have been dropped, a reflection of extreme social hardship in a country which now calls for more families of even three children. It is also reported that it is the intention to drop Article 16, which enshrines the infamous doctrine of analogy — that sentence may be inflicted for an act which has not been declared a crime by law. Vyshinsky's doctrine on evidence has been rejected: confessions no longer justify conviction and the use of torture and compulsion has been prohibited. Meanwhile, immorality and crime has been subjected to vigorous attack in the press, and the death penalty was restored to the Criminal Code in the spring of 1954.

Defence

The most significant developments of the period in defence policy were the achievement of a thermonuclear reaction in 1953, together with the start of serial production of jet aircraft of inter-continental range, and the reduction of conventional forces. Regular testing of nuclear weapons has continued. The Government at first proclaimed that a nuclear war would lead to the destruction of civilization; its later theme, for obvious domestic reasons, has been confined to the end of capitalism. Nevertheless, throughout 1954, virtually the whole High Command was used in a press campaign to inform public opinion of the importance of surprise in modern war, and thereby to alter the Stalinist doctrine on the ultimate importance of a large heavy industry, high national morale, and huge standing forces. At the same time, civil defence preparations were quickened and the Government's defensive interest in the Arctic increased. Voroshilov admitted the influence of strategic considerations in the eastward dispersal of industry.

The institution of the new régime was followed by a shuffle in the regional commands of the armed forces and a considerable number of new promotions to the rank of marshal were made. For the first time, a professional soldier has been admitted to the centre of policy formation, in Zhukov's election as a candidate member of the Party Praesidium. Party controls within the armed forces appear to have been somewhat re-organized.

The modernization of the armed forces has continued, and new artillery and transport and a new medium tank have been introduced. But, after some obvious vacillation, the decision was taken in 1954 to reduce the personnel strength of the armed forces. Several senior Soviet scientists have stated that they have ceased to work on defence projects. The overt defence budget declined in 1954, rose again in 1955, and has been more or less stabilized at the level of that year. It would appear that the rate of increase in arms production is now less than that of the past five years, and that the reduction in operating costs accomplished by demobilization has been partially absorbed in the procurement of new and more expensive end items.

Minorities

Six months before Stalin died, Beriya was much concerned about Soviet minorities policy at the XIX Party Congress. Malenkov also reflected this in his funeral speech and again in the Supreme Soviet in the following August. The new Government at once began to promote the appearance at any rate of giving a more important role to the lesser nationalities. Bagirov was the first Turcic Moslem to be appointed to the Party Praesidium (1953). Hostilities on the ideological front between the "bourgeois nationalists" of the non-Russian republics and the "Russian chauvinists" of the central government abruptly ceased. The situation was complicated, particularly in the Caucasus, by factions within the minorities themselves, and the position of Beriya, whose indictment suggested that he had favoured too liberal a nationalities policy, remains obscure. But almost all the republics were subjected to purges which extended over much of the past three years, and many zealous inquisitors disappeared, including Bagirov (Azerbaydzhan), Melnikov (Ukraine) and Mgeladze (Georgia). At the XX Party Congress, Mukhitdinov, believed to be an Uzbek, was made a candidate member of the Party Praesidium. This is the first appointment of a Central Asiatic to the organ controlling policy. The later denunciation of Stalin for his repression of the minorities and the publication of Lenin's papers on the nationalities question suggests that the present régime is trying to revert to the more liberal policy of early Soviet history.

In 1954, the tercentennial of the "union" of the Ukraine with Russia was elaborately celebrated, and Kaganovich, who was associated with Stalin's policy for the Ukraine, was noticeably absent. At the same time, the Crimean Autonomous Republic was removed from the RSFSR, and, in a belated recognition of the logic of geography, was given to the Ukrainian Republic. The novel reversion in 1956 of the Karelo-Finnish Republic to the status of an autonomous republic within the RSFSR reflects a refreshing willingness to face the facts of its poverty and predominantly Russian character, though it may also relate to a desire for good relations with Finland.

The real situation of the Jews remains obscure. The Government sought to signal the end of the anti-semitic persecution of Stalin's last four years in quashing the "doctors' plot", and it charged the MGB with "inflaming nationalities". The official line still maintains that anti-semitism is contrary to communist ideology and Voprosy Istorii attacked this as recently as April of this year. The French Socialist delegation to the USSR reported a few months ago that the Government explains the absence of Jewish cultural facilities as due to the lack of demand. But a later delegation of American rabbis has stated that the Government has sought deliberately to destroy Jewish culture. Anti-semitism has been attributed to such leaders as Khrushchev, Suslov and Furtseva.

Religion and Intellectual Life

In the year following Stalin's death, there were signs of a slight religious revival. Malenkov received the Patriarch, a number of churches were re-opened, and anti-religious propaganda was relatively temperate. In late 1954, a decree was adopted banning restrictions on religious propaganda. New contacts have been permitted with religious bodies outside Russia, as for example the exchange of visits between the Orthodox Church and the United Church of Canada. At least one synagogue appears to be functioning in each of the larger cities, the Moslem mosque in Leningrad was re-opened, and the birth of Buddha was allegedly celebrated by his followers in 1956. The Bible Society states that the printing of the Bible has been resumed. Attempts have been made to establish ecclesiastical links with foreign Orthodox and Protestant denominations, at least one classical painting of a religious subject has been shown and Ehrenburg feels free to quote Ecclesiastes.

While the basic Weltanschauung of the Party ideology has not altered in the slightest, there have been some remarkable changes in those ramifications of Party doctrine which have the most pressing implications for policy, particularly domestic. The inevitability of war with capitalism has yielded pride of place to the possibility of peaceful co-existence. Nothing more is heard of Stalin's linguistic doctrine on the superiority of Russian over the national languages; and his iron law of consumer supply and demand has been formally jettisoned. Of greater interest is the retreat from total environmental determinism which had been enthroned four years before Stalin's death in the revival of the Pavlov school of psychology. In biology, this retreat began in 1954, when Lysenko was toppled from his throne; although he has been re-instated at a lower rank, his Michurinist doctrine of the deliberate transformation of biological forms seems no longer to be unassailable orthodoxy. The neo-Pavlovians, who sought to apply the same principle to the creation of a new Soviet man, have also been attacked. The official philosophical journal and even Party Life have carried this new principle down to concrete reality. The former has criticized the Stalinist over-valuation of the power of propaganda; the latter has explicitly pronounced the impossibility of creating men of integrity through the external controls of legal prohibition and constant homiletics. It would also seem that the Party has tried to keep its interference with the sciences short of the ludicrous.

Whereas the XIX Party Congress still called for universal seven-year schooling, the new goal is for ten-year schools throughout the land. The emphasis has swung back to "polytechnical" training, to increase the practical capabilities of students at graduation. Since 1954, greater attention has been paid to the needs of rural schools. New and superior curricula were introduced into the universities, and co-education was restored in 1955. To increase the supply of teachers, the Government has decided to draft a number of students each year to the teaching profession. The exceptionally heavy burden of homework and examinations has been reduced. In early 1956, the fees for the last two years of school and for higher institutions of learning were eliminated. Khrushchev has contemplated the creation of special private schools for exceptional students. A new Ministry of Higher Education has been formed.

Research has taken some interesting new directions. The physical sciences remain supreme, but greater emphasis on pure rather than applied science has been called for. The Government has encouraged freer intercourse between its savants and their foreign colleagues. In the social sciences, a notable development is the new interest in the study of the capitalist system and the upsurge in oriental studies. Following the decision to rewrite the early history of the régime, some foreign historians, formerly proscribed, are now being cited, and some modest but genuine differences of historical interpretation are being debated in print.

In the arts, a clumsy effort has been made to introduce a new policy. In the autumn of 1954, the Second Congress of Writers was held, the first in twenty years. While the old criteria of socialist realism were firmly retained, the Congress called for greater flexibility and attention to the foreign market. No reference is now made to the restrictive "Zhdanov" decrees of 1946-8. Such works as Korneychuk's Wings, suggested perhaps an even greater frankness and freedom for experiment than the directives of the Congress had implied, and followed the hints made much earlier by Ehrenburg in his Thaw (1952). Many of the "cosmopolitan" writers who disappeared in the late 'forties are back at work. Yesenin's poems were republished in 1955 and even Pasternak returned to print. By 1954, intellectuals in Moscow were talking of a "Right" and of a "Left". In 1956, Simonov rebuffed the earlier attacks on Fadeyev's Young Guard, who had meanwhile been driven to end his life. Pasternak has been allowed to publish a poem satirizing "socialist realism". The composers have spoken out against their Stalinist critics and the people have given extravagant patronage to Western dance music. Paintings showing impressionist influence are again exhibited. There is no sign, in general, that there is likely to be a reversal of policy, and with the rapid, and indeed at times even bold, advances in the direction of liberalism in the arts, the intelligentsia are likely to take the lead eventually in keeping up the pressure for a return to more normal conditions of work, and exchanges of ideas not only among themselves but with Western writers, artists and composers.

Conclusion

The many changes in Soviet life during the past three years have all been meliorative; but where no practical need for change has seemed to exist, the Soviet state has continued to evolve along the lines prescribed nearly thirty years ago. Thus, throughout a period of innovation, the economy has continued to exhibit an annual rate of growth of about 5%, and a high rate of investment (ca 20%) has been maintained. The defensive potential of the country has been steadily augmented. To achieve weapons and carriers vital in modern war, the country has not found it necessary to gamble on a nuclear strategy alone, and has achieved the strength, despite extensive demobilization, to retain very large conventional forces. If the relation of the individual to the state has begun to change, the human substance of Soviet society, the structure of its institutions, and its ethos, have not. The managerial casts has retained its dominance, and has grown in numbers and competence. At the same time its basically conservative interest in preserving and enlarging its rights and interests has certainly not diminished. The old sources and channels of power appear to have survived the passing of Stalin. Even the official formulae — the Constitution of 1936 and the Party Rules of 1939 — continue to enshrine the same old aspirations and the same misrepresentations of reality.

But the function of this mechanism has been drastically altered.

Collective leadership has replaced dictatorship. Of the two ultimate sources of Stalin's personal power, Khrushchev undoubtedly enjoys great influence over one, the Party apparat; but neither he nor any other yet seems to enjoy Stalin's unique relationship with the organs of the secret police. The reasons for this change themselves limit Khrushchev's accession to supreme power: the evident fear of another dictatorship on the part of the present leaders and of a growing and increasingly competent bureaucracy; the old Russian desire, real though relatively inchoate, for a broader system of government; and the acute practical problems of state on which three decades of history have thrown up conflicting opinion at critical levels. All of these are living forces in modern Soviet society. The substitution of collegiate rule for autocracy is a reversion to a form long understood in Russia and long since prescribed by the Party, but there is little evidence that the power of decision has been delegated beyond the Praesidium to the Central Committee. The change has been imposed by the top at the top, and is as limited as it is vital, though there is little doubt that it reflected an almost universal aspiration for a return to something closer to normalcy. It is characteristic of the problem of rule, as the Party leadership still sees this, that nothing serious has been done to enlarge the share of the Supreme Soviet in the governmental process; instead, and more realistically, the national energies are being stirred in this direction at the bottom of the hierarchy, in the local soviets.

The contest for supremacy between the government and Party officials may not yet have been finally decided. There are grounds for the suspicion that the present Soviet policy of sending large numbers of technicians to visit the outside world, — all of these are government officials, many of them are of ministerial or deputy-ministerial rank, and very many are interested in questions concerning consumer goods and welfare — is to be largely attributed to Mikoyan. Several developments suggest that relatively liberal tendencies are to be associated with his influence. Certainly he has been in the lead in advocating the adoption of many western capitalist techniques in such fields as marketing. This exposure of officialdom to external realities can only further the erosion of the Party's position. The decree of last July 2, which took up the response of foreign communists to the denunciation of Stalin, reflected collective drafting and by an open reference to a "Leninist core" in the Central Committee, implied the existence of two points of view, if not of factions.

At home, the basic ends of communist policy remain the same: the increase of national power, the further consolidation of socialism. But it has been recognized that in the pursuit of these ends, efficiency must overcome scarcity, and that greater attention must be paid to immediate material incentive and less to exhortation. The Soviet economy remains geared to steady and relatively rapid growth, but new agricultural and housing priorities, and the most liberal labour policy in about two decades mean that a larger proportion of the reward for co-operation to these ends is to be enjoyed by the present generation of consumers. To these ends, many of the changes which Stalin wrought in the functions of the government and of the Party during his last years, for quite contrary purposes, have been undone.

A less material but vastly more significant concession is entailed in the attempt to end the terror. This in its broadest aspect, entails a partial discovery of the sheer utility of law. There can be no doubt that the effort to enforce legality has already done more to improve the life of the individual than any modification of the Stalinist economic policy. But the survival of the basic notion of law as generated by the top centre must be recognized, and a striking change represents only a minuscule step toward the still very distant rule of law. Questions of constitutionality have still to show any sign of vitality. The letter of the Constitution which allowed a Stalin also allows legislative and judicial controls over the secret policy; yet, instead of elaborating an interpretation to this effect, the régime has typically resorted to administrative prescription, in decreeing the establishment of new offices to operate these controls. Soviet law may now be allowed to function, but it is far from supreme, coherent and cumulative.

Soviet life is still subjected to the old controls and sanctions; and no doctrine at variance with the official line is yet tolerated. But the new régime has admitted the excessive application of these under Stalin, and has enlarged the field of responsibility and information among its citizens. Implicit in this decision is considerable confidence in the cohesiveness of a maturing society. But this confidence has not been unmixed. There is an air of caution about the new dispensation which is instructive. In the hour of Stalin's death, the collective leadership appealed for order and the avoidance of panic. Perhaps the most important change, the end of the terror, has been singularly quiet. Public reference to the controls imposed on the operations of the security organs seems to have been confined to an "aside" published in a specialist journal more than a year after the event. The denunciation of Stalin was confined to a closed session of the Party elite at the end of the XX Congress, and the full text of this has never been published in the USSR, though, of course, it has been widely circulated in the Party and other leading circles. Perhaps equally striking is the fact that the totality of the new departures has never been officially propagandized as representing a radically new atmosphere, if not course, for Soviet life. In its monologue before the masses, the Government prefers to speak of the details of various aspects of its policies, much of its discourse is still oblique, and many references to new concessions are relatively unstressed notes in the larger psalm of aspiration. Behind this behaviour, there is a certain old Russian inability to generalize on social realities, and an almost Victorian reluctance to admit the unpleasantness of the past; but there is also real apprehension on the part of a paternalistic government, which is informed by the notion that it alone can assess the implications of its acts, lest the popular appetite grow en mangeant. The régime seems fully conscious of the risks which it has accepted in renouncing the myth of an internal enemy and in seeking a reconciliation with its own people.

In all of these changes, there is evidence of the pressure of the social forces in a growing and maturing society. That these should take place under a Khrushchev, who all his life has been a chosen Party instrument of Stalinism, and who now speaks for the supremacy of the Party suggests that Khrushchev is trying to preserve the ascendancy of the Party by adapting its methods to the realities of Russian life, by reconciling it with the living forces of Russian society. His larger purpose would seem to be to preserve the Party dictatorship, which, of course, is probably the aim of all the members of the hierarchy, though some may be less interested than others in preserving the Party dominance over all aspects of government activity.

The new régime has been largely obsessed with the practical problems of material life, and with what, in terms of economics, reduces to the question of productivity. It has not yet been forced to turn its full attention to the abiding dilemma of the Soviet intellectual world; the reconciliation of initiative, freedom and fertility in the world of the mind with the rigid maintenance of orthodoxy. The solution, thus far, has been restraint, indeed a silence not devoid of embarrassment. But Mikoyan, in touch with the realities of the external world, seems to want a thorough revision of the ideology, and the rumblings in the artistic world are louder. The scene is set for the first beginnings of a piecemeal erosion of the Party's doctrine, and this may prove to be the next major development of the present era.

The uncertainty, discussion and compromise which have characterized the course of the concessions to popular pressure show on the one hand that the dynamism of communism is neither exhausted nor contained, and, on the other, that Stalinism is not yet wholly dead. Stalin began to grapple with long-term goals in 1946. These have remained unchanged. But, although the past three years have shown that the selection of different routes is imperative, these have not yet been defined. A host of disparate new departures in many walks of life, have not yet been integrated into a specific objective. The Party Programme of 1919, recognized in 1952 as obsolete, has not yet been revised, and the publication of fresh, long-term economic plans has been delayed. The revolution which has followed Stalin's death is not yet complete. But the apparent intention to complete these revisions supports the conclusion that the state as a whole is neither reluctant nor dishonest about the permanence of the changes thus far introduced.

No major change has ever been made in Soviet society overnight, for it has always become apparent that a protracted subterranean storm preceded the resolution of a conflict. The past three years, in addition to bringing changes of great promise, have been remarkably revealing of the extent to which the pressure for these new departures existed long before Stalin's death. By 1945, the Russian population had sustained not only about a quarter of a century of social engineering at forced draught, but a terrible war. These people had been accustomed to expect some relief after such tribulation. Instead, in the hour of their liberation from war, they were committed by their leader to even more taxing goals for 1960. Suslov later made it clear that Stalin was opposed in this decision, notably by Voznesenskiy, his youthful chief planner; and we have since learned that the latter paid for his beliefs with his life, and that others who shared his views suffered degradation or more. Stalin's testament, which appeared on the eve of the XIX Party Congress under the title of the "Economic Problems of Socialism in the USSR", revealed that he had been engaged in correspondence on this issue for some time; for, buried under the theoretical discussion was a central question of quite basic importance for policy: the allocation of resources and the organization of the economy to meet the immediate needs of the population, or to satisfy the more distant purposes of the state? The new textbook on economic theory, for which Stalin called peremptorily some six months before he died, was published a year behind the schedule he demanded, and, when it appeared, devoted a long chapter to this issue. If recent years have exposed the existence, by the middle of the Fourth Plan, of such tensions on economic minorities and other policies, they have also thrown much light on the associated and extraordinary ideological developments of the past decade. By his incursions into the fields of genetics, linguistics and psychology, and by the propagation of the belief in man's ability to transform nature and himself, Stalin had led the Party into a position curiously inconsistent with its older materialistic determinism. In all this, he appears as a leader seeking desperately to maintain the drive for the more costly of the old Soviet goals, and seeking to find a philosophical, if not theological rationalization for the imposition of his will. It now seems certain that the expansion of the central organs of the Party in 1952 reflected his search for new blood which would be more responsive to his diktat and less sensitive to the pressures which had accumulated; and Khrushchev has since charged that he did, in fact, plan to eliminate some of the older leaders. Thus, in the light of recent developments, Stalin emerges at the end of his life as an aging dictator, largely absorbed by the opposition to his policies, pressed by the knowledge of his own mortality (and possibly fear of assassination), and desperately seeking to ensure the survival of his beliefs. In his obsession with this, rather than a successor to his personal power, there may lie the greatness of the man. The last years of an arch-materialist are certainly a curious testament to the importance of ideas. But more important for present purposes, are the revelations of the past three years of the extent to which the recent changes had been the object of tensions among the leadership for some years prior to Stalin's death. This historical continuity further augurs the lastingness of the new departures.

The west must recognize that the new departures are not merely a cynical exchange of the administrative whip for the economic carrot. The economic concessions and the growing pessimism about the ability to create a new Soviet man resemble the beginnings of what has long since come to be revered in western history as humanism. The new legal policy is a recognition that the formalities of law cannot forever do violence to the law-consciousness of a people. Together, these changes remind us that even Soviet communists share the human thirst for truth, and show that some integrity and some acceptable standards, something of the true Russian national character, have again survived a terrible autocracy. Soviet politics has ceased to aim only at the impossible and has begun to lower its sights to the possible. In this, the west must admit that Russia is trying to stop being her own worse enemy, and it must seek to modify the highly imperfect stereotype of this nation which has been engendered in the public mind by a decade of cold war. It must be patient, recognizing that the political evolution of the Russians is slow and will remain slow, and that the policy of the present is only the first indictment of the recent past. Such recognition is imperative, if the West is to adjust to the promise of a tremendously powerful Russia within the life of some of her present leaders, and is to influence the application of her power.

THE IMPLICATIONS OF DEVELOPMENTS IN EASTERN EUROPE FOR THE U.S.S.R.

Further to my memorandum of November 27th[95] on the subject of Western Relations with the U.S.S.R., I attach a paper prepared in the Department which elaborates on the Soviet interests in Eastern Europe and fills in some of the details of our telegram no. SS282,[96] attached, on the situation in Eastern Europe. Events are moving so fast in this part of the world, it is difficult to keep up with them. This is an interim attempt.

Memorandum by European Division

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 27, 1956

THE IMPLICATIONS OF DEVELOPMENTS IN EASTERN EUROPE FOR THE USSR

Since the death of Stalin, the Soviet régime has sought to eliminate some of the worst aspects of his régime and to some extent to improve its relations with the satellites in Eastern Europe. But the efforts by the latter to follow suit in varying degrees, after the Czech and East German riots of 1953, have been vacillating, confused and conservative. In this atmosphere, dissent became increasingly vocal. The XX Congress of the CPSU in February last, which proclaimed the policy of "different roads to socialism" and denounced Stalin, marked a turning-point. At once, in varying degrees throughout the Bloc, internal ferment began to erupt. In general, the voice of dissent began with a desperate plea for a higher standard of living, but the call for a better life soon evolved into a demand for more liberal and democratic government. In Poland, after the June riots in Poznan, the government underwent a revolutionary change in an atmosphere which, by September, was nationalist and frankly anti-Soviet. In Hungary, by October, revolution was accompanied by the first open manifestation of anti-communism in nearly a decade.

Moscow did not openly react to the results of its February policy and of its rapprochement with Tito until the Poznan riots. At once, it shifted its emphasis from "different paths to socialism" to the need for unity within the Bloc. In July, Pravda attacked nationalist communism. Since then, the senior Soviet leaders have made several rounds of visits to the capitals of Eastern Europe, and Moscow has received party delegations from the region. In September, the Central Committee of the CPSU issued a secret circular warning against the consequences of Titoism. Loans of $25 million were granted to Poland and to Hungary.

In mid-October, the Soviet Government used political and military pressure to delay the drift of events in the Party in Poland. In the last week of October, Soviet troops were committed in the support of the Nagy régime. It was alleged that this action had been taken in response to a request from the revolutionary government. When the revolt began on October 23-24, the Soviet forces in Hungary consisted of two divisions, totalling 32,000 men. The build-up in Hungary began on October 25. Between October 25 and 27, a division of 15,000 men was moved in from the USSR, and, on the latter date, 10,000 men were transferred to Hungary from Roumania. By this time there were four divisions of 60,000 men in the country. On October 29, the Soviet forces began to withdraw from Budapest, at the insistence of the insurgents.

On October 30, the Soviet Government released a statement of its policy toward the satellites.[97] It reaffirmed the principle of peaceful co-existence, friendship and cooperation; recognized the need to define its relations, particularly economic and military, with these countries; stated that the question of the continued presence of Soviet advisers was urgent; proclaimed its readiness to examine the presence of Soviet troops in the light of the Warsaw Treaty; deplored the fact that the situation in Hungary had led to bloodshed; announced that its troops would leave Budapest as soon as the Hungarian Government found this necessary; promised to negotiate on the continued deployment of Soviet troops in Hungary; and expressed confidence that the peoples of Eastern Europe would not permit the communist systems to be undermined.

It is not necessary to recapitulate the subsequent events in Hungary, where a policy of repression has been used to prevent an increasingly anti-communist and anti-Russian government from taking Hungary out of the Soviet bloc, or in Poland where the Russians have accepted, at least for the time being, a national communist régime. There has been no sign of a change in the status of the other satellites.

In the past decade, the defensive, economic and political importance of Eastern Europe to the USSR has increased.

For all types of conventional operations, the satellite buffer compels Germany or any other potential enemy to commence his action some 500 miles west of the most vulnerable Soviet border. In the face of an increasing nuclear threat, it is only within this region that the USSR has found it possible to locate air defences satisfactorily forward of its heartland, and Soviet investment for this purpose has been extremely large. Since 1949, over 100 major airfields, as well as very many lesser bases, have been built. Across this region runs a line of communications which has become almost essential to the maintenance of Soviet policy in East Germany and which would be of critical importance for operations against Western Europe. Finally, a region possessing 100 million people, some important natural resources and a developing industry, is already capable of contributing about one quarter of the total war potential of the Bloc, and the Russians have always been able to hope that a successful policy in this region would realize such a contribution in the event of war.

Soviet economic stakes in the region are high. On the basis of Polish coal, Hungarian bauxite, Roumanian oil and East German and Hungarian uranium, considerable progress has been made toward the industrialization of a relatively backward area, and the USSR had the promise of a "little Western Europe" on her doorstep. The region already produces over 10 million tons of steel and a similar amount of oil each year. Particularly in the more advanced states, the USSR has found a valuable reservoir of technical "know-how". The ties to the USSR developed through the re-orientation of trade since 1945 are now sufficiently tight and numerous that any change in the pattern would mean some disruption of the Soviet economy. Soviet economic plans for the future, including the rapid industrialization of China, the drive into the uncommitted and under-developed areas and the achievement of autarky within the Bloc, are all premised on the retention of Eastern Europe.

The communization of Eastern Europe represented the first step toward the realization of the international ideal of the Party, and, withal, an encroachment on the signally important continent of Europe. Without the satellites, which account for most of the voting strength of the socialist camp in international negotiations, there would scarcely be a Bloc. Soviet dominance in this region renders the Soviet sphere of influence contiguous with Germany and the older powers of the West, and thereby enhances the weight of Soviet influence in all major political issues. Finally, in what was once "Green Europe" the USSR has had an opportunity to produce a socialist solution for the benefit of Asia and the world.

Recent developments in Eastern Europe thus have very grave implications for the USSR, whether or not these are contained within Poland and Hungary, and checked within each of these countries. For they indicate that a Soviet régime which has proven out of date at home is also out of date in this region. Change is essential, and, if Soviet dominance is to survive, the Soviet Government must act.

There are many pressures on the USSR which have militated against a simple resort to force. There is little doubt that the post-Stalinist régime is highly conscious of world opinion. It has widely propagated a policy of peaceful co-existence, the peaceful settlement of disputes, non-interference in the internal affairs of states, and anti-colonialism. It must be deeply concerned with the effects of its policies in this crisis on the newly independent and much wooed nations of Asia. A simple military solution would probably entail an outright and increased occupational commitment, and this runs directly counter to the need to stabilize, if not to reduce, the Soviet defence budget. Regardless of how much Stalinism survives in the Soviet leadership, the facts of Soviet domestic policy show that this has been effectively challenged within the USSR over the past three years. While the example of British and French action in the Middle East may be unfortunate, the Soviet Government can hardly wish to court an equally wide disapproval of her conduct in Eastern Europe.

Revolution in Eastern Europe and Soviet military intervention demonstrate the failure of Russian policy in this region, the absurdity of Soviet claims to the unity of the Bloc, and the real character of the Muscovite security system. Moscow cannot rely on a continuation of this policy even if the Polish régime appears to be in command of the situation, the situation in Hungary is brought under control, and precautionary measures taken elsewhere are successful. The broader implication is the need to re-define Soviet relations with this region, to substitute diplomacy for diktat, to maintain dominance without domination. In approaching this task, the Soviet Government will be confronted with a number of problems which constitute the more immediate and concrete implications of the situation; military, economic and political.

The major problem in the field of defence is Germany, with which Soviet-Polish relations are particularly connected. In varying degrees, all of the satellites must regard the USSR as the only power which can effectively guarantee them against a revived Germany. The expulsion of over ten million Germans has further cemented Polish and Czechoslovak ties with the Soviet Union. But it would seem doubtful that the USSR will wish to rely on an agreement with an independent Polish Government, even if it remains communist, to secure access to East Germany. To maintain the most Stalinist régime in the region, the USSR has found it necessary to station about 400,000 men and a very high proportion of her armoured forces in East Germany. Some means must be found to compensate for what may become a Polish bargaining position which would have serious consequences even short of war. The situation may thus lead to some change in Soviet policy for Germany.

Moscow has been compelled to recognize that the Warsaw Pact has been inadequate to justify her military position in Eastern Europe. While the issue is undoubtedly latent in Roumania, it has been raised only in Poland and Hungary. But it is significant that the only Soviet forces serving under the Unified Command of the Warsaw Pact are in these three countries; and the USSR has some justification for seeking special military rights on the North European Plain and at the ends of the Balkan passes from Trieste and through the Vardar valley. The outlook is for a more conservative definition of Soviet military rights throughout Eastern Europe. In this respect, the USSR can probably make many satisfactory concessions without prejudicing her essential defensive position.

The unreliability of the satellite armed forces has long been known to the Soviet High Command, but events in Hungary and Poland have exposed this to the world. In Hungary, the crowning blow to the Soviet security system has been the rejection by a communist régime, which it has long been claimed owed its initial creation to the Soviet Army, of the assistance of that Army in aid to the civil power. The USSR has failed to create allies in Eastern Europe, but she has shown that, at least at this stage, she still mistrusts diplomacy and prefers, despite their unreliability, to maintain communist régimes in this region by force. This preference points up the primary Soviet motive in this region as the determination, for reasons of security, to keep the West out of a buffer. It is difficult to foresee any short-term solution for the Russians, other than possibly the provision of still stronger defences at home, and the elaboration of plans to eliminate the satellite forces in the event of war. This would suggest that Moscow for some time will have to encourage still more limited defence policies in this region. In the longer-term, the USSR may still hope to secure some response to a more liberal policy.

The economic problems of the region have acted as a major catalyst in the precipitation of the present situation. Broadly speaking, there are two aspects: over-ambitious planning and a related over-extension of the satellites' trading positions. The problem is thus susceptible to two broad solutions: a reduced pace of industrialization and a large volume of aid. The first is clearly essential, but will do less to present the Soviet position as concessionary than the latter.

A slower pace of development will probably reduce the deliveries to the Soviet economy. The satellites have thus far made a major contribution to the drive in the underdeveloped areas, whose markets in many respects were tailored to their needs. A lowering of goals will probably impede this drive and, even more important, reduce their ability to import much needed consumer raw materials.

The USSR can with difficulty permit the acceptance of American aid by this region and it will be interesting to see how Poland proceeds. Her plans will have to be drastically revised, if she wishes to supply such aid, and, judging from the volume required by a free Yugoslavia, it seems doubtful even at such a price that she can afford to provide this in the quantity required. At the same time, this region is unlikely to find significant markets in the West.

Yugoslavia possesses the greatest share of the natural resources of the region and there may be an increasing tendency throughout Eastern Europe to recognize the economic good sense of a regional solution based on a combination of Yugoslav raw materials and satellite industrial plant.

The larger political problem was initially centered on the failure of Soviet policy in Eastern Europe. There can be little doubt that Moscow preferred restraint and it would seem that she initially hoped to confine her intervention to a minimum. It also seems clear that she ultimately felt compelled to act, to check the spread of trouble throughout a region which she regards as vital and the growth of an intolerable threat to her security system. But, in so doing, she has lifted her problem from the level of her policy in one region to the level of the whole foreign policy which she has proclaimed since the death of Stalin. Thus Soviet policy in Hungary should tend to stiffen NATO, and weaken Soviet prestige in Asia, as it has already, in India. Her only course can be an effort to salvage some respectability by re-defining her relations with the region after restoring a puppet government. The outlook is for a return to the statement of October 30 as fast and as spectacularly as possible. In this, the Polish example may be of some assistance. To keep control, she must find inducements, and it will require many years of such a policy to convince the peoples of Eastern Europe. To affect the conclusions which the world has drawn, concessions must be concrete and major. On the other hand, the developments in Hungary will probably diminish any previous readiness on the part of Moscow and of the satellite régimes to broaden the basis of government. The Soviet Government must solve this dilemma. Moscow will also find it difficult to avoid that gratuitous gaucherie such as led to the announcement of the programme of the present Hungarian Government from Moscow.

The elaboration of such a policy will pose an extremely stiff challenge to the mentality of the Kremlin, and may well lead to dispute and to some reorganization of the Soviet Party and Governmental leadership. The next plenum of the Central Committee of the Party in December should be interesting in this respect. Although an effort has been made to isolate the Russian people from the facts, they have shown in the past that this is not entirely possible; and it is highly unlikely that a popular opinion which has welcomed the elimination of Stalinist methods will show no sympathy for the Hungarians. The campaign within the USSR to stir up indignation against the Western actions in Egypt looks suspiciously like an effort to divert the public mind from Hungary.

A very large number of issues centre around Belgrade. In view of the suppression of Hungary, the satellite peoples must conclude that "gradualism" and national communism are the only hope short of war, and national communism will be a fertile milieu for Titoism. Regardless of the extent of Tito's ambitions, political and economic forces seem certain to draw the satellites closer to Belgrade. The USSR has shown that she is not ready to consider neutrality in Eastern Europe. It follows that she will not be willing to allow the satellites to gravitate slowly into the Yugoslav orbit. The Soviet Government may be forced to grant concessions in the form of closer and more sophisticated economic links with Belgrade, but possibly its primary problem will be to contain Yugoslav influence and to maintain its own.

The extent to which the ambitions of the communist régimes have outstripped even Soviet inspired goals is by no means clear, and it is possible that the Kremlin, in its hysterical effort to maintain a facade of monolithic unity, has been unable to do justice to its own efforts to curb these régimes. A growing awareness of the degree to which local communists are responsible for the public plight rather than Moscow will further weaken the prestige of their régimes and call their policies in question, thereby exacerbating the problem for the USSR.

WESTERN RELATIONS WITH THE USSR

In telegram No. SS282 of November 21, 1956 I attempted to spell out the dilemma facing the Russians in Eastern Europe. In this paper I should like to outline a few ideas which have occurred to me on the effects of these developments on the USSR itself, and the course of its relations with the Western world.

2. The Russian dilemma in Eastern Europe is basically that the armed intervention in Hungary, and the failure to find a valid Hungarian government, will make more difficult the application of "liberal" measures throughout the rest of the bloc. To add to the paradox the Russians are committed in principle to a "liberal" policy by their declaration of the 30th of October, which they have repeated on several public occasions is the policy they continue to follow, and they have officially accepted national communism as the course which Poland has decided to adopt. I suggested that a serious situation could arise whichever path the Russians took: "liberalism" in Poland, and repression in the other satellites which is an undesirable position over a period of time; or a return to a strong measures everywhere.

3. This is all the more serious for the Russians in my opinion because the repercussions of the events in Poland and Hungary are likely to be felt in Russia itself, and I think it is the realisation of this which has caused the rather erratic behaviour of the Russians during the past few weeks.

4. The events in Hungary and Poland must have had a profound shock on the Soviet leaders. In spite of what they say the rebuff given to Khrushchev and his colleagues publicly by the Poles in Warsaw, and the passionate demonstration of the anti-Russian and anti-communist feeling in Hungary must by now be accepted as genuine by the Soviet leaders. To this must be added the wide-spread reaction throughout the world, even including Asia, and, perhaps most disquieting of all, by the reactions of foreign communists to the events in Hungary.

5. At the time of the June 1953 riots in East Germany we concluded that the most disquietening aspect of them for the Russians was the fact that they "could not take place" — according to Marxist theory. The proletariat could not rise up against its own leaders, and against its communist brothers from the USSR; therefore, it had to be explained as instigated by Western agents.

6. But it is not in the long run possible so to explain the revolt of an entire people, and I wonder if the Soviet reaction is not in part shock at the revelation of the extent of hatred they have engendered, and in part a bewilderment at this failure of the theory. From this it could be an easy step to wonder if time were really on the side of the communists.

7. At the same time the Russians must have come to realize the political and economic failure of Stalinism in the satellites, and the prospect that even a slight relaxation is enough to blow the lid off. The question then arises as to the possibility of insulating the Soviet people from the effects of events in the satellites. If the policy of relaxation is scrapped, then it will gradually mean a revision of the policy of peaceful co-existence, and probably an attempt to slow up the domestic policies of Khrushchev and Bulganin. If the policy of relaxation in the satellites is continued, the Russians could be faced with the prospect of most of their subject peoples enjoying more liberties and possibly a higher standard of living than any the Russians have ever known.

8. It is going to be difficult — Mr. Nehru believes it is impossible — for them to put the clock back in the satellites, and just as difficult in the USSR itself. It will be equally difficult to proceed with the Khrushchev policies undiluted. It would not be surprising, therefore, if there were strong differences of opinion in the Praesidium.

9. President Tito has already declared that there is a split in the Soviet hierarchy, ostensibly over their policy towards Yugoslavia and the satellites. Even if we did not have this confirmation from a reliable source, we might have guessed it from the fluctuations of Soviet policy in Hungary, and indeed towards Yugoslavia. The Russians must partly blame Tito for the course of events in Poland and Hungary, and yet, up to the abduction of Nagy, they clearly could not make up their minds to swallow their anger, or to attack Tito. There must indeed be a school of thought in the Kremlin in favour of a strong effort being made to eliminate one of the sources of the trouble — Tito.

10. I doubt if the Russians have had time to make up their minds about the results of the crushing of the Hungarian rebellion. They may have, by their military action, minimized the chances for the time being of any other satellites asserting their independence. They have made a show of force in Central Europe without provoking any sign of intervention by the NATO powers.[98] Whether or not this has enhanced the prestige of the military and of the group in favour of a tough line, is very difficult if not impossible to say.

11. On the debit side they must calculate that they can only hold Hungary by military force, and it was precisely because they did not dare accept this risk that they did not overrun Yugoslavia in 1948. The Soviet action means a great and probably continuing loss of prestige and influence throughout the world. Furthermore, the peaceful Soviet protestations of the past two years have been made to look ridiculous, and the result should be a hardening of western will to rearm and to resist.

12. In connection with the latter the Russians probably expect that their action in Hungary will speed up German re-armament (though there has been no sign of that up to now) and reduce their chances of making headway in Germany during the coming election year. The alarming revelations of the weakness of their position in Eastern Europe, plus the prospect of a re-armed Germany, must add to the arguments in Moscow in favour of some positive action now.

13. One thing on which I think the Russians must be agreed is the need to distract attention as quickly and thoroughly as possible from their dilemma in Hungary and Eastern

---

[98] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
probably did not expect any J.B.C. W[atkins]

Europe. For this purpose the Middle East crisis was made to order. They have tried several other gambits such as a disarmament conference, a summit conference, and so on, and may experiment with others, but unless they are prepared to risk all-out war, I doubt if they would try military action in Europe, either against a neutral country or against NATO.

14. The anti-American feeling in Western Europe, however, is such that the Western Alliance is already considerably weakened. This can only be remedied by strong U.S. leadership in the political and economic fields. Failing such leadership the Alliance will continue to disintegrate and the Soviets will be the stronger. As in so many instances before, Soviet strength is partly made of Western weakness.

15. The anti-American feeling in France and the U.K. may seem largely unreasonable, particularly to Americans, but it exists and is almost certain to grow. It is in part psychological, and must be eliminated by measures intended to restore some of the confidence of these peoples in their own future and in the alliance. If it continues unchecked it is going to cross the Atlantic to the U.S. and in turn start an unreasoning movement towards isolationism.

16. In dealing with the Russians during the next six months, which is bound to be a very delicate period at least in part because of the stresses and strain in the Soviet bloc, the U.S. (and Canada) must balance the need to keep the Russians out of the Middle East, and to seek a permanent solution there, against the absolute need to restore and strengthen the Western Alliance.[99] In the meantime we should do nothing, in my opinion, either to help the Russians out of their embarrassing predicament in Eastern Europe, or to provoke them into further aggressive action through a miscalculation of Western intentions.

17. There are times when we can and should be co-operative with the Russians, and the developments in Eastern Europe are proof that our policy of encouraging the trend towards "liberalism" was the correct one. There are other times when we should be firm, and I think that applies now.

18. If the West were strong and united we would be in an excellent position to further this development inside the bloc. Since we are not, we must move rather cautiously until the Western Alliance is reformed and restrengthened.

19. If the Russians are permitted by the West to return to the policy of peaceful coexistence after a decent interval for the internment of Hungary, then they will certainly conclude that a tough policy has been justified. If we show them that they have lost the benefits of the policy of the last two years in return for ephemeral military gains in Hungary, then I think there is a chance that the group in the Soviet hierarchy may decide that the tough policy was shortsighted and return to the kind of international relations which are necessary in the nuclear age.

20. As far as diplomatic contacts with the Russians are concerned, I think we should not do anything which would minimize in their mind the impact of their Hungarian policy. For this reason, therefore, I think a high-level diplomatic conference would play right into their hands, and it would have a clearly diversionary intent. We cannot, however, remain indefinitely without contact; the first step is clearly to reform the Western Alliance and then work out a positive policy for Eastern and Central Europe, and for the Middle East. If it could be done, the ideal thing would then be for the Western Big Three to explore secretly with the Russians the desirability of a conference to discuss these problems. The main difficulty lies in balancing the need to produce an imaginative programme for these two areas which would make it worth while for the West to risk the propaganda losses a conference with the USSR would entail against the danger of giving the Russians the impression we were trying to drive them out of Eastern Europe.

21. On a less exalted scale we ought to bring home to them on every occasion the contempt with which their barbarous behaviour in Hungary is felt in the West.[100] We must make them feel that they cannot act in this way and be accepted as equal members of civilized society. To accomplish this we are going to cut down on purely social contacts with Soviet diplomats. We will also put in abeyance the question of exchange of visits for the time being and as soon as the situation becomes a little more clear we can then re-examine this to see if we have anything to gain from technical visits. In the meantime, I think the exchanges of information can go on.

22. With regard to trade, I see no reason why we should not continue to develop what trade is possible since we stand to gain as much from this as the Soviet Union.

23. We ought, at the same time and as soon as possible, to put Poland in the same category as Yugoslavia as far as contacts, exchanges and so on are concerned. We will have to watch this very carefully, of course, to see whether this attitude should be modified in the light of developments in Poland. As regards the other satellites, we ought to start treating them as individual countries with their own special problems. Eventually, if tensions are relaxed, we would think in terms of developing closer relations with them. Our treatment of Hungary will obviously depend on the outcome of the events there.

24. I should be grateful if you would let me know if you agree with this analysis.[101]

SOVIET POLICY

I thought we might use the occasion of commenting on some of the interesting reports we have received from several of our Missions on Soviet policy to indicate fairly briefly our approach to what has been happening recently within the communist world. Our main point is that, chiefly for internal reasons within the Soviet bloc, the "thaw" is almost bound to reassert itself if given a chance — and Western planning should take this into account whatever we think of events in Hungary and the Middle East.

SOVIET POLICY

We found De Menthon's comments very interesting; I think we can agree generally with him. Possibly we might wish to give more emphasis than he has to the internal situation in the Soviet Union.

2. It is no accident that the December party plenum confined its communiqué to internal economic matters despite developments abroad. Soviet empire leaders may only now begin to realize that a world power leading a coalition is faced with demands on its resources both internally and externally, not all of which are within its capacity to meet. Recent internal and external developments have placed an increasing strain on capacity to meet both. Moscow's main problems in this field may well be to devise a new system of priorities.

3. In Eastern Europe Moscow faces the challenge of substituting some measure of diplomacy for ruthlessness. Poland and Hungary demonstrated the difficulties but not the impossibility of applying the October 30 declaration of policy. The USSR both at home and abroad has derived considerable benefit from its satellites. For the foreseeable future it must seek to delay any processes which might substitute a buffer of merely friendly states for a bloc of communist régimes. Gomulka's pre-election position made it clear that he fully appreciated this.

4. The situation in the Kremlin is probably fluid; we doubt that it has yet crystallized into a "power game". We also doubt that Soviet policy in the Middle East, the implementation of which has followed lines established before Stalin's death, yet figures largely in any clash of ideas or personalities. We agree with De Menthon's view that the Soviet Union is perturbed by the Eisenhower proposals.[102] But we think it is important to consider why they are perturbed because the Soviet reaction will, of course, depend on what Moscow sees in these proposals. Our tentative conclusion is that the Soviet Union has good reason to consider that its long-term political and strategic interests are affected by the Eisenhower proposals; even if they cannot agree publicly they must be aware however that their immediate security interests are not affected. While the military guarantee offered by the USA must appear as qualified and irrelevant to the Russians as it does to some Western observers, the assumption of long term responsibility by the USA in the Middle East serves notice on the USSR that the USA intends to dispute any extension of Soviet interests in this area in the years to come. The risks involved in a direct USA-Soviet confrontation in the Middle East should force them into a more cautious course. It seems not unlikely therefore that, until the picture becomes clearer to the Soviet Union, the immediate response from Moscow will consist in face-saving propaganda and vague counter offers to countries of the Middle East in the Cold-War vein. This would not rule out supplying arms on favourable terms, and possibly offers of economic assistance. What the ultimate response will be is not clear, although, in addition to the usual Communist tactics of subversion, it might involve a pattern of trade between the satellites and the Middle East and propaganda playing upon the theme of Arab self-respect in contrast to the Middle East vacuum theory of the USA.

5. Preoccupation with Eastern Europe and with economic pressures at home and abroad will do much to limit possible Soviet moves, but it should not be overlooked that the scope for Soviet manoeuvres and initiative is considerable in the Middle East, greater indeed than in Eastern Europe.

6. In the Far East we question the suggestion of the French, reported in paragraph 4 of your telegram 29, that there has been a recent reconciliation after a period of drifting apart in Sino-Soviet relations. While there may be something in the speculation that Chou has been coming to the aid of Khrushchev because the latter had been instrumental in securing Soviet economic assistance for China in past years, the primary motivation of China's recent change of tune is mainly the threat to communism as such represented by developments in recent months in Eastern Europe. Faced with the same problem, Tito has reacted similarly to the Chinese although he has not gone nearly as far in justifying Soviet intervention in Hungary and the suggestion that Gomulka should slow down the development of national communism in Poland. Neither Tito nor Chou relish the thought of communism in Eastern Europe being replaced by any other system. Recent USA policy statements have undoubtedly reinforced these tendencies for all good communists to come to the aid of the party and of the leadership of Moscow in this phase of relations between the USSR and the USA.

7. Taking a broad view, then we doubt whether the thaw is really over in the Soviet government's relations with its own people and with the outside world. In spite of Hungary and Poland and the new USA policy in the Middle East, internal pressures within the Soviet Bloc and within the USSR and the CPSU itself will probably be sufficient to keep Moscow moving — slowly, carefully and pragmatically — but in the direction of more liberal attitudes both within and without the USSR. If this be true Moscow may be growing more serious than before about those aspects of its disarmament proposals which deal with European security. It may be that the Soviet desire for trade arrangements in the E.C.E. and U.N., as well as its disarmament proposals relating to European security and redeployment, reflect a desire to sound out the West on a new dispensation which will either retain as much of the Soviet position in Eastern Europe as possible, or secure compensatory gains in regard to Germany and NATO. Be that as it may, Western policy should neither write off the possibility of a new thaw nor be unprepared to exploit its return should occasion arise.

REPLACEMENT OF MR. SHEPILOV AS SOVIET FOREIGN MINISTER

I have not, for the past three months, been able to follow events in the U.S.S.R. in detail, but I have been thinking over the implications of Mr. Shepilov's removal from the Foreign Ministry and the appointment of Mr. Gromyko. I submit my tentative conclusions with all diffidence.

2. I think the Soviet authorities would like very strongly to return to the conditions which existed before the Hungarian revolt and particularly to the "peaceful co-existence" between the U.S.S.R. and the Western World. I think they realize that they have a great deal more to gain potentially from a continuation and development of this policy than from a return to the sterility of pure Stalinism, with which many of them in any case had been clearly in disagreement even for some time before the abandonment of the policy. However, some aspects of the domestic policy of the last couple of years are likely to be modified as well as the policy towards the satellites. The latter was obviously developed much too fast and led to some pretty disagreeable results for the Russians, not the least of which was the effect of "liberalisation" in the satellites on the Soviet people itself. This was evidently something which surprised and frightened the Soviet leaders and there are quite a few signs that they are trying to slow down, if they cannot reverse, this process within the U.S.S.R.

3. The aspects of the policy which affected relations with the Western World, however, have largely produced useful results for the Russians. The latter have made it clear on a number of occasions that they would like to get back to the same type of relationship as they had before Hungary, though they perhaps do not realize that in the eyes of the Western World one of the things which made it easier for the West to develop more friendly relations with the U.S.S.R. was precisely the modification of the more odious forms of Stalinism inside the U.S.S.R.

4. It is difficult to say definitely that the removal of Shepilov and the appointment of Gromyko herald a new departure in foreign policy. Obviously, Gromyko is not going to make a new policy. He is a technician who will apply the policy decided upon by the Presidium. In the past, however, modifications in Soviet foreign policy have almost invariably been accompanied by a change of foreign minister. Therefore, the fact that Gromyko is a technician does not necessarily mean that the policy may not be modified. The Russians have gone to considerable pains to stress their intention of maintaining the policy followed in the past few years. I imagine this is correct in the sense that they intend to try to exploit what advantages they have gained from this policy. The appointment of Gromyko, however, puts the implementation of the policy in the hands of a tough and skilfull diplomat who can, if necessary, easily interpret that policy in a much more rigid manner than could Shepilov, who was identified with the "softer" line towards the outside world as well as, of course, a number of failures such as their relations with Hungary, Poland and Yugoslavia.

5. I think the time has probably come when we ought to make a serious estimate of the advantages and disadvantages for the West of the policy of the last few years. There are a number of obvious gains: the Hungarian revolt; the loosening of ties between Poland and the U.S.S.R.; generally the more fluid and unsettled situation among the satellites; and finally, the disillusionment and defections among the communist parties in the Western world.

6. The disadvantages are the tendency to reduce our defences; the strain on NATO caused by the need to meet expensive defence bills during a period of "cold peace"; the increase in Soviet prestige in the Middle East and Asia; and the luxury of indulging in our own internecine disputes when the Soviet menace was slightly relaxed.

7. The Russians are probably convinced that the United States did not like the period of peaceful co-existence and are now determined to force the U.S.S.R. back to a period of cold war. For prestige purposes they will find it necessary to counter what they consider American cold war moves by counter moves, as in the Middle East. The difficulty is to prevent such moves and counter moves from creating a chain reaction, the end result of which may be quite unlike what either side originally expected. Nevertheless, at the same time the Russians seem intent on making other gestures aimed at reducing international tension. Up to now they have not given any indication that they are prepared to pay a real price for a return to the pre-Hungarian state of affairs. It would, in my opinion, still be a mistake to let this happen without exacting something in return. At the same time, we do not want a return to the tensions of the cold war, and this is going to be particularly delicate in view of Soviet nervousness, about their position in Eastern Europe, their calculation of U.S. intentions, in the Middle East, and their reaction to the announcement of the delivery of atomic warheads to forces in Western Europe. Therefore, I think we will have to tread a very careful path during the next six months to determine how we should stand without starting a series of events which would inevitably lead back to the situation of, say, 1952-3, which profited neither side.[103]

THE CRISIS FACING MOSCOW

On a number of occasions in the near future, the question of Soviet domestic and foreign policy will receive renewed attention. We expect that the subject will be discussed, for instance, at the Bermuda talks and at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial meeting. As in past years, it may also be raised shortly in the External Affairs Committee of the House.

2. I attach for your perusal and comments a memorandum prepared in the Department which attempts to set forth the basic problems facing the Soviet leadership as it seeks to develop a policy for the future. These problems are examined not only in the light of recent developments in Eastern Europe and the Middle East, but in the larger perspective of Soviet policy — and economic policy in particular — over the past decade.

3. This memorandum points out that the Soviet leadership has been caught for the past ten years between two conflicting pressures: one, which is internal, is toward the reduction of the pace of economic growth, in order to give a better life to the consumer; one, which is largely external, is to continue, indeed, to increase the rate of economic expansion. The latter pressure has been greatly increased by developments in Eastern Europe and the Middle East, as well as by the demands of China and of "competitive co-existence" generally. Although very much has been accomplished, Moscow now faces a serious dilemma, and it is important for the West to realize the depth and breadth of this crisis.

THE CRISIS FACING MOSCOW

For forty years the whole of Soviet policy has pursued two ostensible objectives, the attainment of communism at home and the extension of communism abroad. For more than half of this period, these objectives have served as little more than rationalizations for a policy which seeks a much more immediate end. The vast energies of the people have been concentrated on building up the power of the state. This has been the immediate end of the whole of Soviet foreign policy. Even the international communist movement, originally spawned to serve a distant external goal, has been systematically exploited at every critical juncture in the interests of a strong home for socialism, i.e., in the interests of an immediate internal goal.

2. In the service of this single god, ceaselessly expanding power, the state has not relied alone on draconic sanctions. It has also built up a system of positive indoctrination which it has made so pervasive that there is no area of life which is immune to its influence. But the important fact is not that it has exercised both control and persuasion, to a degree unparalleled in human history; the important fact is that, despite the diversion of the national energies to the immediate goal of power, the device of persuasion has remained the old rationale of a distant utopia at home and abroad. It is this device which has enabled the Soviet régime to play with remarkable skill on the inherited predispositions of the Russian people, and it is this rationale which informs the whole spirit of Soviet society.

3. Twenty years ago, the facts of life forced the Soviet régime to postpone the attainment of its ostensible goals indefinitely. Since then, it has become progressively aware that even its conception of the more immediate goal of national strength has been inadequate. It has struggled incessantly to define the levels at which it would attain the desired strength. Malenkov was the first to refer publicly to long-term planning in 1939. Stalin quickly reverted to this in 1946 when he set up several targets for 1960. After a further ten years of incredible sacrifice, and with several of the late dictator's goals already surpassed, the state has just been forced to admit that a twenty-year plan is now necessary. Phenomenal growth and a more realistic understanding of economics have merely made the immediate goal recede even more into the future.

4. The discrepancy between woolly aspiration and the concrete goals of Soviet policy, and the steady recession of the ultimate goal, is vital to an understanding of the crisis which now confronts the Soviet leadership. It is a crisis which has been born of this discrepancy and of this hope deferred. It has been increasingly manifesting itself throughout the last decade in the related problems of scarcity of resources and a deep popular weariness. Both of these problems are symptomatic of pressures which are working against the basic ends of the régime. The gravity of the crisis lies in the implications of these pressures not only for Soviet policy, but for the very ethos of Soviet society and the unity of the international communist movement.

5. Since 1945, the state has increasingly addressed itself to the containment of these pressures. In Soviet economic policy, the basic pre-occupation of daily administration, and indeed of many major planning decisions, has been uniformly the reduction of costs. Since Stalin, the direct object of the whole of Soviet initiative on the foreign scene has been the reduction of the cost of maintaining the status quo; and, since Stalin, the broader purpose of all domestic policy has been a concession to human fatigue to stimulate productivity. These concessions have proven gratifyingly easy to nervous successor régimes.

6. But a rise in productivity is only a step toward the same old ultimate goal of increasing material power. This is a god which has survived both Stalin and Malenkov and which is still sacred for Khrushchev and Bulganin. The only satisfactory concession which can be made by a state which promises the good life is to alter its investment policy in favour of the consumer. Only such a change will give solid justification for believing in the rationale which sustains the régime. But such a change will delay and reduce the growth of Soviet power. Such a change will deny its god.

7. For ten years the state has sought to conceal and to suppress the demand for this vital change. While the nation was still breathless in 1946, Stalin tried to anticipate its moods by setting goals for 1960. In the same year, he ordered the economists to prepare a theoretical text, ostensibly to explain the Soviet economy, but really to justify an investment policy which ignored the consumer. Gradually, two basic "laws" were worked out, the impact of which was precisely such a justification. Voznesensky voiced the popular demand, and paid for his temerity in a silent death. The inner dialogue of Stalin's wordy last will and testament, published on the eve of the XIX Party Congress, revolved around this basic demand and this basic policy. But the dying master had no such solution to bequeath to his successors as he had received from Lenin. In the hour of his death, he seems even to have been desperately preparing a purge to supplement persuasion. With his passing, the controversy broke out again, this time in the open, and lasted from the autumn of 1953 until January 1955. In the middle of this, the overdue text-book appeared. It contained two chapters on this issue, but, under Malenkov, the unpalatable implications for the Soviet consumer were literally presented in fine print. Finally, after a visit to Peking, Khrushchev and Bulganin formally squelched all public argument by re-affirming the priority of industry over the consumer.

8. But if the Stalinist god of power, of steadily increasing industrial production, has survived its prophet, so also has a popular demand to relax the bonds of its servitude. On an issue of truly basic significance, the CPSU has been on the defensive for ten years. De-Stalinization looks more and more like an hysterical appeal to support the essence of a Stalinist policy without a Stalin. Both successor régimes have tried stubbornly to postpone the dies irae but both have had to yield a little. Malenkov gave way in the direction of more consumer goods. Khrushchev and Bulganin have merely switched the retreat toward more housing and agriculture.

9. The Soviet leadership is under severe and continuous pressures which can be alleviated only by a major change in basic policy, and not by marginal concessions alone. These pressures are internal, and are present in the satellites as well as at home. The leadership must find the relative levels of industrial and consumer investment at which it can compromise with an increasingly educated, increasingly sceptical, and increasingly hungry and tired consumer. It may be relatively easy to define levels for a population which has never demanded very much. But the pressures forcing the leadership to cleave to the old Stalinist line are also increasing.

10. On the face of it, there would seem to be no serious internal obstacle which would prevent the régime from adjusting its investment policy in favour of the consumer. The Party would merely have to shift the emphasis in its propaganda from the growth of industrial output to a convincing rise in the standard of living. The payment of a long overdue bill would be thoroughly satisfactory to the masses and would almost certainly enhance their loyalty to the régime. The sincerity of the Party's claim that it is ultimately trying to improve the welfare of the masses would be demonstrated, its basic claim to popular support would be secured. It would still be possible to orient the whole nation toward a communist utopia, and it would be easy to rationalize the fact that further progress toward that end would simply be more balanced than in the past. A better life would do much to reduce the social indiscipline which has expressed itself in hooliganism, drunkenness and the black market. But it is not simply that Soviet planners do not understand either Keynsian economics or that a rise in consumption will lead to possibly greater expansion than has been achieved by favouring heavy industry. The Soviet leadership knows and mistrusts its people. It fears that the ordinary Russian, lacking the sense of property and the native instincts to save with which the capitalist societies are imbued, thinks of the good life rather than of the future. It knows that strict controls and persuasion are not enough to ensure growth, and that some measure of enforced austerity will be necessary to prevent the appetite for consumption from diverting national energies into pointless channels, instead of merely spilling over in a black market.

11. Operating midway between the internal and external forces, and partaking of both, is the pressure of the Soviet defence programme. This is not a post-war development. It began as long ago as 1928, and, although great progress had been made by 1941, the Second World War interrupted the rounding out of the air and naval elements, leaving the Soviet Union essentially a land power. The tasks of resuming this programme since 1945, of building air and naval elements, has been made enormously heavier by the need to add still further elements such as nuclear weapons and guided missiles, and, at the same time, to compete both qualitatively and quantitatively with American military power. The Soviet defence planner has patently not yet reached all the desired defensive goals. The threatened reduction of the rate of industrial growth is a matter for anxious concern.

12. The internal reasons for hesitating at this point to give the people a better life have always been there, and the demands of the defence programme are growing less in the sense that the U.S.S.R. has already achieved greater military power than she has ever had, and almost enough to protect her international position. In the context of defence, we are already looking outward, and it is abroad that the pressures forcing the leadership to cleave to the old Stalinist line are increasing. These originate within the Bloc, in the underdeveloped countries, and in the free capitalist West.

13. For about a decade, the Soviet Government has claimed that the purpose of communist policy in Eastern Europe has been the same as that in the U.S.S.R., the movement toward a better life. Here, however, just as at home, the real end of Soviet policy has been the building up of Soviet strength, and the satellite economies have been ruthlessly exploited for this purpose. While the Russian people have for many years been more patient with the discrepancy between proclaimed and real policy, it could not be expected that conquered foreign populations, which have experienced the same weariness as the Russians without being their own masters, would be equally patient. They have been the first to object decisively. Yugoslavia began the protest nearly ten years ago. Poland has firmly rejected the direction imposed on her efforts by Moscow without attempting to break out of an inescapable alliance, while Hungary has revolted. There are signs of a silent, almost conspiratorial movement in the same direction on the part of the Czech leadership. The barrenness and sterility of a Soviet policy which has concentrated on selfish ends, and which has relied on conquest and diktat has been exposed. The U.S.S.R. cannot keep unity and supremacy in the Bloc without resorting to diplomacy and without altering her whole policy of using the Bloc to augment Soviet strength. The emergency in Hungary has already cost her millions. The disorganization of the regional economy caused by the events of the past six months will cost her billions. And this is only the beginning. For ultimately, the only way to hold the Bloc is to offer a Soviet Marshall Plan. This Moscow has begun to do on a very small scale, but cannot continue on the scale required by the needs of the Satellites without further reducing her annual rate of growth. Already, Poland has had to seek foreign financial assistance to complete her industrialization plans and credits to tide her over the gap until the new industrialization begins to pay for itself. Already, the U.S.S.R. has withheld a quarter of a billion dollars promised to Yugoslavia, though for political as well as economic reasons. The capital charges on the Soviet economy in the short term are great. In the long term they are bound to be enormous.

14. China is the only member of the communist bloc which has not been arrantly exploited for narrow Soviet ends. In this case, the problem facing Moscow is to maintain the position of senior partner, and this means to continue to generate a relatively slender capital surplus for export to China, a further pressure operating against a decline in industrial production. But this is not all. Unlike Eastern Europe, China presents a long term threat of competition. Moscow must keep pace with the China that is yet to be. After seeing something of the human potential of China, Khrushchev in January 1954 openly advocated a policy of encouraging a higher birth rate. It is also after his return from China that he and Bulganin tried to squelch the demand for a basic change in Soviet policy by reaffirming the primary of heavy industry. It is significant that Moscow has encouraged China to look south-east, and has made a head-long rush to penetrate India first. It is not only to provide more food for his people that Khrushchev has begun the transfer of several million Russians to the new lands of Kazakhstan and Siberia. This area, thinly populated by non-Russian peoples, lies astride the rail-heads of the new transcontinental links with Peking. More than prestige within the Bloc is involved in the effort to keep ahead of China. And this effort is a further pressure against any decline in industrial growth.

15. Since 1952, the Soviet Union has been endeavouring to add material force to its drive to penetrate the under-developed areas of the world by extending credits for the purchase of capital goods. It is not only that the waning of the Western political position in these regions has offered an opening for Soviet influence; it is a fact that the markets in these regions are peculiarly tailored to the capacities of an economy which is characterized by steady industrial growth. Continued priority to industry has given the U.S.S.R. a slender capital surplus which she has been able to put to good use in these regions not only to accumulate prestige but also to trade for consumer raw materials. But the whole Soviet programme in these regions is predicated on a continuation of the Stalinist economic policy which favours industry not only in the U.S.S.R., but throughout Eastern Europe. For it is the satellites which have born about half of the weight of this programme, and virtually the full brunt, except for arms deals, in the Middle East. A decline in the rate of industrial growth within the U.S.S.R. and the satellites will entail serious humiliation for the whole Soviet position in the under-developed areas, including the Middle East, where recent developments have threatened the direct confrontation of Soviet and American ambitions.

16. At the bottom, a major reason the CPSU has been able to exploit the communist movement in the West in the interests of the Soviet Union has been the myth of the superiority of the Soviet economic and social system. Soviet propagandists have been increasingly embarrassed by the failure of the capitalist economies to show the expected cycles of boom and depression, and they have concentrated more and more on the continuous upward graph of the Soviet economy. A failure to continue to maintain this course will have serious effects on the primary of the U.S.S.R. in the international movement. Moscow must find an alternative formula to preserve not only her position but unity within the movement.

17. For ten years, the régime has tried to conceal and to suppress the demand for a major change in basic policy. Since Stalin's death, it has sought to substitute marginal concessions and increased incentives for such a change. While a remarkably patient population may make it relatively easy to find a compromise at home, it is the external pressures of an over-ambitious foreign policy which are growing too fast for a facile solution or a series of stop-gaps in place of a policy.

18. Here, then, is the dilemma and the crisis confronting Moscow in 1957. Communism has based its claim to the hearts of men on the promise of a richer life. But the movement has been exploited exclusively to augment the power of the U.S.S.R. Where Soviet power could be brought to bear, controls and sanctions have supplemented the ultimate promise to maintain unity in the pursuit of a more immediate goal. At greater distances, the unity of the movement has relied on the myth of the superiority of the Soviet system, and on the fact of the spectacularly increasing power of the U.S.S.R. On the assumption that this would continue, Moscow has perhaps prematurely staked its whole programme in the satellites and the under-developed areas. The continuous expansion of Soviet power is now threatened by the fatigue of the people at home and within the satellites, and by a growing scarcity of resources. Moscow must now accept retrenchment at a time when many pressures, which are chiefly external, demand further expansion. To fulfil its ultimate promise of the good life, Moscow must accept a slower rate of growth. If that rate of growth declines, the unity of the international communist movement, the supremacy of Moscow in that movement, and possibly the whole ethos of Soviet society, will be threatened — perhaps is already. Moreover, a foreign policy which has sought to augment the power of the U.S.S.R. by weakening the West at every opportunity must now recognize the increasing risk of global war inherent in obstruction, disruption and subversion. The essential poverty of Soviet thinking, especially in the international scene, has finally been exposed.

19. The piecemeal erosion of the essential Soviet position has begun. Already, on the eve of war in 1939, the definition of the Party was watered down from a militant alliance of the international proletariat to a combination of like-minded persons. But the process has gone on apace in conditions of peace. The Stalinist dictum that consumer demand must always exceed supply has been formally jettisoned. Investment policy has been softened by both Malenkov and Khrushchev. In the abolition of the terror, the myth of the internal enemy has been publicly abandoned, though it may be revived. War is no longer inevitable. The goal of catching up with the West has officially receded. The drive to expand trade speaks less of autarchy and more of the international division of labour, and the structure of imports has altered in favour of the consumer. Two Party plena, assembled in a time of international crisis, have spoken only of internal problems, and have prescribed a drastic reorganization to stimulate production. The further de-centralization of the economy, if successful, will substitute territorial monopolies or cartels in the provinces for socialist ministries in Moscow. In this re-organization, there is a humiliating absurdity; for, in its effort to maintain expansion, the shape of the socialist system is forced more and more to come to resemble that of the capitalist system. Finally, in the face of these pressures, the Party has failed for twenty years to formulate a long over-due master programme. Khrushchev is given a formula for Bloc unity in foreign policy not by his ideologists but by Peking; and Warsaw, if it goes the whole way in abandoning collectivization and inviting Western capital to its bosom, threatens to reject a principle commandment of Marx and to undo the Soviet work of a decade.

20. In the West, we should try to analyze these changes in terms of the evolution which was dimly foreseen in the policy of containment. We must recognize the depth and breadth of the crisis which confronts the communist world in 1957. We must also decide whether to lift our sights beyond a conservative goal of holding Soviet power in check to something more positive, whether in fact to expedite the processes within the communist world by propaganda and negotiation. We must also take careful thought how to avoid frightening a leadership which, in an hour of agonizing re-appraisal, and humiliation, enjoys more real power than it has ever had. For the great magnitude of its achievement has engendered tremendous pride. Moscow feels no need to admit failure in the past; she can expect her power to continue to grow; but it is merely a decline in the rate of that growth which is going to cause distress.

CZECHOSLOVAK TRADE REPRESENTATION IN CANADA: "OMNITRADE"

An interdepartmental meeting was held on March 8, 1956, to discuss the Soviet request for a trade office in Vancouver, and the Czechoslovak trading company Omnitrade in Montreal. Representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Justice, Citizenship and Immigration, Finance, the Secretary of State, and of the R.C.M.Police attended, as did representatives of the several interested Divisions of this Department. The meeting's recommendation on the Soviet request will be put up to you shortly by Economic Division in the form of a draft memorandum to Cabinet.[104] The purpose of this memorandum is to seek your approval of the recommendation on Omnitrade.

2. Omnitrade, a subsidiary of a large Czech concern, was incorporated in Canada in May 1947 under federal law as an import-export company. After the communists seized control of the Czech Government in February 1948, they took over the parent company of Omnitrade. From information in the possession of the RCMP it is clear that in 1949 Omnitrade was used by the Czech authorities not only as a commercial organization but as an instrument to further their interest in other fields. For example, the manager of Omnitrade was advised to use the Czech diplomatic bag for forwarding certain information to Prague, and he was ordered to send a sum of money to the Czech Foreign Minister who was then in New York.

3. Between 1950 and 1954 Omnitrade was more or less dormant. Czech interest in it was renewed late in 1954, however, and by the end of 1955 we had received five applications for non-immigrant visas from Czechs who said they were going to work for the company in various capacities ranging from president to technician. Three of these applicants were granted visas and two of them have actually arrived in Canada. The remaining two applications have been held up pending an investigation of the company. One of these pending applications is that of the president, Ladislav Pospisil.

4. It was the opinion of the meeting that Omnitrade is quite likely to engage in espionage and other improper activities. It was considered, however, that if it were closed down, the only result would be an equivalent expansion of the Czech Consulate General in Montreal and the development of the same activities under consular immunity. Consequently, it was thought that provided certain conditions were laid down Omnitrade was the least dangerous form for Czech commercial representation to take.

5. Mr. Smith, representing Citizenship and Immigration, explained that his Department would be prepared to issue non-immigrant visas valid for one year but subject to renewal to Czech nationals who wished to come to Canada to work for Omnitrade. As they would be expected to stay here over a year, they would have to be able to meet our health requirements before the visas were issued, but our stage B requirements would be waived in these cases.

6. It was recommended, therefore, subject to your approval, that Mr. Ford call in Mr. Hruska, the Czech Minister, and inform him that we would be ready to facilitate the issuance of non-immigrant visas to the Czech staff of Omnitrade, provided that the following conditions were met:

(a) the Czech Legation should provide us with a list of the present staff of Omnitrade in this country, whether Czech, Canadian or other nationality, and advise us subsequently of any changes;

(b) Omnitrade should employ only three Czech nationals — if training in Czechoslovakia is necessary, then Canadian employees could be trained there — if they wish Ladislav Pospisil to come here, and if there are already three Czechs on the staff, then one should be withdrawn to make room for him;

(c) Omnitrade should continue to hold a federal charter and submit the required information annually to the Secretary of State Department; and

(d) Omnitrade should operate on ordinary commercial premises in Montreal (clearly separate from those of the Czech Consulate-General) so that all concerned would understand that it enjoyed no consular immunities or privileges.

7. We also recommend for your consideration, if you agree to Mr. Hruska being spoken to on these lines, that Mr. Ford should take the opportunity of telling him how dissatisfied we are with the unfriendly treatment accorded our staff in Prague by the Czech authorities.[105] A further memorandum† is being prepared in this Division, and will be sent to you shortly, listing our grievances on this score.

Note du chef de la Direction européenne pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, European Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], May 25, 1956

RELATIONS WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA

In accordance with instructions, I called in the Czech Minister yesterday in order to speak to him about the following matters:

(a) Omnitrade—I handed Mr. Hruska the attached aide-mémoire concerning the conditions under which we were prepared to authorize the functioning of the office of Omnitrade in Montreal. He seemed very pleased that a decision had been taken on this subject, raising a query only about the limitation on the number of Czech nationals. I told him that this meant three Czech nationals all told and that it was up to his government to decide which ones they wished to send. Specifically I told him that they would have to decide between the three gentlemen now waiting in Prague for visas and Mr. Bohm and Mr. Hebr now in Montreal officially attached to the Consulate. I repeated this provision several times, but I am still not entirely sure that he understood. The aide-mémoire is perfectly clear on this point and I think there can be no question of misinterpretation. I added that as soon as we received the official Czech concurrence with our note, together with an indication of the Czech nationals they wish to assign to Omnitrade, we would issue the requisite visas.

(b) Invitation of the Canadian Wheat Board—I then gave Mr. Hruska an aide-mémoire† extending an invitation to send a delegation to Canada this summer as guests of the Canadian Wheat Board in order to study Canadian wheat handling methods. A copy is attached. Mr. Hruska seemed overjoyed with this invitation and said that he was certain his government would be delighted to accept it.

(c) Treatment of the Canadian Legation in Prague — I told Mr. Hruska that in return for our co-operation here we hoped that the Czech authorities could facilitate the work of our Legation in Prague. I mentioned in particular the difficulties our Chargé d'Affaires had in securing local help, citing the case of an interpreter. Mr. Hruska expressed some astonishment but promised to draw this to the attention of his Ministry.

2. I mentioned also the difficulties in securing adequate office space and asked him if he could not impress on his government the need to do something for us. He replied that the situation was extremely difficult in Prague and that he would also mention this to his Ministry. I said that I knew the situation was tight but that all we wanted was to be treated on a non-discriminatory basis since we understood that some other missions had been given better treatment.

[105] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

3. I drew Mr. Hruska's attention to the inconvenience caused to our staff in Czechoslovakia of having to apply every time they left and returned to Prague for exit and re-entry visas, whereas here, he and his staff were given multiple entry visas. Again he promised to look into this and then went on to mention that he would be grateful if we could settle the question of the status of the staff of the Commercial Attaché's office in Montreal. One or two of them wish to go to Czechoslovakia or the United States on vacation and he hesitated to ask for the passports back until their status had been clarified. I promised to look into this, but possibly Consular Division could talk to the appropriate officer in the Czech Legation requesting details of the individuals concerned.

4. Finally I mentioned the question of close surveillance of our staff in Prague, citing the example of Mr. Summers' tour of Czechoslovakia last summer which had been organized in consultation with the Czech Foreign Ministry, and during which he was subjected to most inconvenient police surveillance. Mr. Hruska immediately replied by saying that this was in fact a question that he had often thought of raising himself with us since he is subject to police surveillance here. He said, however, that he had decided in the interests of good relations not to mention it, and he would not like to follow it up now. When I pressed him for details of what exactly he objected to he simply laughed and said that he would not submit a complaint but he wished us simply to know that if we objected to the surveillance of Mr. Summers, he was subjected to the same kind of treatment here. I did not argue with him about this.

Aide-Mémoire

Ottawa, May 24, 1956

The Canadian Government has given careful consideration to the Czechoslovak request for visas for Czechoslovak nationals wishing to work in an office of Omnitrade Limited in Montreal. The Canadian Government is willing to facilitate the issuance of non-immigrant visas to the Czechoslovak staff of Omnitrade, subject to the following conditions:

(a) the Czechoslovak Legation should provide the Department of External Affairs with a list of the present staff of Omnitrade in Canada, whether of Czechoslovak, Canadian or other nationality, and should advise the Department subsequently of any changes.

(b) Omnitrade should employ only three Czechoslovak nationals.

(c) Omnitrade should continue to hold a Canadian Federal charter and submit the required information annually to the Department of the Secretary of State.

(d) Omnitrade should operate on ordinary commercial premises in Montreal, and should be completely separated from the Czechoslovak Consulate-General.

RELATIONS WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIA

You will remember that the final paragraph of Mr. Ford's memorandum under reference, giving an account of Mr. Ford's conversation with the Czech Minister on May 24, touched on the question of the close surveillance exercised by the Czech police on the staff of our Legation in Prague. Mr. Ford having mentioned this, Mr. Hruska "immediately replied by saying that this was in fact a question that he had often thought of raising himself with us since he is subject to police surveillance here".

2. As it was my understanding that the R.C.M.P. do not maintain any surveillance of the Czech Legation in Ottawa, I sent a copy of Mr. Ford's memorandum to the Special Branch with a request for their comments of this remark of Mr. Hruska's. The Special Branch replied on June 8 that they had had no occasion to maintain surveillance of Mr. Hruska since his arrival in the country. If Mr. Hruska is in fact being followed, I can only suggest that his followers are either members of his own staff, or else possibly agents of Czech nationalist organizations in Canada.

3. I wrote again to the Special Branch on June 13 asking if they would have any objection to our telling Mr. Hruska, when a convenient opportunity next presented itself, that he was not under surveillance by the Canadian authorities and never had been. It was my thought that, if Mr. Hruska has been reporting to Prague that he is under surveillance here, the surveillance on our people there is intended at least partly as retaliation. If this were so, then anything we could do to convince Mr. Hruska that he is not being followed by the Canadian police would help to ease the position of our people in Prague.

4. The Special Branch have now replied that they have no objection to our informing Mr. Hruska that we have found no evidence to substantiate his remark. I must add that the Special Branch doubt that such a denial of his allegations would serve any useful purpose. From their knowledge of security services in general, and of the objectives of surveillance in particular, the Special Branch doubt that there is any relationship between any report which Mr. Hruska may have made to Prague and the surveillance of Canadian staff there.

5. A copy of this memorandum is going to Mr. Ford. I leave it to him to decide whether or not to speak to Mr. Hruska along the lines suggested. If he does so, the R.C.M.P. of course should not be mentioned by name, or brought into the discussion even indirectly.

Memorandum from Head, European Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], August 30, 1956

CZECHOSLOVAK CONSULATE-GENERAL AND OMNITRADE

The Czechoslovak Minister recently called on me to discuss the Omnitrade office in Montreal. You will recall that we allowed the Czechoslovaks to re-establish the Omnitrade office subject to several conditions, one of which was that the staff should include only three Czechoslovak nationals. Mr. Hruska told me that it would be impossible for Omnitrade to function with only three Czechoslovak nationals since the main purpose of the Company was to introduce a large line of technical manufactured goods to the Canadian market. They hoped to do this by securing Canadian agents who would handle the goods, but they needed personnel thoroughly conversant with the goods in question, and furthermore, they needed to have spare parts and stocks held by the Company in Montreal. For this they would need at least six Czechoslovak nationals. Mr. Hruska pointed out that the large imbalance in Czechoslovak-Canadian trade in favour of Canada could not continue indefinitely, and that Czechoslovakia had a legitimate need to promote the sale of goods in Canada.

2. Since Omnitrade is only beginning to operate, we can not easily decide whether the volume of trade which it will be handling really necessitates an increase in its staff. In particular, it is impossible for us to tell whether Omnitrade needs three additional Czechoslovaks, or whether it could instead use Canadians, sending them to Czechoslovakia for a short course if necessary. Since the Czechoslovaks wish to sell a variety of manufactured goods in Canada, while we sell principally a single staple product, wheat, in Czechoslovakia, it seems reasonable that they would need a larger staff, either in the Consulate-General or Omnitrade, to promote their trade here than we would need in Czechoslovakia.

3. On the other hand, the size of the Czechoslovak diplomatic and consular staffs in Canada is already becoming excessively high. At the moment there are 55 Czechoslovak nationals attached to the Legation and Consulate-General in Montreal of whom 5 officers, 4 employees and 8 wives are with the former and 4 officers, 16 employees and 18 wives with the latter. (Of the 16 employees attached to the Consulate-General, two are awaiting transfer to "Omnitrade"). By way of contrast, in Czechoslovakia we have only 14 Canadian citizens at our Legation, consisting of 4 officers, 6 employees and 4 wives. Also, by way of contrast, it will be seen from the following table that Czechoslovak representation here is much larger than that of other countries with which our contacts are comparable:

COUNTRY	DIPLOMATIC Officers (excluding Canadians)	DIPLOMATIC Employees (excluding Canadians)	CONSULAR Officers (excluding Canadians)	CONSULAR Employees (excluding Canadians)	TOTAL
Brazil	5	5	3	2	15
Greece	3	4	1	0	8
Mexico	3	1	3	4	11
Poland	4	15	1	2	22
Sweden	6	2	1	4	13
Venezuela	3	4	6	2	15
Yugoslavia	3	7	1	1	12
Czechoslovakia	5	4	4	16	29

4. We have some evidence that members of the Czechoslovak Legation and Consulate, and of Omnitrade in its previous existence, have engaged in intelligence activities. As Czechoslovak representation is enlarged the resources of the R.C.M.P. are increasingly strained and the effectiveness of our counter-intelligence reduced. Moreover, it is more difficult for the RCMP to keep track of the Czechs since, unlike the Russians, they are not required to notify us of their travels. A further increase in the Omnitrade Staff would make the task of the RCMP (SB) even more difficult, although as the Omnitrade files would be subject to seizure and its members could more easily be arrested the Omnitrade staff might find intelligence activities more dangerous.

5. I wonder whether it might be possible to tie together the questions of limiting the staff of the Czechoslovak Consulate-General and of permitting an increase in the size of Omnitrade. We could suggest to Mr. Hruska that we might be prepared to allow an increase in the Omnitrade staff, but we hesitate to do so while the staff of the Consulate-General is so large. Although having four officers at the latter seems reasonable enough, we do not understand why it could not function with six or eight rather than sixteen Czechoslovak employees as at present. If the total number of Czechoslovaks (officers and employees) in the Consulate were to be reduced to ten or twelve over the next few months, we would be prepared to consider granting visas to a total of six persons to join Omnitrade. To avoid any argument as to whether or not we have the right under international law to limit the size of the Czechoslovak Consulate-General, this suggestion might be put to Mr. Hruska as an informal bargain: if the staff of the Consulate-General were reduced, we would permit an increase in the staff of Omnitrade.

6. I think it would be advisable to phrase the bargain simply in terms of a reduction in the Consulate-General versus an increase in Omnitrade, leaving to one side the question of the size of the Legation's staff. Since the latter is similar in size to our own Legation staff in Prague and since we will shortly be increasing ours by adding security guards, we could hardly criticize its present establishment per se. Lest Mr. Hruska simply suggest the transfer of the excess clerks from the Consulate-General to the Legation, however, we should point out that we are worried about the total size of the Czechoslovak establishment in Canada, since we are afraid that it may attract unfavourable popular criticism, with unfortunate consequences for Czechoslovak-Canadian relations. Accordingly we would not regard the transfer of the surplus clerks from Montreal to Ottawa as a suitable quid pro quo for our giving permission for an increase in the Omnitrade staff.

7. I should appreciate your views on this suggestion. If you agree, I could call in Mr. Hruska to put the proposal to him.

8. Consular, Economic, Protocol and D.L. 2 Divisions and the RCMP (SB) have given their approval to the approach suggested in this memorandum.[106]

Memorandum from Head, European Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], October 1, 1956

CZECHOSLOVAK CONSULATE-GENERAL AND OMNITRADE

In my memorandum under reference (flagged on attached file), I recommended that we tell the Czech Minister that we would be prepared to grant visas to six Omnitrade officials, rather than the three we originally set as our maximum, but only on condition that the Czech Consulate-General in Montreal reduce the size of its staff. You suggested that this proposal be again examined by members of this Department, the Department of Trade & Commerce, the Department of Citizenship & Immigration and the RCMP (Special Branch), with particular reference to the possibilities of increasing Czech sales in Canada and the legitimacy of the Czech desire to maintain substantial commercial representation in this country to promote sales and service its exports.

2. In the view of the Department of Trade & Commerce, Canadian exports to Czechoslovakia are likely to consist almost entirely of wheat in the foreseeable future. Czech wheat purchases will be governed by Czech needs and the availability of suitable grades of Canadian wheat, and not substantially by the volume of sales which the Czechs are likely to make in Canada.[107] We cannot accept the argument that they must balance their trade with us, and Trade & Commerce do not think that a fairly tough policy on the size of Czech representation in Montreal is likely to affect their trade prospects.[108]

3. For the kinds of goods they are now selling or are likely to sell in the Canadian market, they would seem to need not additional technical personnel (Mr. Hruska's argument) but sales promotional personnel. They can meet their requirements by shifting personnel within their organization in Canada, by employing the services of Canadian firms and/or by sending their "businessmen" to Canada on brief visits to effect specific sales or specific servicing jobs.

4. In sum, there is no objection from Trade & Commerce to setting a limit, even below the present size, on Czech representation in Montreal, and there are good security grounds, as well as some political grounds, for so doing.

[106] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
It occurs to me that there might be disadvantages in a policy which might encourage the Czechs to employ Canadians. The right kind of Canadians might not want to work for a Communist Government and the wrong kind of Canadian might be as dangerous as a Czech in such a position. A loyal Canadian might find himself intimidated — unless, of course, the R.C.M.P. wanted to put forward some of their own candidates for employment. J.W. H[olmes]

5. I recommend, therefore, that we call in the Czech Minister without delay to give him our decision. I attach, for your consideration, a draft note which might be handed to Mr. Hruska setting forth the terms under which we shall allow Omnitrade to operate in this country, and also our views on the total size of the Czech establishment in Canada.

6. In handing the note to Mr. Hruska, we should draw his attention to the fact that we have met his request on the matter of Omnitrade, even to the point of acceding to his request that the maximum number of Czech nationals be increased from the three which we had originally set to the six which he later requested, (although admittedly we are reducing his Consulate-General's staff by three as a consequence). I would propose that we also draw his attention orally to what we consider the excessive size of Czech consular representation in Canada in comparison with the consular representation of countries having much more consular business and much more extensive trade. (You will see from the attached table† that the Czechs now have 29 officers and employees in Canada. If they appoint 6 people to Omnitrade and keep the present 9 at the Legation, they can still have 7 at the Consulate-General, which seems plenty for legitimate business).

7. If he comes back to the argument that the Czechs need more people to promote and service sales in Canada, we should tell him that we welcome an increase in trade but that, for the type of trade which is likely to develop, we do not see the need for extensive sales and technical personnel. Sales promotional work can be done by a small staff and by engaging the services of Canadian sales agents. We are quite prepared to be as forthcoming as possible in granting visitors' visas for visits of Czech salesmen and technical people as long as the legitimacy of their visit in terms of trade is established.

8. In connection with the limitation of the size of the total Czech establishment in Canada, I think it would be desirable to draw Mr. Hruska's attention to the fact that Czech representation here exceeds their representation in the United States.[109] We can remind him that the size of the Czech staff, as well as that of the Soviet and Polish staffs, is drawing some unfavourable public attention in Canada, and a large staff is not conducive to better relations between Canada and Czechoslovakia.

9. This memorandum has been seen in draft by Protocol, Economic and Defence Liaison (2) Divisions and concurred in by them. May I have your approval for the course of action which I have outlined.[110]

Draft Aide Mémoire

Ottawa, October 1, 1956

In elaboration of its aide-mémoire of May 24, the Canadian Government is willing to facilitate the issuance of non-immigrant visas, subject to the usual immigration requirements, to the Czechoslovak staff of Omnitrade, subject to the following conditions:

(a) The Czechoslovak Legation should provide the Department of External Affairs with a list of the present staff of Omnitrade in Canada, whether of Czechoslovak, Canadian or other nationality, and should advise the Department subsequently of any changes.

(b) Omnitrade should continue to hold a Canadian Federal charter and submit the required information annually to the Department of the Secretary of State.

(c) Omnitrade should operate on ordinary commercial premises in Montreal, and should be completely separated from the Czechoslovak Consulate-General.

(d) Inasmuch as Omnitrade will operate as a private company, members of the staff of Omnitrade will, of course, not be entitled to any diplomatic or consular privileges or immunities, nor will the offices of Omnitrade.

(e) Omnitrade should employ a maximum of six Czechoslovak nationals, to be chosen by the Czechoslovak Government, the total of six to be inclusive of any personnel already at the Czechoslovak Legation or the Consulate-General who might be transferred to Omnitrade.

(f) In view of the fact that the Canadian Government originally agreed to only three Czech nationals to be employed by Omnitrade, the additional three visas will be granted on condition that the staff of the Czechoslovak Consulate-General in Montreal be immediately reduced by three Czechoslovak nationals, i.e., that the additional three are replacements for three Czechoslovak nationals now serving with the Consulate-General.

(g) By March 1, 1957 the total of Czechoslovak representation in Canada (that is, all Czechoslovak personnel of the Legation, Consulate-General and Omnitrade) must be reduced to twenty-two officers and employees of Czechoslovak nationality in order that it may be more in balance with the size of representation of other countries with comparable interests in Canada. These representatives may be distributed amongst the Legation, the Consulate-General and Omnitrade as best suits the convenience of the Czechoslovak Government. If at a later date the Czechoslovak Government wishes to increase the size of Omnitrade beyond six, there would be no objection providing the Canadian Government were notified of this intention and providing that the staff of either the Legation or the Consulate-General were reduced so that the total figure of Czech representatives in Canada did not exceed twenty-two. If Czechoslovak nationals are transferred from the Legation or the Consulate-General to Omnitrade, they thereupon cease to enjoy diplomatic or consular privileges or immunities.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre du Commerce

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 18, 1956

In your letter of November 22† you requested a report on the complaint by Czechoslovakian officials over delay in granting visas for Omnitrade employees, commercial visitors and Legation staff to visit Canada.

As you undoubtedly know, the position with respect to Omnitrade employees and Czech diplomatic personnel has been under review for many months in order to determine what appropriate steps might be taken to keep the number of persons entering Canada for Omnitrade or diplomatic purposes proportionate with our commercial and political relations with Czechoslovakia. It was agreed at an interdepartmental meeting on September 13 which was attended by Mr. Hall of your Department, that an aide-mémoire be sent the Czech Legation defining the requirements which must be met by Omnitrade to ensure that its functions remain purely commercial. This aide-mémoire was handed to the Czech chargé on October 31 with oral comments to the effect that:

(a) The Czech Legation in Canada is, in our opinion, too large,

(b) the Czech Consulate General in Montreal, one of the largest in Canada, is also out of keeping with the relations between our countries,

(c) the simple transfer of Consulate General staff to the Legation will not be adequate.

For our part, the aide-mémoire agreed that if the conditions for Omnitrade and the points relating to diplomatic personnel were abided by, and if all the many previously submitted outstanding visa applications for persons in these categories were withdrawn and a limited number of them resubmitted in accordance with these conditions, the Canadian Government would attempt to process these new applications with despatch.

So far, no reply has been received from the Czech Legation, nor have the outstanding applications been renewed. For the moment, therefore, we consider that everything practical and in line with the interdepartmental decision has been done and that as far as Omnitrade and diplomatic personnel are concerned, the issue now rests entirely with the Czechs.

The problem of delays in approving applications for Czechoslovakian commercial visitors is a somewhat different one and we recognize that it has not been handled entirely satisfactorily. Partly because it is a relatively new field there remain difficulties to be solved in the interdepartmental administrative arrangements, and the necessity for ensuring that security regulations are fully complied with makes this category of visa applications a more difficult one to be handled. However, an interdepartmental meeting was held on Friday, December 7, at which Mr. F.P. Weiser and Mr. G.S. Hall of your Department attended, to consider what measures are required to simplify the visa procedure while maintaining necessary precautions to prevent any abuse of visas issued for legitimate commercial visits.

In the past there have been occasional delays which might have been avoided. Frequently such delays have been caused by inadequate information being provided in the original application. It just happens that a high proportion of these delays has involved Czech applications. This has made it necessary to ask our Legation in Prague for additional details, a time consuming process. You will be interested in learning I think that the total backlog of long outstanding cases has now been virtually wiped out, and that at the interdepartmental meeting on Friday administrative changes were agreed upon which should eliminate much of the delay attributable to the processing of applications in Ottawa. In addition, the R.C.M.P. have reported that it has now become possible for them to provide security clearances more speedily than in the past. (It has been noticeable from our Department that this has, in fact, been the case recently). Thus, one of the major causes for slow handling will have been removed.

While administrative delay has been the principal reason for the Czech complaint, many of the difficulties encountered have been the fault of the Czechs themselves; to the extent that we have been responsible, however, we do wish to apply ourselves and we think that a marked improvement should be evident in the very near future and that delays will be reduced to a minimum.

I hope that this letter will provide you with an up to date picture of the situation to which both the Czechs and our Legation have referred. I hope you will agree that the situation while serious has not warranted the criticism which the Czechs have levelled, and that for our part the Canadian departments concerned in these matters are moving towards a satisfactory solution of local problems. If there is additional information which will be useful to you, I will be very glad to provide it.

I would also like to thank you for your comments regarding probable Czech intentions as to the impending payments due for wheat credits granted them last year; I am sure this information will be of considerable interest to officials in this Department.

VISAS FOR CZECH LEGATION AND OMNITRADE

You will recall that, on October 31, we handed to the Czechoslovak Minister in Ottawa an aide-mémoire (flagged on attached file) setting forth the conditions under which we were prepared to allow the Czechs to establish an office of their state trading agency Omnitrade in Montreal.

2. At the same time, we told Mr. Hruska orally that we considered the total Czech establishment more than large enough. We suggested that he present us with a consolidated list of the staff he would like to have at the Legation, the Consulate-General in Montreal, and Omnitrade — bearing in mind our conditions — so that we could process the several applications for visas which have been held up at our Legation in Prague pending a satisfactory overall arrangement.

3. That list† has now been presented to us. A copy of the covering note† from the Czech Legation, the list, and a letter† concerning Omnitrade are attached to this note. You will see from the draft reply† that the Czechs have not complied with either our written or our verbal conditions and are in fact proposing a net addition of six to their present establishment. The net additions are marked with an asterisk on the list.

4. If you agree with the draft note in reply, I would suggest that I call Mr. Hruska in to discuss the matter. I could start off by thanking him and the Czech Government for the expeditious and satisfactory solution found for the Jakubec case, and expressing the hope that, on purely humanitarian grounds, there would be no difficulty in obtaining exit permits for the children now that the parents had left Czechoslovakia.[111] I could then refer to the matter of the outstanding visa application for Omnitrade and Legation officials. In handing him the note in reply to his note of December 28, I would explain that it is up to him and the Czech authorities to revise their establishment in order to comply with our conditions.

[111] Pour un compte rendu complet des problèmes de M. Jakubec avec le gouvernement de la Tchéchoslovaquie, voir The Province, Vancouver, August 23, 1958.
For a complete account of Jakubec' difficulties with the Czechoslovak Government, see The Province, Vancouver, August 23, 1958.

It is worth nothing, for purposes of comparison, that we have a total of only ten Canadians employed at our Legation in Prague.

5. One point which we should keep in mind is that we may, within the next month or so, be seeking visas for security guards. It is conceivable that we shall run into difficulties on this count because of our insistence on holding the line on the Czech establishment here. Nevertheless, it would be best in my opinion, considering the already long delay in finding a solution to the Omnitrade problem, to press ahead and give the Czechs the attached note. This would at least help to remove the suspicion that we are deliberately stalling by means of administrative delay. It would be most unwise on all counts to retreat from the position we took last October — that the Czech establishment of thirty is more than large enough for their legitimate business — and we should therefore not accede to a request which would give them an establishment of thirty-six. But I think we should state our case frankly and without delays. If they should create any difficulties over visas for security guards, we should fight that case on its merits. We would be on comparatively good ground, considering that our establishment in Prague is so much smaller than the Czech one here.

6. May I have your approval, please, for my proposed course of action.

DESPATCH NO. 200 Warsaw, April 18, 1956

EFFECTS OF TWENTIETH CPSU CONGRESS IN POLAND

The new orientation given to Party policy and practices at the Moscow Congress has produced a flood of self-examination, confessions, criticism, calls for change — and a large amount of confusion as well — in Party and Government circles, and among the intelligentsia in Poland during the last six weeks. Those who felt guilty of having indulged in the cult of personality — including the First Secretary of the Central Committee — expressed regret and promised to amend their ways — that is, those who were powerful enough to escape being sacrificed as scape-goats — while those who had genuinely suffered from the previous state of affairs lashed accusations at everybody and everything, including, in some instances, the Party.

2. It is worth noting that the Poles have not yet attacked one of their leading men — whether dead or alive — for having built up a personality cult for himself. The most convenient one would be Beirut, but judging from the tributes which continue to be paid to his memory in the press it is not likely that he is slated for "de-sanctification". In any case, Beirut's personality, a rather plain and colourless one, would not lend itself too much to a serious accusation of this sort.

3. As time goes by, however, one realizes that the whirlpool of confessions and accusations has been pretty much confined to the upper crust of Polish Communist society, and if one asks the man in the street whether he has hopes that things will change now his sullen look and negative head-shaking makes it clear that the people have remained aloof and consider all this Moscow-patterned agitation with a sceptical eye.

4. There are rumours that the rulers of the country will allow a greater degree of Parliamentary democracy, but so far this has only amounted in practice to urging members of the Sejm to have more meetings and debates. An article in Trybuna Ludu on March 12 accused the Sejm of not implementing its tasks "as an authoritative body through which, according to Article 2 of the P.P.R. Constitution, "the working people wield State authority". It went on to state that the Sejm was the "supreme body" in the country, and asserted that a Sejm which is functioning properly "will be the essential factor which will introduce democracy in our life and will help improve and accelerate the socialist construction in our country".

It is true that Ochab, the new Communist boss, has not shown a very strong hand yet, but it is most doubtful that the Party would agree to relinquish some of his dictatorial control in favour of a legislative body which might grow ambitious and threaten those in power. Socialism has hardly taken hold in this country, and it would indeed be risky to leave its future promotion in the care of the Sejm. As a matter of fact, a member of the Politburo and Vice-Marshal of the Sejm stated recently that the present political structure in Poland "ensured to the masses more participation in ruling the country than the so-called Parliamentary system."

5. It may be of interest here to review the points of discontent which have been voiced chiefly through the press. The death-knell of Stalin's cult was sounded in Poland in an editorial in Trybuna Ludu on March 10. (My Despatch 133 of 13 March†). This was followed by an article by Morawski, a Secretary of the Central Committee, published on March 26 in which he drew the lessons of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. for Poland. The article was along the lines of the Trybuna Ludu editorial, but emphasized particularly the justification for a "Polish path to socialism". Similar considerations, duly enlarged upon, were formulated by Ochab in his speech of April 6. (My despatch No. 187, 9 April†).

6. The degrading of Stalin was not accepted without reluctance, of course, particularly among the young Communists. Bitter letters appeared in the press which veteran Party journalists did their best to answer. Pro Prostu (In Plain Words), a students' newspaper, carried a letter entitled "Am I a Flag Flying in the Wind?" in which the writer took issue with the Trybuna Ludu editorial of March 10. A member of the Communist Youth (ZMP), he had believed in Stalin and defended him against many of his friends, and now he was subjected to their scorn and sarcasms. Other articles such as "We are Craving for the Truth" and "Where is the Truth?" showed how confused and sometimes irritated some members of the Party were. So far, no very convincing answer has been given, and the Communists are still smarting under the blow.

7. Prime Minister Cyrankiewicz himself joined in the display of apparent liberalism in a speech to the Conference of Architects held in Warsaw on March 27. On this occasion he gave a sort of go-ahead to creative artists in seeking new freedom, although it must still be a "socialist" freedom. He said he stood for "the dynamics of modern, socialist building with the most essential qualities of Polish tradition". "I wish to emphasize once more," he added, "that neither the Party leadership nor the Government desires to lead Polish architecture by the hand". He then blamed the "omnipotence of Stalin" who had "usurped the role belonging to the nation, the role belonging to the Party", for the distortions of the last twenty years.

8. Architecture is a particularly sore spot with the Poles who cannot forgive the imposition of the alien Palace of Culture on the otherwise soft classical Warsaw skyline, and the erection under Party directives, of entire new districts which are a failure from the standpoint of both aesthetics and functionalism. At the same Conference the Chief Architect of Warsaw confessed having erred in basing the reconstruction of the modern part of the city on directives "from the top". "I have applied these methods because I thought them correct, that I was thus helping the cause of building Warsaw. Now I see that this method was not only incorrect but also that its application was quite unnecessary. Do I clearly perceive the causes, results, and a new path for the future? No, I do not. But one thing I know for certain — that the methods were bad, that they harmed not only our construction work but that they also broke men, their sincerity, selflessness, the boldness of their revolutionary progressive thought, their desire to criticize and help in finding the right path".

9. One of those who attended the Nineteenth Session of the Council of Culture and Art in the last week of March threw the ball at the Palace of Culture with a "strike one" against the Russians. "We should not build such elephantine giraffe-like constructions as the Palace of Culture and Science which is a caricature, and not socialist art. We all know that, and everybody thinks so now". His words were printed in the cultural weekly Przeglad Kulturalny.

10. At the same session, one Professor Kott referred to "the process of the dying ideology and literature, which ensued after 1949 and which so strongly and painfully affected our creative centres". He praised the attempts made in recent times by a few writers such as poet Adam Wazyk who "fought for the liberty of expressing their own thought" and pointed out that "in this process of revival, certainly not devoid of mistakes, but in its basic line creative and refreshing, we have not received aid nor encouragement from the Party leadership". Another speaker recalled that the former editor of Nowa Kultura was "swept out of office" for allowing Wasyk's "Poem for Adults" to be printed in the review; he called for the editor's reinstatement. As far as is known, this has not been done, but new poems in the same vein as "Poem for Adults" have appeared under Wasyk's signature in Nowa Kultura lately. I attach translations† of some of them hereto.

11. The meeting reached the conclusion that the cultural policy of the Party had interfered in creative activity by sanctioning only work which was of assistance in reaching its goals. It was imperative that the artist be granted freedom to depict reality around him and be given complete confidence. More recently a writer asserted in the Cultural Review that "the submission of culture to political directives is justified only in moments of great upheaval but is fatal under normal conditions". He claimed that "for the future of socialist culture the scientist must not be allowed to submit to anybody in his thinking, whether the Committee, the Minister, the Emperor or the Lord".

12. Along with those critical appraisals of the status of fine arts and literature, several attacks were made in the press against various agencies, either for doing nothing or doing things wrongly. Vigorous denunciations of the Ministry of Justice and the security apparatus have appeared, together with demands for the liberation and rehabilitation of the large number of people who have been unjustly thrown into prison. This, the students' paper asked, should be done more rapidly, with proper clearance of unfounded criminal records and in a public manner, so that their honour be restored to the people involved. An appeal was made particularly in favour of the former soldiers of the Home Army, (A.K.) the London Government underground army which staged the Warsaw uprising in 1944. Those soldiers, although they were granted an amnesty in 1945, have been ostracized and discriminated against by socialist groups and organizations. The same article demanded the revision of history text books on the role of the Home Army. The five years of underground fighting against the Germans are summed up in the leading textbooks as follows: "According to the reckonings of the imperialists, the Home Army was to be used against the USSR in order to restore land-owner rule in Poland".

13. The further curbing of the power of the secret police has also been demanded and the suggestion made that its staff be cut by one half. Referring to the changes which should take place in this field, one writer called for an alert public opinion: "It would be unreasonable", he said, "to expect that the revolution will be made for us by the Politburo or the Central Committee. Nobody will make this revolution for us."

14. Another institution which has come repeatedly under fire recently is the Sejm, as already stated above. The author who criticized the inactivity of Parliament was taken to task by another journalist in the following manner: "I am sorry that Jerzy Rawicz, the author of the appeal for an industrious Sejm and long time parliamentary reporter, has completely missed the essential problem, that is, how a parliament should work in a people's State where the Party is the leading political authority. Let us be frank about it: in this sphere no country building socialism has implemented the principles of a People's Parliament and there is no reason to make a secret of the fact that we too have failed to do it." This confession would be impressive, at first sight, but the writer qualifies it by adding: "The resolution of the Politburo (which a year ago called for increased activity by the Sejm) is evidence that this matter is the concern of the Party and the article itself in Trybuna Ludu, in spite of its author having missed some points, is evidence that this matter continues to be most pressing."

15. The remedy suggested, however, was in selecting members along vocational groups rather than geographical areas. There was no suggestion towards restoring fully to the Sejm — over the heads of the Politburo-controlled Executive — its function which, according to the Constitution, is to "implement the sovereign rights of the nation by passing laws and supervising the activities of other organs of authority and State administration."

16. The trade unions also have had their whipping. A well known radio broadcaster, Edda Werfel, stated blankly in the course of a programme entitled "In Our Opinion": "I should very much like to know what the trade unions are doing in our country. In our opinion trade unions should decide, whether they are some unnecessary obsolescence or whether they are an institution needed by the working class. In this case the Central Trade Union Council must thoroughly and quite soon change its methods and, what is more important, the essence of its work." A reply appeared in the press in which the critic was taken to task for talking on a subject of which she had no knowledge.

17. A particularly courageous attack was the one against the special stores, commonly called yellow curtain stores, where influential members of the Party, high Government and Armed Forces officials exclusively, are able to buy food and manufactured articles, including imported merchandise and Polish export goods. In an article entitled "Behind the Yellow Curtains" (copy enclosed) the student newspaper Po Prostu denounced the scandal of these special stores which are overflowing with supplies for privileged people, while the ordinary people have to queue up for hours before half-empty shops. The denunciation has been the talk of the town for the last few weeks, but so far no step appears to have been taken to change this state of affairs.

18. Bureaucrats and planners have also taken a beating — that is, on paper. A prominent writer in reviewing bureaucratic methods had this to say, among other things: "Edda Werfel wrote two articles for Trybuna Ludu on technology not in construction but in obtaining the necessary permission for construction. Your hair stands on end when you read these articles. We have bred a special race of people in our country. In ancient Egypt there were specialists in interpreting the will of holy animals, cats, crocodiles or bugs. What a nice thing to do. How much more difficult it is to understand the wishes of a petty official who establishes regulations for investments. One has to study hard for years to learn to avoid all the difficulties thrown in the way of people who wish to construct something in People's Poland." The author then ridiculed official claims that a rise in living standards had taken place in recent years in Poland, and called for the cleaning out of the State Economic Planning Commission, the most authoritative body on socialist planning in this country. "They should be told: we have rejected capitalism and we will never return to it. We are on our way to a just country of socialism, but we have found a wilderness of paper bureaucracy on this road. An intrusive interference of offices, voicing inflated prosperity, hampering human effort, facilitating collective swindles — this is not socialism. This is a terrible disease, hard to remedy."

19. The sort of turmoil which the above debates represent would have more significance if it had not been inspired by the example set at the Moscow Congress. Nevertheless, it seems certain that the Poles — particularly those who belong to cultural circles — were glad to seize upon the occasion to drive a number of points home. Some of the attacks against the Party went further, it seems, than the ones made in Moscow, and, if only by indirect implication, came close to amounting to a condemnation of the Régime. This might be a healthy and hopeful sign except for the fact that none of the critics dared pass the barrier of the socialist concept. They all claimed more freedom and equality, as long as this served the socialization of the country. Not one formally challenged the validity of the system itself, and the exclusive control of the Party over the nation. It is as if what was desired basically was a régime not unlike the absolute monarchic or oligarchic systems of the past under which people could operate with a certain freedom within their respective profession and occupation, but were not allowed to question the authority in power, or the system of government. This political concept may perhaps be acceptable to the Russians who have never known modern democracy, but it is more than doubtful that it can ever be suitable for Poland, which has long been directly influenced by Western liberal democratic ideas.

20. It is perhaps worth mentioning that no demand has been voiced for the release of Cardinal Wyszynski and other bishops still under arrest, although it appears more and more evident that the Government is most embarrassed with the situation and may be considering some relaxation in this field. About 60% of the members of the Party are church-goers and therefore cannot escape a certain feeling of guilt in this respect.

21. Another characteristic is that the agitation so far has been chiefly the work of a number of prominent writers and journalists, but that it has not been accompanied by any noticeable unrest among the people nor has it given the man in the street new hopes. From this standpoint the whole affair appears somewhat superficial.

22. The inescapable fact remains of course, after all due credit is given for the boldness and frankness of some of the charges, that this country remains completely under the control of the Soviet master. There may be further interesting manifestations of a long-restrained desire to speak out and give a piece of one's mind, but any serious attempt at changing things is bound to founder on the rock of Soviet control if it goes beyond what is permissible. It is this realization, of course, which induces one to take a sober view of the value and possible effects of the stir-up described above.

Dear Jean-Louis [Delisle]:

I should like to thank you for your very interesting and informative despatches on developments in Poland and especially for your reports on the results of the C.P.S.U. Twentieth Congress in Poland. They have been most useful for our studies on developments in the satellites, particularly for the preparation of our policy paper on this subject which will be ready shortly.[112] You will have noticed, no doubt, that we included one of your recent reports in Cabinet Documents.

I have followed developments in Poland with particular interest as I feel that the prospects of profound political changes in Poland are perhaps better than in the other satellite countries. I was interested in two recent articles on this subject. R.H.S. Crossman of the New Statesman and Nation visited Poland recently and reported a spirit of confidence among top Polish Party members that a system of democratic freedom could be built inside a one-party state. His article, which appeared in the May 5 issue, is being photostated and we will be sending you a copy. Walter Lippman stated recently, "The changes in Poland are, I have been told by reliable observers, so impressive that they are beginning to look like a change of the political régime". Do you think that these statements are well-founded?

I should appreciate it very much if you could send us a brief analysis of the internal political situation in Poland and of Poland's prospects of attaining some form of independence both in its internal affairs and in its external relations with the Soviet Union and Western countries, possibly along Titoist lines.

With best regards,

Yours sincerely,

R.A.D. FORD

P.S. Since writing the above, the photostated copies of Mr. Crossman's article in the New Statesman and Nation have been received and I enclose herewith a copy.

Warsaw, June 26, 1956

Dear Bob [Ford]:

I am grateful for your letter of June 8 and the appreciation and information it contained. I am sending a despatch[113] by this day's bag in which I offer some views on present prospects concerning "liberalization" in Poland; I hope they will be useful. On the whole I am not optimistic. While Soviet presence is not much visible in Warsaw yet it does loom over the country politically and I am afraid this is a factor which limits any Polish desire for independence drastically. It is not that the Polish people like the Russians any more than they ever did, but it is not clear to them what they would gain by attempting to throw off the yoke — a relatively bearable one, in any case — as long as they are encircled by satellite states with no hope of support from the West.

I have seen some statements by Crossman on his return to England from Poland and have found them definitely too optimistic. I am convinced that the concessions are chiefly of a tactical nature, although they may have been inspired by the pressure of a sort of passive resistance on the part of the people. I will admit that it might be difficult for the Party rulers to return to repression, although the possibility of such a shift at a later date is not to be completely ruled out.

There are rumours of a rift at present between Ochab's clique, which would be in favour of slowing down liberalization, and Cyrankiewicz's clique, which would wish to push it further ahead. If the rift is real the outcome may prove illuminating.

With best regards,

RIOTS IN POZNAN

We have been informed by United Kingdom Commercial Secretary who is at Poznan fair that shortly after noon riots broke out in Poznan. It is thought to have started in Stalin Steel Works and spread through city. A Russian flag was torn down and local U.B. (secret police) headquarters stormed. It is reported tanks of unknown nationality appeared in the streets. Shots were fired, it is not known if anyone was killed or injured. Telephone lines to Poznan are now down or cut. Scheduled air flights cancelled.

ANTI-RÉGIME RIOTS IN POZNAN

Reports from various sources point to the seriousness of the fairly widespread character of the anti-régime anti-Russian manifestation in Poznan all day yesterday and up to early hours of this morning. Official communiqué issued by the Polish press agencies refers to "serious" riots which it attributes to agents of the "imperialistic and reactionary underground". Communiqué acknowledges assaults on public buildings and some persons killed. This is confirmed by Warsaw radio report quoted by the BBC stating that 38 were killed and 270 injured including soldiers and policemen. Rising was quelled with use of machine guns, tanks and a few planes. Prime Minister and members of the Central Committee Party rushed to Poznan where situation is under control and conditions normal. Communiqué holds revolt had characteristic of broad and well prepared provocation by the "enemies of the people of Poland". It calls upon the special vigilance of all working people and all patriotic elements of the nation.

The fact that the trouble was started by factory workers dissatisfied with wages and working conditions is significant. The spirit of the uprising was most likely stimulated by atmosphere created by the international fair with the presence of many foreigners and displays of foreign and Polish consumer goods not available to the Polish people. Fair was ordered closed as from time when rioting began and thus has ended three days before scheduled. It is probable that events were more spontaneous than official communiqué would have one believe. Events have made deep impression upon Polish people.

POZNAN RIOTS

Contrary to my statement at the end of telegram under reference, Poznan fair was reopened to the public on Friday noon after 24 hour closure. It is reported street shooting broke out again Friday evening. Large number of tanks posted in and around the city. Road blocks and tanks guarded main entries to city. Situation back to normal today. Some reports have it that workers who demonstrated on Thursday received their arms from infantry and police. This is somewhat impossible and eye witnesses to whom I have spoken have all said that soldiers and militia men were friendly crowds. Anti-Russian slogans were shouted by crowd in streets. Curfew was imposed last night from nine p.m. till four this morning.

Situation quiet in Warsaw but people are deeply moved by the event and in sympathy with Poznan workers.

POZNAN RIOTS

1. The principal purpose of our telegram SS-40 of July 4† was to find out whether Poznan riots could be discussed immediately in Council with the following points in mind:

(1) to exchange information on the facts received about the uprising;

(2) to determine whether uprising should be exploited for propaganda purposes;

(3) to discuss whether related protests might be made in NATO or in the UN on violation of human rights, etc.;

(4) to discuss the probable impact on liberalization in the satellites and on Soviet-satellite relations.

2. We have repeated telegram 125† from Warsaw containing our most complete information on riots apart from press reports. This does not necessarily represent our views as a return to a policy of repression in Poland seems to us not impossible, depending of course, on the course of events in the next few weeks.

3. There has been strong public reaction in Canada against Polish authorities for repressive measures taken following riots. The Canadian Polish Congress has expressed indignation in telegrams to Prime Minister and UN requesting strong government protest and suggesting delivery of food to Poland. A protest meeting to which all ethnic groups representing iron curtain countries have been invited is scheduled for this week in Toronto. Subject has also been raised in the House of Commons.

4. We are not in favour of direct protest or shipment of food because of Polish reaction to USA action, but we believe that no precipitate steps should be taken by any NATO countries before full discussion in the Council. Mr. Pearson's telegram 920 of July 6† from London refers.

5. I think therefore that there would be an advantage in having the Poznan riots discussed separately and rather urgently in the Council before the more general discussion on the satellites later.

6. We also think riots present excellent opportunity for a stronger propaganda line, e.g., in CBC-IS broadcasts.

POZNAN UPRISINGS

I should like to refer to the telegram of July 4† and the letter of July 6† addressed to you by the Canadian Polish Congress, in which the Canadian government has been asked to intervene on behalf of the Poznan strikers and demonstrators and also to arrange for the delivery of food to Poland.

2. I should like to refer also to a letter† received from Mr. Donald Carrick stating that he has been invited to attend a meeting called by the Canadian Polish Congress on July 11 in connection with the Poznan uprising, and suggesting that official recognition be accorded to this meeting.

3. As you know, statements made by the United States on this subject have been strongly criticized by the Polish authorities, and an offer of food to Poland has been rebuffed. Consequently, it seems unlikely that direct intervention by Canada would be successful, and such action would undoubtedly be construed by the Polish government as unjustified interference in the domestic affairs of that country.

4. I therefore attach for your approval, a suggested telegram† to the Canadian Polish Congress expressing sympathy with their concern over the fate of the Poznan workers and mentioning the inadvisability of direct intervention on the part of the Canadian government in this matter.

5. For the aforementioned reasons, you will probably not wish to accord official recognition to the meeting of the Canadian Polish Congress. You may however wish to send a personal message of greetings to the Congress and I therefore attach a suggested text† for such a message, which might be read on your behalf by Mr. Carrick.

POZNAN RIOTS

It is still too early to say with certainty what effect Poznan will have on liberalization in satellites and on Soviet-satellite relations. News reports of last few days, however, give grounds for some optimism:

(a) "Imperialist instigation" of riots has been played down, and economic grievances of workers have been recognized as legitimate, e.g., repayment of unjustly levied taxes;

(b) Emphasis has shifted from wickedness of workers to wickedness of trade union and party leaders in Poznan for losing touch with workers and, by implication, failing to forestall riots by recognizing and dealing with legitimate demands;

(c) Dismissal of minister of motor industry, reputedly very unpopular with factory workers;

(d) "Liberal" faction led by Cyrankiewicz reportedly is prevailing over "tough" faction led by Ochab.

Possible evidence to contrary is one report that demonstrators will be tried by special commission instead of regular courts, though it is not entirely clear whether special commission will actually conduct trials or merely report to government and Party.

2. We think that local trade union, Party and plant officials may take major blame for failure of régime to satisfy workers, though leaders of demonstration can also be expected to receive severe sentences. So much has been said about liberalization in Poland — curbing powers of secret police, return to legality, better deal for people — that it may be difficult to return to more repressive methods of control. Many government and party leaders may have recognized long-term ineffectiveness of coercive techniques and be genuinely convinced that economic and political incentives are necessary to improve popularity of régime and efficiency of system.

3. Another unknown but important factor is reaction of Soviet leaders. If there is faction which thinks the mellowing process has gone too far and too fast, it will certainly point to Poznan riots as example of dangers of new look. It is difficult to estimate relative strengths of conservative and liberal factions, and whether liberal faction is strong enough to "ride out" such temporary set-backs as Poznan riots. There is analogy, though, that East Berlin riots may have been contributory to Beria's downfall.

4. Effect on Soviet-satellite relations will be governed by:

(a) Moscow's estimate of ability of satellite régimes to keep satellite discontent within bounds, which ability is probably high. Moscow could not countenance widespread and overt expression of discontent lest this weaken strategically important satellites.

(b) Moscow's estimate of role of "imperialist agents" in fomenting riots. While we realize ridiculousness of assertion, Moscow may harbour suspicions that this was at least contributory factor.

(c) Reaction in West to Poznan riots. If Poznan leads to renewal of irresponsible talk about imminence of overthrow of Communist régimes and "liberation" of satellites, Moscow's worst fears will be confirmed, to obvious detriment of liberalization in satellites and of loosening of Soviet control over Eastern Europe.

5. We should not lose opportunity to express disapproval of methods used in suppressing legitimate demonstrations, extend sympathy for Polish people and point up callousness as well as inefficiency of Polish Communist régime. We should not, however, imply that overthrow of present régimes or forcible detachment of satellites from Soviet Union forms any part of Western policy.

6. It is our opinion that co-related protests should not repeat not be made by NATO countries, and that NATO countries should not raise matter in United Nations, as this is likely to do cause of liberalization and Soviet-satellite relations, as well as East-West relations, more harm than good.

7. You may use this telegram as basis for discussion in Council. You may also wish to draw to Council's attention Minister's statement in House, sent to you in repeat of telegram SS-51 of July 9 to Warsaw.[114]

POZNAN RIOTS

The Council discussed this subject at a special meeting Friday afternoon called at our request. I made a statement on the basis of your telegram under reference drawing special attention to the remarks made in Parliament on July 9 by Mr. Pearson.

2. The USA representative, in thanking us for the information given, said that, broadly speaking, he agreed with the Canadian assessment. He added, however, that pari passu, the USA reaction to Poznan was similar to that regarding Khrushchev's speech, e.g. that these events presented an excellent opportunity to exercise psychological pressure on the satellites through the use of propaganda applied on the broadest possible front. The USA government realizes, as had been pointed out by some permanent representatives in Council, that propaganda activities should not be overdone but at the same time it attached great importance to NATO countries expressing their sympathy and understanding to the Polish people who had dared challenge Communist oppression. Mr. Perkins said, in this connection, that Washington greatly appreciated the statement made by Mr. Pearson in Parliament. He said that on July 2 the USA Senate adopted a resolution expressing admiration and sympathy for the Polish people. At the same time, the USA authorities are encouraging the writing of newspaper articles by eye-witnesses in order that the world at large may have full knowledge of what transpired. A great deal of information was being given on the events by the Voice of America. He said that the USA government also agrees with the Canadian position that nothing would be gained in raising this matter in the United Nations.

3. As for the significance of the Poznan riots and particularly their effects on other satellite countries, the USA view was that they doubted that these events will affect to any great extent the trend towards liberalization. The reason being that the riots took place as a result of grievances, the validity of which has since then been recognized by the Polish government (repayment of certain taxes and the removal of key officials). In conclusion, he said that the USA government has no evidence in its possession indicating that the relationships between the USSR and the satellite countries or the relationship between the satellite countries will be altered as a result of the Poznan demonstration.

4. The Dutch representative said that, on the basis of information available to his government, it was not believed either that the Poznan riots will have any significant effect on the trends of liberalization in satellite countries. He asked whether other governments were in a position to confirm the fact that the riots had taken place spontaneously. To this, the UK representative said that there was no doubt about the spontaneous character of the uprising. This situation has been developing over a period of months and the strike took place on the exact date which the workers themselves had set for it if their demands were not met. The French representative also confirmed this point.

5. The Italian representative spoke about the point raised in paragraph three of your telegram under reference, e.g. the reaction in the USSR to the Poznan events. He said that their information was to the effect that the impression created in the USSR had been very deep despite the censors' efforts to play them down. The subject was being talked about very widely in Moscow and in other parts of the USSR to such an extent that the Central Committee of the Communist Party saw fit to issue a statement trying to substantiate the charge that the riots took place at the instigation of the USA. The statement made much of the fact that the USA recently added twenty five million dollars to the one hundred million dollars voted by Congress to instigate activities designed to foster liberation of the satellites. Finally, the Italian representative said his authorities will shortly circulate to Council additional information on the Poznan riots.

6. The UK representative said that he agreed with the Canadian assessment of the situation. In the UK government view, it would be a mistake for NATO governments to take too much official notice of the Poznan events, particularly with regard to propaganda activities. He said that the presence of foreigners in Poznan at the time when the riots broke out resulted in all the publicity abroad that one could hope for, and that we should now let events speak for themselves. The French representative said that the UK approach was exactly in line with the reaction of his own authorities.

7. It was finally decided that the Working Group on Trends of Soviet Policy will meet as soon as possible and prepare a comprehensive report taking into account what had been said at the Council meeting. In this connection, we draw your attention to a Secretariat preliminary report on Poland and the Poznan riots, AC/34(56)WP/6, sent to you under transmittal slip 2558 of July 12.

EXCHANGE OF VIEWS WITH THE POLISH LEGATION ON THE POZNAN RIOT

On July 12, Mr. R. Szuster, Second Secretary of the Polish Legation called at our request. It was explained to him that large sections of the Canadian public had followed the recent developments in Poland with interest and that the Poznan incident had given rise to some public comment. His attention was directed to the questions which had been asked in the House and to your reply. Mr. Szuster said that, although his Legation received copies of Hansard, he had not read the relevant passage!

2. It was emphasized that he should not construe his being called to the Department as a formal approach to the Legation, nor as an effort by the Canadian Government to interfere in what the Polish Government might consider to be a domestic matter. As a courtesy we wished to give the Legation a copy of Hansard to ensure that it had access to an authoritative text of what had been said in the House. Mr. Szuster appeared to understand English well, although he speaks it rather poorly, and seemed to grasp this point. He made no comment and said that he would discuss it with the Chargé d'Affaires.

3. On July 16, Mr. Szuster called at the Department at his request to say that he had been instructed by the Chargé to say that our bringing of this matter to the attention of the Polish Legation was unacceptable, and that the Poznan incident is regarded as a domestic matter. It was not intended to present us with a note, since we had not prepared a note for the Legation.

4. Mr. Szuster presented these views quietly and passed at once to the subjects of personal recreation and the forthcoming reception at the Polish Legation on July 23.

5. It would appear that the Polish Legation has attempted to confine its reaction to our approach to a very mild protest.

You will recall that when the Poznan events were discussed in the NATO Council, the general consensus of opinion was that official protests by the NATO Governments to the Polish Government would be undesirable.

2. The United States Government still felt however that something should be done, and approaches were made to the NATO Governments through diplomatic channels to test their reactions to the suggestion that the Polish Government should be urged (through the Polish representatives in the capitals concerned) to give the Poznan prisoners a fair trial. When the Counsellor of the United States Embassy called about this matter, you agreed that he should be informed that such action would serve no useful purpose especially in view of the Minister's statement on this subject in the House. The Foreign Office made a similar reply to the United States Ambassador in London.

3. The United Kingdom Ambassador in Warsaw has, however, been instructed to ensure the attendance of a member of his staff at the trials, to obtain an unbiased report and to demonstrate their interest in the trials. He has received an assurance from the Polish Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs that there will be no difficulty about this, provided that the official attending is not described as an "observer" or in any form implying intervention in Polish affairs.

4. Attendance by Western representatives at the trials will give the Poles an excellent opportunity to prove their good faith as well as providing first-hand information on the proceedings. Both our own and the U.K. missions in Warsaw have reported that the Poles seem prepared to conduct relatively fair trials.

5. I therefore recommend that we suggest to our mission in Warsaw that a member of the staff attend the trials on the same basis as above. If you agree, we might also suggest informally to the Canadian Press that it would be desirable if a Canadian press representative could be present at the trials.[115]

P.S. If the C.P.'s small resources are over-taxed, we might suggest informally to the Montreal Star, or the Toronto Star that they give consideration to sending their European correspondents Gerald Clark and William Stevenson, respectively, though I suspect the latter might not be considered welcome by the Poles after his expulsion from Egypt!

POLAND

I attach herewith a paper prepared in the Department on the developments in Poland over the past six weeks. I regret its length which is due to the pressure of events, and the lack of time to condense it.

[115] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
if other Western diplomats attend there would be no objections; the presence of a Canadian observer should not be too obvious. Canadian Press should not be approached. J. L[éger]

2. Although attention has been naturally rivetted on the events in Hungary, the evolution of Poland is at least as important. The success of the Poles in establishing and maintaining a measure of independence in their internal affairs will provide the key to Soviet policy in Eastern Europe. Just as the successful revolt of Gomulka undoubtedly was the spark for the Hungarian uprising, so the ability of the Poles to maintain what they have won will have a direct impact on the other satellites.

3. I do not consider that the struggle is yet over in Poland. There are very strong anti-Russian and anti-Communist elements and it will be the task of Gomulka to try to prevent them from pushing him beyond the limit the Russians will consider acceptable. The Poles have already made demands in foreign affairs (which they did not push at the Moscow Conference), and have said things in the U.N., which must profoundly disturb the Russians.

4. The Russians clearly do not want to provoke an outbreak in Poland while their hands are full in Hungary. But if they are successful in subduing the latter country, I think there must be many members of the Soviet hierarchy who would favour stopping the progress towards freedom in Poland before it got too late, or before its influence crept across the frontiers with the other satellites, and into Russia itself.

5. If the Poles survive the next six months, it is my feeling that they may come to occupy a position at least as important in the Communist world as Yugoslavia. They are a far more numerous, civilised, and industrially advanced people than the Yugoslavs, and there is every sign that they are likely to develop a special kind of democratized and relatively liberal communism especially adapted to their own needs, than the Yugoslavs have been able to achieve in their country.

6. Therefore, I conclude that we ought to pay the closest possible attention to the developments in Poland, and as soon as feasible, both from our point of view and that of the Poles, be prepared to adapt a policy similar to that we followed with the Yugoslavs after 1948. In the latter case, after it became clear that the Yugoslavs were determined to establish and maintain their independence of Moscow, we raised our Legation to an Embassy, sent an ambassador to Belgrade, increased the staff of the mission, and in other ways, political and economic, expressed a desire to establish closer and better relations.

7. I am not suggesting any particular time-table, but I think we ought to keep this necessity in mind, particularly if we are unable to give any satisfaction about the Polish art treasures even to a more nationalist government which, furthermore, has released the Cardinal Primate, and gone a long way towards the restoration of religious freedom — something, incidentally, that the Yugoslavs have never done.[116]

THE FUTURE OF POLAND

The re-assumption of the leadership in Poland by Wladislav Gomulka and the direct defiance of Moscow directives during the visit of the four-man Soviet delegation to Warsaw on the eventful weekend of October 19 may have been the turning point in the efforts of Poland over the past few months to break away from complete domination by Moscow. This was certainly the feeling in Poland which was perhaps best expressed in a Warsaw radio message. "This is a spring of renovation of Communism ... which is sweeping across the whole country.... The spring has only just begun, but the Rubicon has been crossed, and nothing will be able to stop the great change in the history of the development of Poland." If Moscow now intends to stop these changes precipitated by Khrushchev's pronouncements at the CPSU Twentieth Congress, it is probable that armed force such as has been used to crush the revolt in Hungary will be necessary.

2. An examination of the present situation reveals however, that there seems to be little prospect of a revolt in Poland, or that Poland, unlike Hungary, will attempt to repudiate the Soviet Union, restore capitalism or permit the formation of a Western political system. It would appear at present that Poland will be allowed to establish a Titoist form of communism which will follow a course more independent of Moscow. Gomulka made this clear in his statement on October 20 that "within the framework of Socialist relations with other nations of the Soviet bloc, each country should have full independence, and the rights of each nation to a sovereign government in an independent country should be fully and mutually respected." Although the Soviet Government apparently made considerable efforts to delay the changes in Poland, the broader directions of Gomulka's programme were nevertheless repeated in the Russian statement of policy of October 30.[117]

3. There are good reasons for Gomulka's stand. He was a leading communist in Poland before the war and would probably not be welcomed as leader at the present time if he had not become associated with Polish nationalism by his support of Titoism and his imprisonment. Much of his speech of October 20 was devoted to criticism of the Moscow-directed policies which have led to the terrible economic situation and living conditions in Poland at the present time. But to retain popularity he may have to go further in concessions to the Polish people than is consistent with his own convictions.

4. The most significant changes can consequently be expected in Polish domestic policy. Defiance of Moscow in foreign policy is recognized as dangerous and not necessarily in [117] Dans une importante déclaration publiée le 30 octobre 1956, l'Union soviétique a annoncé qu'elle avait l'intention de réviser ses relations avec les États socialistes de l'Europe de l'Est « so as to remove any possibility of violation of the principle of national sovereignty, mutual benefit and equality in economic relations. » Pour la déclaration, voir Documents on International Relations, 1956, London, Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1959, pp. 465-468.

In an important declaration issued on 30 October 1956, the Soviet Union announced its willingness to conduct a searching re-examination of its relations with the socialist states of Eastern Europe "so as to remove any possibility of violation of the principle of national sovereignty, mutual benefit and equality in economic relations." For the declaration, see Documents on International Relations, 1956, London, Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1959, pp. 465-468.

Poland's interests. The strategic situation of Poland between the USSR and Soviet-occupied East Germany, and Poland's traditional fear of Germany makes Soviet support necessary against a possible future German campaign for a revision of the Polish-German frontier. Although there is undoubtedly anti-Russian feeling among the Poles — the Poznan rioters made this clear — the leaders of the recent revolt have discouraged it and Gomulka stated in the speech that "if there is anyone who thinks that it is possible to kindle anti-Soviet moods in Poland, then he is deeply mistaken." The brutal Soviet repression of the revolt in Hungary can be expected at the same time to discourage similar ideas in Poland, yet increase the latent anti-Russian and anti-communist feeling of the Polish people.

5. Before examining the internal changes proposed by the new Polish Government it would be well to examine the composition of the newly-formed Politburo. On the whole it should appeal more to Polish nationalist sentiments, and bring the party leadership closer to the rank and file party members. Most of the members with the exception of Ochab and Zawadski attained prominence in the Polish resistance, and Cyranciewicz, the Prime Minister, and Rapacki, the Foreign Minister are former socialists. It will be remembered that Cyranciewicz had been advocating greater "democratization" during the past few months and was leader of the more liberal faction within the party. Even Ochab, the former First Secretary of the Communist party, who served an apprenticeship in Moscow and had been considered pro-Stalinist, has recently been showing signs of supporting the more liberal tendencies in the party. Zawadski's presence may be a concession to Moscow since he had strongly denounced Tito at the time of Gomulka's disgrace. Only Gomulka and Zambrawski were in the Politburo of 1945. The most notable casualties have been Minc, who was in charge of economic policy and resigned on October 8, and Marshal Rokossovsky, who was dropped from the Politburo and has now "resigned" as Minister of Defence and Commander-in-Chief of the Polish armed forces. Rokossovsky's successor is General Spychalski, an associate of Gomulka's, who is regarded as a Polish nationalist. Another notable change has been the removal from the Politburo of Jozwiak-Witold who, as chairman of the party control commission, was associated with the security police.

6. The real test facing the new Government lies in the economic situation. In a remarkable speech to the Central Committee of the Polish Communist Party on October 20, Gomulka outlined the principal difficulties and indicated that only the most radical change of economic policy held out hope for the future. Some indication of trouble had been filtering through in various speeches by Polish leaders during the previous months and the Poznan riots made this clear to the world. Gomulka did not spare the facts. Poland is experiencing a serious inflation, for the rise in wages has not been accompanied by an increase in commodities. The forced collectivization of agriculture has been a failure. Yields from individual peasant farms far exceed those from collective and state farms, and the collective farms have been subsidized to conceal the failures at the expense of the economy as a whole. Top priority for heavy industry has led to enormous waste, and much of the increase in industrial production has been won at a high cost. The coal industry is further behind than it was in 1949 and long hours have been ruining the health of the miners and lowering efficiency, a situation which Gomulka termed "unpardonable thoughtlessness". The housing situation is described as an "alarming matter". Gomulka implied that Soviet credits for Polish industrialization have weakened the country's economic position. Poland has been unable to repay the credits; a large part of these, extended in the shape of machines and installations has found no application in production, and part "must be considered irretrievably lost". A gross example of this waste is the Zeran automobile plant, built with Soviet aid, which operates at "disproportionately high costs" and produces a limited number of outmoded automobiles with high fuel consumption. The situation in the field of public services, health resorts and sanatoria is cited as being equally serious.

7. The Government has announced its proposal to meet the situation. The plan calls for the restriction of planned capital investment in 1947, the saved building material to go into housing; the exclusion of "sideline" production from the State plan and complete freedom in fixing prices; the gradual introduction of competitive trading and free enterprise in small State-run and cooperative industries; the limited encouragement of small private establishments producing consumer goods, a move which was begun last summer; and the promotion of private stores and kiosks. In agriculture, only the sound collective farms are to be strengthened further and the others are to be dissolved. Some of these measures represent considerable concessions to the people, although no promises have been made for an immediate improvement in the standard of living. The problem remains as to whether anything effective can be achieved without outside help and how far Poland can go independently in view of Soviet vested interest in the country. It is obvious from Gomulka's speech that in the past Soviet offers of aid, in Soviet terms, have not helped the economic situation in Poland; it is probable that Poland will now press for assistance on its own conditions. It should not be forgotten, however, that Poland depends materially on the USSR for supplies of iron ore, some ferro-alloys and some factory equipment and spare parts. If such supplies were cut off, it is unlikely that Poland could find foreign exchange to buy them elsewhere. It is not yet certain that Poland will accept the U.S. offer of aid made on October 27. Meanwhile, the USSR has offered a loan of $25 million dollars. The possibility of an American offer had been discussed in the Sejm Committee and criticism was made of the "political conditions" attached to such offers. However, it is possible that it will be accepted if no strings are attached and Moscow permits this. It is impossible to determine at present how successful the new economic programme will be, although it appears certain that Poland's new independence will have little substance unless the country is helped to stand on its own feet economically.

8. The proposed reforms are not restricted to the economic field. Perhaps the most important are the proposed changes in the role of the Sejm or parliament. The need to give more responsibility to the latter has been discussed frequently since the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU, and it now appears that some action will be taken. The parliamentary commission has already approved a new electoral law enforcing the secret ballot, and changes in the voting system are in process. Criticism of the present system has been strong. An article in Trybuna Ludu states: "What is the most essential problem concerning the electoral law? It seems to me that it is most essential that a voter is really able to choose and not just vote as was done so far." The writer states that the present article of the constitution which reads, "The number of candidates on the list cannot exceed the number of deputies established for the district", ought to be abolished because it wipes out the sense of elections. "One can only choose between one man and another and if the number of candidates is precisely the same as the number of deputies for a given district, then there is no question of any elections". The changes under discussion do not indicate free elections in the Western sense, but it can be expected from a study of the discussions of the Sejm committee that the voters in the January elections will be able to choose between candidates and that the right to present candidates will be extended beyond political and co-operative organizations to include groups of citizens who are not necessarily all party members. It is not probable that non-communists will have any chance of being chosen, but the Government is obviously trying to give the Polish people a greater sense of participation in their government.

9. The Sejm itself will also have more influence if the new measures are successful. A recent Sejm resolution which follows the lines laid down in Gomulka's speech states that "The Sejm must be permitted to express its opinion on all Government policy, so that the Government should only in exceptional cases make decisions by decrees of the Council of State on matters within the competence of the legislative chambers". The resolution is encouraging, but it also makes it clear that the Party leadership will retain the final effective control of the country's policies.

10. Concessions are being made to the Polish people in the field of religion. Cardinal Wyszynski has been released, his functions restored, and all church properties confiscated by the state are to be returned. There is evidence that the progressive Catholic movement Pax is rapidly losing influence and that an anti-progression Catholic group is apparently being organized with the consent of the government. However, many bishops and priests are still in prison, and Roman Catholic political and youth movements will not be permitted. Gomulka and the Cardinal have apparently reached some accord in this respect and it can be assumed that restraint in his activities is the price the Cardinal will have to pay for his freedom. Nevertheless, once a degree of religious freedom has been permitted, public pressure in a country which is ninety percent Catholic may force more concessions than the régime anticipates at present. In addition to concessions to the Catholic church, the régime has also been stressing the importance of eradicating the anti-Semetic sentiments which have been very strong in the country.

11. The recent trials in Poznan have drawn considerable attention to the "liberalization" which has occurred on the judicial system in Poland. This development was foreshadowed by the general amnesty first announced in 1955, by the rehabilitation of the Home Army, and the gradual release of political prisoners who had been charged as "enemies of the State" and who are now admitted to have been unjustly imprisoned. The remarkable frankness of the defence during the Poznan trials and the presence of Western observers are hopeful indications that more attention will be paid to normal judicial procedures in the future and that arbitrary police repression will be greatly reduced. There is now much talk in Poland of "Socialist legality" and condemnation of "beriyaism". The general feeling was aptly expressed in a speech to the Sejm committee for the Administration of Justice: "The Beriya system consisted in a lack of independence of the courts, particularly of Military Courts, and in reducing the part of the prosecutor to that of a factor automatically ordering arrests. But the lack of openness and of supervision of the work of the investigating agencies has also contributed to all sorts of distortions — the case of openness of the administration of justice, and public control of it, is of decisive importance to the guarantee that the incidents of 1949-53 will not be repeated". There is little to indicate at present that the Polish régime is not sincere in its desire to restore some semblance of the rule of law to the country.

12. It will be noted in the examination of recent events that little attention has been paid by the régime to the prospects of sweeping social reforms. This is indicative of the realistic approach of the new leaders who have recognized that until the economic crisis has been resolved, higher wages, pensions, consumer goods and better working conditions cannot be offered to the people. It is a dangerous situation and concessions in other fields may not be enough to ensure the popularity of Gomulka's Government for any length of time. Efforts are being made to ensure a fairer distribution of available food and goods under a proposed ration system, but this is an emergency measure at best. It remains to be seen whether the régime can stand firm and convince the people that they must continue to wait patiently for an improvement in their standard of living.

13. The foregoing analysis has concentrated on the prospects of Poland's future in the light of the measures proposed by the new régime and the reforms begun during the past few months. If these measures are successful, Poland may attain a considerable degree of independence to follow its own "path of socialism". Yugoslavia and Communist China have offered encouragement and the Soviet Union now seems prepared to accept the situation provided Poland does not try to follow the Hungarian example. But the picture is not entirely stable. The Polish people are essentially opposed to the communist system itself and restlessness and anti-Russian feeling appear to be growing. Gomulka has been forced to issue appeals for "calm and unity". The question arises: "Will Gomulka and the threat of Soviet armed intervention keep the situation under control, or will be the people revolt and cause the destruction of everything that has been gained?"

14. In conclusion, a few words might be said on the effects of the events in Poland on the Soviet Bloc. Poland's example was undoubtedly influential in sparking the revolt in Hungary, and signs of discontent are appearing in Roumania and East Germany as well. Poland came out formally in support of Hungary's earlier demands for independence and the withdrawal of Soviet troops, but the turn of events in Hungary has now become a source of some embarrassment to the Polish Government, and Gomulka has stated strong disapproval of the Hungarian attempts to reject the communist system itself.

15. It is noteworthy, however, that in the debate over the Hungarian question in the United Nations, the Polish delegate felt able to take a stronger and less ambiguous stand than the Indian delegate and said that in the event of a paragraph-by-paragraph vote he would have supported those parts of the United States resolution of November 4 favouring non-intervention in the internal affairs of other nations and noting the Soviet declaration of October 30 about a more liberal policy toward the members of the Warsaw Pact. Moreover, Poland has offered $2 million for Hungarian relief, one of the most generous contributions from U.N. members. In the vote in the U.N. on November 20 on the Indian-Ceylonese-Indonesian resolution Poland abstained along with Yugoslavia, perhaps the first time a Soviet satellite has broken the unity of the bloc.

16. Since he assumed the leadership, Gomulka has repeatedly stated that his country's desire for "socialist" independence will not affect Polish-Soviet friendship, and he has not denounced the Warsaw Pact. This does not mean that Poland does not want the withdrawal of Soviet troops. Over thirty Russian officers have been dismissed from the Polish army, and replaced by Poles as a concession to Polish feeling about the presence of Russian troops. Moreover negotiations will reportedly take place with the USSR in the near future to regulate the number and position of Soviet troops. The presence of the latter is recognized as a necessity for the present, at least, in the full knowledge that the Soviet Union will not permit its troops in East Germany to be isolated without the support of troops in Poland. The implication is that withdrawal of Soviet troops from Poland will depend on the withdrawal of NATO forces from West Germany. Poland obviously had no intention of risking a break with Moscow and its support of movements for independence in the other satellites can be expected to stop short of actions intended to split the unity of the Soviet Bloc. But within these limits, the Polish régime will undoubtedly press for as many concessions as possible from the Soviet Union and in this respect it is of interest to note the outcome of the negotiations between the Polish and Soviet leaders just completed in Moscow. Although Poland and the Soviet Union have signed a pact of "indestructible friendship", the agreement on the whole represents considerable concessions to Poland. Soviet troops will remain in Poland, but control of Soviet troop movements outside their bases has been given to the Poles. It was also agreed that Soviet troops would not interfere with Poland's internal affairs. In addition to the military arrangements the Soviet Union has promised to deliver 1,400,000 tons of grain on credit to Poland in 1957, has extended long-term credits totalling $175,000,000, has made a settlement of outstanding Polish debts, and has agreed to the repatriation and release of Poles in captivity in the Soviet Union. The economic aid will undoubtedly help to meet Poland's economic crisis, at least temporarily, but it has been reported from Poland that it will meet only half of Poland's needs and that aid may yet be sought from Western countries.

17. The Poles have been showing increasing interest in contacts and trade with the West. Over a period, if the present movements in the direction of national communism continues, it may prove worthwhile for Canada, in concert with other Western countries, to consider taking more initiative in developing trade with Poland, encouraging the exchange of visits, expanding information activities in Poland and in general fostering more friendly relations with a view to weaning Poland gently away from its dependence on Moscow.

FOR CANADIAN EYES ONLY

Dear Jules [Léger],

One of the most interesting experiences I have had here has been my contact with several members of the Polish delegation, one of whom I have known in the United Nations for some time. I am reporting separately by telegram† my conversations with Michalowski about Vietnam which I hope may lead to some interesting developments.

In addition to these two I have talked rather briefly to the Deputy Foreign Minister, whom I knew slightly when he was Ambassador in Moscow. In addition, Jean-Louis Delisle and I had luncheon with the new Polish Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa, Sieradski, in the company of my old Polish friend. The latter was so extremely candid that I was led into talking very frankly to Sieradski about the pitfalls into which he could be led on first arrival. They both seemed so extremely anxious to get Canadian-Polish relations on a sound basis that I thought it would do no harm to talk frankly about such things as impresarios and about the kind of associations with Polish-Canadians which would prove fruitful and those which would not. I told him to have a talk with John Watkins about these things. Since he departed I have been told that they took this advice as well-intentioned and also took it seriously. If these people whom I talked to, including I think Sieradski, are honest representatives of the present government I am to a large extent convinced (retaining of course a due proportion of professional scepticism) that they want to establish genuinely friendly relations with Canada and that they probably place a high priority on this.

Curiously enough one reason for my believing in their intentions is their attitude on the Polish treasures. This subject is prominent in all our talks. If they were attempting to pull the wool over our eyes I suspect that they would be more ingratiating about the treasures. In fact they are quite blunt, although not at all nasty. They seem to have a thorough understanding of our internal problems and don't suggest these have been invented as an excuse by the federal government. On the other hand they express their great disappointment that nothing has been done about the treasures in the Bank. This, they say, they cannot understand. One of the strong arguments they put forward (and this I think was made also by Michalowski in a conversation he had with Lucien Cardin) is that a gesture of goodwill on the treasures from Canada at the present time would help them in their internal situation.

They make no secret of the impatience of the Polish public at the failure of the government to move more rapidly in the direction of the West and they are anxious to reassure the public in any possible way of their good although cautious intentions.

Yesterday I was invited to lunch by my old Polish friend. I am sorry to be rather melodramatically anonymous in my reference to him, but at the end of yesterday's conversation I said that I would like to report to Ottawa the viewpoints he had expressed and asked if he would mind. He agreed but asked me not to quote him specifically. As he had been very candid with me, I feel that I must be honest with him.

At various times during the session he has given me the barometer of Polish feelings. They were very nervous up until the Gomulka visit to Moscow, and after that they were jubilant and confident that they had won. Yesterday, however, he admitted that they were a bit frightened again. The riots in Poland had made them very anxious. He has told me of the difficulties he has had with his own students in Warsaw persuading them of the danger of making the mistakes that were made in Hungary. Although he is usually an optimist, he spoke nervously about the limitations of their freedom of movement internationally. At this point they could abstain here and there but that was about all and it would not be noticed. I told him to have no doubts about the notice being taken by the Western countries of even their most timid abstentions in the Assembly. He could be assured that most Western people had a great deal of sympathy and understanding for what they were trying to do. He said the trouble was that the people at home would not notice. We did not talk very much about Hungary yesterday because he had on many other occasions expressed his strong feelings on it. He said that feelings in Poland on the subject were extremely high. They had been expressed to some extent by about four million dollars worth of relief supplies.

He complained somewhat about the attitude of the United States. I said that I thought the Americans like the rest of us were uncertain what to do. We wanted to encourage and help the Polish Government in its new independence but we were anxious not to do anything which would upset the delicate basis of their relations with Moscow. It was my impression that the Americans had been on the whole sensible in this respect. My friend may have been a little unreasonable on this subject. They understand the need for caution by the West but at the same time they seem so desperately to want Western understanding and confidence. He did not specifically refer to American economic assistance but talked bitterly about the attitude of Knowland and Lodge who wouldn't have anything to do with them and continued to talk about them as satellites. He said angrily "I'd like to go and ask Senator Knowland what he would do in our position". When I asked him if a large offer of a loan from the United States would not be dangerous for them, he said that gestures from the West were quite all right "as long as they were not to the bosom" — what they would like to have were credits. It was of primary importance to them to improve their difficult economic situation in order to keep the people satisfied and prevent them from the desperate measures the Hungarians had taken. They were not asking for gifts. He referred several times to his hopes that he would have a chance to talk to Mr. Pearson, and I think he would undoubtedly wish to look into the possibility of some Canadian economic assistance, although it is not likely that he would speak as an official or negotiator but simply as a Pole who wanted to let us know what Poland needed and wanted.

One thing had made him happy and that was the NATO statement about Eastern Europe.[118] He thought that this was just the right note for NATO to strike in order to reassure the Russians. They (he always calls the Russians "they") were very frightened and perplexed and did not know what to do next. From previous conversations I know that he is much interested in the new Soviet disarmament proposals, not because he is defending Soviet policy but because he sees Polish needs being served by the mutual withdrawal of forces. It struck me there was a new note of urgency in his voice yesterday on this subject. The Poles do not know what the Russians will do next and are grasping at any prospect of a new agreement on European security, in fact anything which might get the Russians out of Poland before the Polish people do something desperate. It was not surprising, therefore, that we talked about James Reston's article in yesterday morning's New York Times which confirmed the suspicions many people have had here that the United States was flirting with some bold new proposals about the mutual withdrawal of forces in Europe. (Incidentally I learned last night from the Quaker representative at the United Nations, who sees a lot of the Russians and had just left them yesterday evening, that the Russians are most excited about Reston's article, and that, when he asked Zamyatin what it meant, the latter said that it meant the Americans had accepted the Soviet disarmament proposals.) My friend was much encouraged with the thought that the Americans might be doing something which would help Poland indirectly.

In every conversation I am made aware of the great pride my friend takes in recent Polish developments. I could not, of course, be sure that the reality in Poland conforms with his version of it but he assures me that they are moving rapidly to virtually complete freedom of opinion and religion. He seemed particularly proud of the agreement reached with the Roman Catholic Church, although I do not think he is a Catholic himself. He said that the Church would now be quite as free as it was in most European countries. They would not re-establish a state church, but in this they were not different from most Western countries, including Canada. He said the Cardinal had preached a sermon last Sunday in the Cathedral in Warsaw that was very good. He understood the Cardinal would be going to Rome this week. He was quite frank in saying that he hoped the new relations with the Catholic Church in Poland would be noted in Canada and that it might have some effect on the Premier of Quebec. When I said that it seemed to me they had gone further in a few months than the Yugoslavs in liberalization, he said that in the Polish view Yugoslavia had now economic but not political democracy. If the Polish government acted as the Yugoslavs had towards Djilas they would have to jail hundreds of people because editors were writing like that all over Poland.

There is one other point which my friend is anxious to make at every possible opportunity, and it has also been made to me by Michalowski independently but in similar terms. The Poles clearly think that the Chinese Communists are on their side in the dispute with Moscow. My friend insists that there were official statements from Peking which not only spoke sympathetically about the Poles and Hungarians but were actually critical of the Russians. They seem to be quite sure that Chou is using his good influence as well. I must say that I am only about half convinced of these arguments about China because, so anxious are they for support, that I sense some tendency to convince themselves of what they desperately need to believe. My friend yesterday argued passionately that the Chinese must be brought into the United Nations as soon as possible because "if they were here the whole balance would be different". He is a bit vague on all this but he does seem to believe that the Chinese, if they did not differ openly with the Russians in the United Nations, would at least exercise considerable influence on them and, what is more important for the Poles, would prevent the domination of the Communist bloc by a single state. He was extremely anxious to know whether we would be moving in this direction and asked me what could be done to further this along. I told him of the great difficulties in the way of such a step, especially in the United States, and spoke of the importance of their influencing the Chinese to be cautious and sensible. I said, furthermore, that the Poles were probably now in a position to give the Western powers advice on policies within the Communist bloc which we would listen to with care. If the Poles could give the Americans and the rest of us convincing proof that the Chinese Communists had used their influence on behalf of sensible policies in Hungary, this would undoubtedly have an affect on our attitude towards Peking.

I think you might consider this letter as a partial answer to your telegram No. SS301 of December 7.† It seems to me that the Poles would very much like us to help them economically. Could the matter be raised with Sieradski?

Although these confidences have been offered pretty freely I trust that they will not be very widely circulated. If you should wish to send them to Warsaw or to other sensitive posts I should feel happier if they were destroyed immediately. If there is objection in Ottawa to my keeping in close touch with the Poles, please let me know.

In conclusion I might report a story which I have learned has been current in Poland. According to this story, during the past couple of months the Hungarians have behaved like Poles (i.e. irrationally gallant); the Poles have behaved like Czechs; and the Czechs have behaved like swine.

Yours sincerely,
R.A. M[ACKAY]

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 26, 1956

It has occurred to us that the time may have come to recognize the progress made by the Gomulka régime; the easiest way to do this would be for us to appoint a Head of Mission in Poland. You are aware that our Mission there has been in the hands of a Chargé ever since its creation in 1947. In this connection I though I would pass on to you copy of a memorandum dated December 21 which was prepared in the Department and which represents pretty well my own thinking in the matter.

If you agree generally with the arguments put forward I would be glad to discuss with you names of officers in the Service who might be available to fill in the post in Warsaw. The matter would then be cleared in Cabinet.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 21, 1956

APPOINTMENT OF A CANADIAN AMBASSADOR OR MINISTER TO POLAND

On several occasions over the course of the last six to eight months, I have suggested that one of the ways by which we might encourage and profit by the "thaw" in Eastern Europe would be to increase and strengthen our diplomatic representation in that area. You will recall that prior to the outbreak of the Hungarian revolution, we were seriously thinking of opening a mission in Budapest within the next twelve to eighteen months. That possibility is obviously ruled out for the present, but I think we should give serious consideration now to strengthening our representation in Poland. Although the situation remains uneasy, the new Polish leadership has managed with some success to attain a greater degree of independence of the U.S.S.R. than any other satellite and, in terms of freedom of expression, more than Yugoslavia as well.

2. Gomulka has displayed a considerable amount of courage and firmness in demanding and obtaining from the Russians a measure of independence of action in both foreign and domestic policy for his country. While, for a number of reasons, he apparently intends to maintain close ties with the Soviet Union, I think he is sincere in his desire to improve and broaden his relations with the Western world. I expect that his ability to remain in power and to keep under control the unrest which certainly exists in Poland will depend very largely on his ability to improve the economic conditions in Poland. but his ability to keep control of a difficult situation is also likely to be enhanced if he can demonstrate that the course which he is trying to steer will lead to better relations with the Western world. I think it is important, therefore, as a "Gomulka course" for Poland is probably the most that we can hope for at the present time, that we should provide what encouragement we can for the present régime.

3. In considering our relations with the new Poland, we cannot, of course, assume that present trends will continue. By an adroit sense of timing, the more nationalistic elements of the Polish Communist Party have forestalled an anti-communist uprising which might have gone the way of the tragedy of Hungary. But anti-communist and anti-Russian popular feelings are still strong and will not be satisfied merely by the favourable economic agreement which Gomulka has won from the Soviet Union and by the liberalization of the Polish Government's internal and external policies.

4. To consolidate his régime it would help Gomulka if he could establish better relations with the West. In our judgement it is in the interests of the West to go half way to meet him to foster evolution rather than revolution, since the alternative to a Gomulka régime is probably the imposition by force of a Moscow puppet. If they stick by their declaration of policy of October 30, Soviet leaders may be expected to permit Gomulka to take a more or less independent line so long as he does not prejudice the Soviet security sphere defined by the Warsaw Pact. This gives him scope for increased diplomatic, economic and cultural contacts with the West which he needs for domestic political reasons as well as to meet Poland's formidable economic difficulties. While we must, therefore, recognise that the Gomulka régime may not endure, it has, in our opinion, a better chance of surviving and developing in a manner favourable to Western interests than any alternative régime we can foresee in present circumstances, i.e., until Moscow is willing to let Poland and East Germany out of its orbit — which will probably happen when, as Khrushchev once said, "shrimps learn to whistle".

5. You will recall that you discussed with the Foreign Minister of Poland in San Francisco in June 1955 the possibility of an exchange of Ministers between Canada and Poland, and that the same subject was discussed with the Polish Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs in December of that year.[119] On the latter occasion, we told Mr. Naszkowski that we welcomed his suggestion that the Poles appoint a Minister in Ottawa but that for personnel reasons, it would be difficult for us to reciprocate in the near future. We said, however, that this should not be interpreted as any lack of interest in better relations. We have had, so far as I know, no recent requests from the Poles on this subject but I feel sure that they would welcome an initiative from us at this time, all the more so as it is difficult for Gomulka, for the sake of his relations with the U.S.S.R., to take too much initiative on the question of improving relations with the West.

6. The political consideration of giving encouragement to Gomulka in the comparatively independent course which he is taking is uppermost in my mind in recommending that we try to appoint a Canadian Ambassador to Poland in the near future. Trade considerations are also important. The Poles are certainly going to need assistance from the West in addition to the substantial assistance which they are getting from the Soviet Union as a result of the recent agreement reached between Poland and the U.S.S.R. They have stressed that they want trade, not aid, although they may request credits in order to finance purchases which are urgently needed. They are already in touch with the U.S. Government and have expressed an interest in obtaining a 300 million dollar loan from the U.S. According to the Americans, the Poles are very anxious not to give the impression that they are going "hat in hand" to Washington. They have also asked for a long-term loan from the British.

7. Provided we are in a position to extend credits to Poland, I think there is a good prospect of future Canadian wheat sales to that country to help make up their very serious deficiency. I think that our prospects of getting into the Polish market would be improved if we were able to give the impression that we were interested not just in wheat sales but in generally closer relations between Canada and Poland.

8. You have agreed that we should give some encouragement to the exchange of visits with Poland. We have made arrangements, with your approval, to receive a small delegation of Polish architects in the very near future. Glenn Gould, the Canadian pianist, will probably include Poland on his European itinerary next spring, and we are encouraging him to do so. Strengthening of our mission in Warsaw by the appointment of an Ambassador or a Minister would, I think, make it easier for us to take initiatives in the cultural field as well.[120]

9. If you agree that it is desirable to appoint an Ambassador or a Minister to Poland in the very near future — and I think the political arguments which I have spelled out only briefly in this memorandum argue strongly in favour of it — I think we should raise the subject with the Poles fairly soon. The simplest way to do this would be to ask for the Agrément of a new Minister without asking that the Mission be raised from the status of Legation to Embassy. In turn, I presume the Poles would wish to appoint a Head of Mission in Canada.

[120] Voir 2e partie./See Part 2.

10. It may be, although I doubt it, that the Polish Government would link the question of the appointment of a Head of Mission with that of the Polish art treasures. In view of the fact that much greater freedom is now being allowed the Catholic Church in Poland it may make it somewhat easier to find a solution to the problem of the treasures. This may be done through religious channels at a later stage.

11. I presume you would wish to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister at his convenience; I am therefore attaching copy of this memorandum and a covering note for the Prime Minister which if found satisfactory you might wish to initial.

RESULTS OF THE POLISH ELECTIONS

You may be interested in the attached analysis of the January 20 Polish elections, based on information received to date. Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 23, 1957

RESULTS OF THE POLISH ELECTIONS

Gomulka's last-minute appeal to the Polish electorate to endorse his Government, dramatically summed up in his statement that "To cross out Communist candidates is to cross Poland off the map of Europe", together with the strong support of the Roman Catholic church whose recent gains were at stake appear to have been the deciding factors in the heavy endorsement of the Gomulka Government in the January 20 elections.

2. Although the final figures have not yet been published, information received to date indicates that approximately 90% of the electorate turned out to vote without having been subjected to direct political pressure or police supervision as in former years, and that few, if any, important candidates on whom Gomulka depends for support were defeated. There was no violence, and observers noted that few voters took advantage of the opportunity to cross names off the ballots, perhaps partly because those who used the polling booths would be suspected of crossing names off the ballots, while those who voted for approved candidates had no need to mark their ballot in any way. On the whole, however, it is probable that the majority of the voters felt that failure to support Gomulka could mark the end of any hopes for political and economic stability in Poland, and the example of Hungary must have had a strong deterrent effect.

3. This triumph for Gomulka has placed very heavy responsibilities on his shoulders. To maintain the trust the people have placed in him, he will have to carry out his programme of economic and social reforms in the face of severe domestic difficulties — coal and agriculture shortages, inadequate housing, production difficulties and lack of foreign exchange, to name a few. Although the elections have strengthened his position within the country, he is still not completely secure. The Sejm is, of course, far from being the controlling body in the Government, and until Gomulka can get rid of his opponents within the Party, or come to an understanding with them, he will be unable to carry out his policies unhampered. During the last two weeks before the elections, a number of minor officials were expelled from the Party, and Gomulka now proposes to use the people's mandate to break the hold of the pro-Soviet faction on Party machinery. It has been revealed since the elections that a violent intra-Party struggle took place during the campaign and that the pro-Soviet faction (now, in deference to the Soviet Union, called "conservatives"!) had tried every means at their disposal to defeat Gomulka's most prominent supporters in the elections. It is now evident that Gomulka intends to clean up the Party before calling the next Party Congress. The latter had been scheduled for March but has now been postponed until 1958.

4. As far as the West is concerned, the results of the elections appear as satisfactory as could be expected in that they promise reasonable assurance of a more stable Government in Poland. This is particularly important at a time when Polish requests for economic aid, increased trade, and exchanges are under consideration in several Western countries, including Canada. After the events in Hungary, it is unlikely that an indictment of Gomulka's national communism by the Polish electorate could have caused anything but alarm and embarrassment in the West, since we could then have anticipated a reversion to Soviet-style communism, either by means of direct military intervention by Soviet forces in order to quell disturbances, or through the Polish Stalinists reestablishing their control over the Party in Poland. As the representative of the evolutionary Polish communist forces, Gomulka's régime is to be preferred to the present alternatives. His survival may, however, hinge in large measure on his ability to bring about an improvement in economic conditions. Rightly or wrongly, public opinion in Poland is convinced that this will only be possible if Western credits can be obtained.

5. Since this memorandum was prepared, press despatches from Warsaw have reported that Gomulka's National Front has won 98.4% of the vote. We would have been more impressed had the percentage been lower.

Le chargé d'Affaires de la légation en Pologne
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chargé d'Affaires, Legation in Poland, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Warsaw, May 7, 1957

PRESENT SITUATION IN POLAND

I am becoming increasingly concerned as to the future of Poland. When I returned from vacation at Easter, I checked with my colleagues in the Diplomatic Corps and I found that there is general anxiety as to what the next few months will bring forth. Without exception, they regard the economic situation as serious and the potential source of trouble. There is of course the intense nationalism of the Poles, their opposition to the régime and there are some minority groups including Germans and Jews, although not nearly as many as in pre-war Poland. The Poles have learned to live under a communist régime and they are acutely conscious that they are surrounded by units of the Red Army. They also know what happened in Hungary.

2. The basic fact of life in Poland is that there is a scarcity of consumer goods. They are in fact paying now for the policy of the last ten years which has robbed this country for the benefit of the Soviet Union and diverted its resources and energy into the manufacture of war materials. In heavy industry, considerable adaptation has taken place and Poland is an exporter of such things as locomotives and railway equipment. It is the things which the average citizen wishes to buy for himself and his family which are the source of trouble.

3. If prices were allowed to respond to the normal influences of supply and demand, there would be drastic inflation overnight. The government is trying to maintain the price structure. To this end, it dare not increase the purchasing power of the people and therefore it dare not raise wages. Similarly, faced with a breakdown of its collectivization programme and a virtual embargo by the countryside on compulsory deliveries, it promised abolition of the latter, but on the condition arrears were met. It needed the arrears to feed the nation, but could not increase the prices of farm produce without making the cost of living and generally low standard of living even more unbearable. It also dared not immediately allow agricultural prices to rise on a free market. It has tried to reorganize agriculture on the basis of voluntary cooperation in cooperatives and, through cooperative buying of machinery, fertilizer and other farm supplies from industry, to allow the general price level between the industrial and agricultural sectors of the economy to be fixed on the basis of central bargaining which gave it some control. The response of the countryside has been slow. The embargo continued and the wheat stockpile discussed in Washington is now urgently desired for its psychological effect on the countryside to induce the peasants to desist from holding out for higher prices. The foregoing is a rough outline of the inflation problem. The government is failing to control the situation. People are clamouring for freedom in all sorts of ways. They live a far freer and easier life than they did two years ago or even a year ago. Fear of the secret police has largely disappeared.

4. There has been a succession of incidents throughout the country which have followed a familiar pattern. Someone, generally drunk, has created a disturbance. The police have quite naturally tried to preserve order. Companions of the inebriate have joined in. A crowd has gathered. The police have orders not to shoot or take other action which might provoke the populace. The crowd generally follows to some police station and gets maddened at the sight of communist authority. The police are generally greatly outnumbered. Ultimately, there is some bloodshed and publicity.

5. Other trouble has started in factories. Worker's councils were designed to give the workers some say in the running of a plant and generally, by making them more alive to the problems of the plant, to secure greater cooperation and efficiency. The setting up of workers' councils was paralleled by a programme of decentralization of management. Industry was nevertheless expected to operate within general plans worked out by the economists.

6. In the Warsaw area 80% of industrial establishments have workers' councils and an average of 40% of the councils are communists. Nevertheless, in some the communists have been a small minority, and recently an election was fought in the Warsaw construction industry with the slogan openly broadcast: "No communists in the council". The workers generally consider that the councils should discuss wages. The role of the Party is to see that the workers are "educated and also to head off discussion of things not within their competence".

7. When the results of the first quarter were announced it was disclosed that industrial production was 107.1% of the target. However, this quarter was experimental in a period of change and it was emphasized that the target had been set deliberately low. Much more serious was the fact that the rise in wages was 28.5% higher than the corresponding period of 1956. Some rise had been planned, but the Minister of Finance said that the rate was 8% higher than had been planned.

8. During the debate on the budget, a party deputy who is also vice-chairman of the Central Council of Trade Unions, discussed the rise of wages. He said that in 1956 national income had risen by 7% and consumption by 125.8%, while in 1957 industrial production was to rise by 4%, and agricultural production by 3.7% while consumption was to grow by 11%. The increased consumption was to be obtained by limiting investments, outlays on armaments and even at the cost of obtaining foreign credits. This statement was essentially a definition of government policy and far removed from a similar speech by a trade union leader in any western country when a central issue was the standard of living. The speaker let the cat out of the bag, however, when he said the government's policy could not be a long-term one and added "that is why the categorical postulates for wage rises, supported by resolutions, mass meetings and even in some cases by strikes, do harm to the permanent foundations of the national economy ...", etc.

9. It was not disclosed why the wage rise was 8% higher than had been planned, but it is pretty obvious from the continuous stream of articles designed to improve the party's handling of the workers' councils and the frantic efforts of the government to avoid incidents which might start any mass movement has resulted in the authorities giving way on wage demands. In fact, I think we are witnessing in Poland a general breakdown of the communist control over the economy.

10. Blackmarketeering is rife. I have reported the operations of PKO, an agency designed to give Poles greater benefits than they could obtain under official exchange rates on gifts, inheritances, pensions, etc. received from abroad. Recently the operations of PKO were extended to enable gifts to be surrendered for cash, merchandise imported through PKO then being put on the market. This merchandise is bought by speculators who are tipped off when it is available and sold openly at prices three and four times the cost of similar articles which occasionally (very rarely) are seen in state stores. Western merchandise, such as refrigerators, radios, cars are sold, re-sold again at substantial mark-ups. Once they get past the official control offices of some sort and the law permits uncontrolled transactions, the prices invariably skyrocket.

11. Sham transactions are the rule whenever the government control is inconvenient.

12. Every western mission is overwhelmed with consular work, frantically endeavouring to increase its staff and urgently looking for accommodation. The Foreign Ministry has given up. I have reported the various efforts we have made and it is outside the scope of this despatch to discuss details. However, our experiences in recent weeks have made me acutely conscious of the extent to which Poles are trading on the basis that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. Briefly, everyone wants substantial advance payments. The dollar is triumphant. The problem is to try to give us some long-term protection.

13. Internal devaluation of the zloty has not been suggested. Memories of the population of the last devaluation are still vivid and I am inclined to think that the government would not dare to impose a similar scheme at this time. The Minister of Finance, when the budget was under consideration, said that the issue of currency had proceeded according to plan. I took this to mean that there had been no resort to the printing press and indeed I think the Polish economists such as Oskar Lange and others are above that sort of thing. A favourable symptom is that deposits in savings accounts are said to have substantially increased, which indicates a greater degree of confidence in the government, at least on the part of those who have savings to deposit.

14. Much of the unrest and disturbances can be traced to youth. The party has had all sorts of trouble with youth organizations. I have concluded that the younger generation has learned at an impressionable age within the privacy of homes, sometimes in shared rooms in miserably cramped quarters, what their parents really think of the régime. If the country had had better housing accommodation and social services generally, propaganda through the schools might have been more effective. As it is, the notion which I used to hear expressed in the West that the younger generation would be lost to communism has proved completely fallacious.

15. We sent you Cardinal Wyszynski's speech to the youth of Wroclaw, one of the most magnificent speeches I have ever read. It is clear that the Cardinal is deeply disturbed at the injury to the moral fibre of the people of Poland and its youth in particular. I think he probably considers that, however much he may not like it, some cooperation with the régime is desirable simply to enable the church to exert some influence toward the improvement of the moral fibre of the nation.

16. To sum up, the economic situation poses almost insuperable problems for the government. The population is restless, wise when it reflects, but frustrated to the point of restlessness, almost explosive on occasion. If it became exercised at some development, the situation might get rapidly out of hand.

17. The bright side of the picture is that there are innumerable intellectuals, leaders, non-communists, intelligent and generally decent people who are making an effort to improve conditions. The ministries, such as Foreign Trade for example, have brought men into responsible positions who were formerly marking time in jobs beneath their capacity while party stalwarts mismanaged the country. Many of them are working wholeheartedly for the present régime simply because the developments in its current programme are headed in the right direction. Their concern is not to undo what is good by provoking a reaction in the party at the top or in Moscow, or in both places.

18. I have felt for some time that some of the officials were uneasy. Obviously any intelligent person would be uneasy. However, I put this uneasiness in the context of their uncertainty concerning the top party direction. There is a possibility that Gomulka is in ill health and that this fact has been covered up. There have been recurrent rumours which have brought forth prompt denials. At one time, he was reported to have been shot. On another, wounded in the shoulder. One of the latest is that he had cancer. I have not reported these incidents because they were obviously fabricated and I accepted the official replies which attributed them to Stalinist elements trying to undermine the October achievements. I was told, however, by the First Secretary of the Norwegian Legation, a man with considerable experience in communist régimes and who speaks Polish fluently, that he had concluded that Gomulka has lung trouble. He is inclined to accept a report that he has a non-malignant tumour. According to this report, he must shortly have an operation and it is a question whether it is Moscow, Stockholm or Switzerland. The betting is Stockholm. He says he was told by the leading cancer specialist in Warsaw that he could not have cancer because he would have been certain to have heard of it.

19. It is possible that this story may be equally without foundation. However, I have been impressed with the fact that Gomulka never puts in an appearance at receptions or indeed any event where ceremony or protocol is involved. His conduct is consistent with the theory that he is conserving his health. Another symptom is the absence of propaganda building up Gomulka in recent months. For example, the U.S. Embassy put its large staff on a tour of the city to get an impression of the May Day signs and photographs. They could only find one picture in the whole of Warsaw of Gomulka and that in a relatively inconspicuous place. It is no doubt good policy to give the party credit for the recent developments. However, I have wondered whether precautions are not being taken against a popular reaction if for any reasons Gomulka had to step down and the régime were to lose its immense prestige, now diminished, but which has by no means disappeared.

20. The net result of all these things has been to make me uneasy — I cannot find a more appropriate word. I have never in my life been in a situation where I felt quite so uncertain as to what the future might bring forth.[122]

Mr Léger: I have just seen this despatch from Warsaw. It strikes me as a very able piece of reporting which should be commended. (Unnumbered despatch of May 7, 1957) It also makes me all the more dubious about the role we are playing over wheat. What can we hope to accomplish by our protests (which are only for the record) which would possibly justify the delay we are imposing on the U.S.-Polish wheat agreement [Voir chapitre premier, 3e partie, section A/See Chapter 1, Part 3, Section A], an agreement which, as this despatch makes clear, is essential to prevent collapse in Poland. If the history of Hungary is repeated in Poland I hope the Dep[artmen]t of Trade and Commerce will be happy. Could we draw this despatch to the Minister's attention? J.W. H[olmes]

POLISH ART TREASURES

32. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to his memorandum on the situation respecting the Polish art treasures sent to Canada at the beginning of the last war. These had originally been stored at the Central Experimental Farm. Subsequently, a portion was removed and returned to Poland. The remainder was now distributed between the Quebec Provincial Museum, the Ottawa branch of the Bank of Montreal and, it was believed, a Polish Catholic Church in eastern Ontario.

The Polish government had consistently charged the Canadian government with responsibility for the safe return of these treasures. Canada's position, on the other hand, was that the government had no responsibility for the art collection, and that Poland could have recourse to the courts if it so wished. Recently the legal position had been re-examined, and it seemed that Poland would not now be able to bring civil proceedings before the courts. It was also thought that the Federal government might have incurred a legal responsibility for the protection of the treasures held in Quebec and for their return. It would appear that such parts of the collection within the Federal government's power to return, should be restored. As a first step, the two boxes of treasures held in the Bank of Montreal, most of which appeared to be uncontested Polish state property, might be obtained. Later, when further information was available on the question of ownership of particular pieces, they might be restored to Poland or to individual owners.

It was recommended that the Bank of Montreal be given an indemnity against all loss, claims or expense arising from delivery to the government of Canada of the Polish treasures in the bank's possession, and that no announcement be made about this, or no undertaking given at this stage to the Polish government as to the ultimate disposal of this part of the art collection.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 5, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 54-56†)

33. Mr. Pearson noted, however, that consideration of this proposal could be deferred until a more convenient time for discussion.

34. During the discussion it was suggested that the present was not an auspicious time to open up the question, and that it should be deferred at least until after the election in Quebec. It was also pointed out that, by taking over the cases held in the Bank of Montreal and returning the contents either to Poland or to the rightful owners, if they could be found, the government was assuming a responsibility to see that other such treasures held in Canada were returned.

35. The Cabinet deferred decision on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the disposition of that portion of the Polish art treasures held by the Bank of Montreal.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 171-56 Ottawa, August 1956

POLISH ART TREASURES

On June 27, the Polish Minister of Foreign Affairs handed a note to the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Warsaw on the subject of the Polish art treasures. The Note is couched in terms strong enough to leave no doubt as to the importance attached to the return of these treasures to Poland by the Canadian Government. The Note states that the "Polish Government would like to recall that it has presented this matter to the Government of Canada on various occasions since the end of hostilities, i.e. for 11 years through diplomatic channels in numerous notes, official interviews and public declarations ..."; that the Polish Government had obtained assurances from the Canadian Government as far back as 1952 that vigorous steps would be taken to ensure the return of the treasures to Poland; that these assurances had not been fulfilled; and that the "Polish Government is compelled to transmit anew its categorical request to the Canadian Government that the priceless collections of Polish culture and history be returned to the Polish people".

2. The Note then points to the "rising indignation of all Poles and friends of Poland" and to the growing concern over the fact that the treasures are not being stored under proper conditions, and that "lacking proper and careful conservation" are "subject to unavoidable destruction". "The Canadian Government", it asserts, "cannot ignore the opinion of many experts, prominent men in culture and art in Poland, Canada and other countries who have warned against the danger threatening the famous 136 Arras tapestries and other treasures", and "it will undoubtedly admit that it has no justification for the losses sustained by Polish and world culture resulting from keeping the above-said treasures in Canada". The return to Poland of her undisputable national property would also confirm numerous assurances by Canadian statesmen addressed to representatives of the Polish government and in the international field to the effect that the Canadian Government was endeavouring to remove all obstacles hampering international co-operation and friendship. The Polish Government declares that together with the Polish people it will not spare any effort to obtain the return of the Polish treasures, that it expects the Canadian Government to take immediate steps and give the necessary orders so that her national monuments may be returned to Poland. The Polish Government is anxious to end as soon as possible the diplomatic correspondence in this matter and is of the opinion that the only reply to this note will be the return of the Polish treasures".

3. This Note is the most recent development in a dispute which has been going on since 1945 concerning a number of cases and trunks of Polish art treasures brought to Canada in 1940 for safekeeping. The attached record provides a brief history of the fate of these treasures in Canada. I should like, however, to draw your attention to their present whereabouts. As you probably know, 23 trunks and one case are in the Provincial Museum in Quebec City and according to the Premier of Quebec, would be released only in compliance with the order of "a competent court". Two trunks are being held in the vaults of the Bank of Montreal, Ottawa, which is only willing to release them over the signatures of the depositors or their executors, or on condition that it be promised compensation for any loss it might sustain by virtue of turning over the treasures to the Canadian Government. The location of the remaining trunks is less certain. They are believed to be held in the basement of a Roman Catholic Church at Wilno, near Killaloe, Ontario, but this has not been verified.

4. The question, on which I submitted a memorandum to the Cabinet on March 5, 1956, is now even more likely to become an international issue, and, unless the Canadian Government can give some satisfaction to the Polish government, we will almost certainly be faced with a dispute in the United Nations or in the International Court of Justice. The Polish Foreign Minister hinted at this when he called in our Chargé d'Affaires in Warsaw to present the Note of June 27. He stated that in the event of there being no satisfactory result from the present request, the Polish Government would consider other ways of settling the matter. I think there can be little doubt that the position of Canada would be legally and morally difficult to defend, and that we would be placed in a most embarrassing position if we are forced to defend ourselves before world public opinion. I might note incidentally that the Soviet Government has recently returned to Roumania historical Roumanian treasures which had been removed to the U.S.S.R. during the war. A Soviet statement pointed out that the government and people of the U.S.S.R. have always regarded the Roumanian treasures as the inalienable possession of the Roumanian people themselves, in spite of being at war with their government, and that the Soviet people had carefully preserved all these works of art in spite of the devastations of two World Wars. The Soviet Union has likewise returned the Dresden Art Collection to East Germany and other treasures to Poland and Yugoslavia, all reportedly in good condition.

5. On almost every conceivable occasion during the past ten years the Polish government has protested the role of the Canadian government in this affair and charged the Canadian government with responsibility for the safe return of the treasures. At the same time the records of the Department of External Affairs contain evidence of the existence of a sentiment in Canada emanating particularly from Roman Catholics and emigrants from Communist-dominated countries, that these treasures should not be returned to the present Communist régime in Poland. The Canadian government originally took the position that the dispute was one between the Polish government and its own citizens; that Canada had assumed no responsibility for the art collection and that the present government of Poland could have recourse to the Canadian courts if it so wished.

6. Over the last two years we have re-examined our legal position and this has resulted in a modification of some of our previous views; these modifications have not been stated to the Polish Legation. It is not clear that the Statute of Limitations in Ontario and the corresponding provisions of the civil law in Quebec would now prevent the Polish government from bringing civil proceedings before the courts even if it wished to; but in any case that Government has made it quite evident that it holds the Canadian Government responsible for the return of all the treasures and it is not prepared to submit the matter to the jurisdiction of a Canadian court. Canadian recognition of the Polish government in 1945 necessarily involved recognition of the unconditional right of the present Polish régime to property owned by previous governments of that State. As I said earlier, because of actions taken in Canada by private individuals and by the Quebec government, there is every possibility that the Canadian government has incurred an international legal responsibility for the protection of all the treasures held in Canada and for the return to Poland of that part of the treasures which is being held by the authorities of the Province of Quebec, i.e. by Her Majesty in right of Quebec. I therefore believe that the Canadian government should, if possible, restore to the Polish government at least such parts of the collection as it may be within our power to return. By such action we should be able to some extent to clear ourselves before the bar of world opinion and prove our good faith in this matter.

7. In order to make progress on the matter we have considered a number of possible solutions. The constitutional aspects of the case might be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, or the Polish government might be encouraged to take the case to an international tribunal. However, because of the likelihood of the Canadian government being judged responsible for the restoration of all or part of the collection to Poland, it seems inadvisable to seek a judicial decision, nationally or internationally. The Polish government has in any case in the past made no move to seek judicial solution in the Canadian courts.

8. As the most practical course, therefore, the Bank of Montreal was approached by my Department concerning the possibility of releasing the two trunks in their possession. In a letter dated August 18, 1955, the Bank of Montreal replied that it was prepared to deliver the two trunks to the Canadian government provided that the Canadian government agrees to indemnify the Bank against all loss, claim or expense which the Bank might suffer by reason of such delivery; if the Canadian government was satisfied that the trunks and their contents belonged to the Polish government, the Canadian government could then, on its own responsibility, turn them over to the Polish government.

9. Officials of the Department of Finance have indicated that they would be agreeable to the Canadian government undertaking to give the Bank of Montreal an indemnity of the type required. The Department of Justice has drafted a suitable text, a copy of which is attached.

10. The bulk of the property deposited in the Bank of Montreal is uncontested Polish state property according to an inventory provided in 1947 by the anti-Communist "London Poles" and signed by Mr. Polkowski, one of the joint depositors. Three of the items in the trunks are alleged, by the London Poles, to be private property owned respectively by a Polish ecclesiastical institution and a Polish Countess.

11. It may be asked what is likely to happen to the trunks if the Canadian government does not acquire possession. I think that the answer is that they will remain indefinitely in the Bank. Polkowski, one of the depositors, remains anti-Communist and will not sign a release to the Polish Government. Zaleski, the other depositor who later returned to the Communist camp and is believed to have since died (or his executor if he is dead) supports the present Polish government and obviously will not join in releasing the trunks to anyone except the present Polish government.

12. I therefore recommend as a first step towards a solution of this difficult problem that Cabinet approve the granting of an indemnity, similar to that attached, to the Bank of Montreal, absolving the said Bank from all loss, claim or expense which it might suffer by reason of delivery to the Canadian government the two trunks of Polish treasures now in its possession; and that we inform the Polish authorities that a good possibility exists that we may be able to get the Bank to agree to release the trunks to the Canadian Government, which would then be turned over to the Polish authorities, but that before the Bank could be approached on this basis it would be necessary for us to request that the Polish Government undertake, in this eventuality, not to claim against either the Bank of Montreal or the Canadian Government if, when they are turned over, the treasures had been in any way damaged or deteriorated.[123]

13. I attach a brief record of the Polish art treasures dispute.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE POLISH ART TREASURES DISPUTE

In 1940 the Canadian Government permitted the entry into Canada "as the property of the Polish Government and to remain their property" a number of cases and trunks containing Polish art treasures. The treasures were later stored by the Polish Legation in the Records Storage Building of the Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa, on the clear understanding that the Canadian Government assumed no responsibility for the safekeeping of these articles.

2. In 1945, prior to the recognition by Canada of the new (Communist) Polish Government in Warsaw, most of the treasures were removed, without the knowledge or consent of the Canadian Government, by representatives of the former government-in-exile in London. After a number of manoeuvres by the two Polish factions it was established that the representatives of the anti-communist group had stored 23 trunks and one wooden case in the basement of the Hotel Dieu Convent in Quebec City. In 1948 this portion of the treasures was transferred to the Provincial Museum in Quebec City, and according to the Premier of Quebec would be released only in compliance with the order of "a competent court". The Premier of Quebec has moreover stated recently that "no deal, agreement or compromise will ever be made with the contemptible Communist Government of Poland for their return".

3. Eight cases of the treasures removed from the Records Storage Building were stored in the Convent of the Precious Blood of Jesus, Ottawa. Following inquiries of this department and the efforts of officials of the recognized Polish government we learned that this part of the collection had been released by the Convent to one of the former signing custodians and removed to places unknown. A report in 1950 suggested that the missing trunks were located in St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church at Wilno, Ontario, in the Killaloe district. The fact that the parish priest of this church, Father Wiloski, had been on very friendly terms with the former Polish Minister now in exile and that there are large vaults in both the church basement and in the Glebe House which could store a considerable number of packing cases and boxes seems to give credence to this report but it has not yet been verified. In March 1951 the suggestion was put forward that we ask the R.C.M.P. to confirm the existence of the cases at Wilno either by specifically asking Mr. Kosar or Father Wiloski, or if they proved unco-operative to obtain direct entry into the church building by means either of a search warrant or by a less formal method. However it was decided temporarily to drop the matter for the following reasons:

(a) No search warrant could legally be taken out without Court action, and the Polish Government was evidently not prepared to take the matter to court;

(b) It was considered that a formal request for information from Father Wiloski might result in a new wave of unfavourable publicity and possible further intrigue between the rival Polish factions;

(c) We did not consider that the R.C.M.P. could be expected to provide indefinite surveillance of the Wilno area nor, after the Hotel Dieu incident, could we expect them to relocate the treasures should they be spirited away again.

As a result, despite periodic suggestions that we take steps to explore further the situation at Killaloe — if only to ascertain the condition of the treasures — no action has been taken since that time.

4. Two other trunks were deposited, locked, in the Bank of Montreal, Ottawa, in March 1945. The signing depositors, Dr. S. Swierz-Zaleski and Mr. Joseph Polkowski, did not specify to the Bank at the time whether they were acting in their official capacity as custodians appointed by the former Polish Government or as private individuals. (Zaleski subsequently returned to the communist fold in Poland and the Bank thinks he is dead. Polkowski, who is still anti-communist, is believed to be in Canada). We have recently directed efforts to obtaining the release of these cases from the Bank. The legal position of the Bank is that before release of the trunks it requires the signatures of the two original depositors, but one of the depositors will not sign. The Bank has, however, indicated that it will be willing to release the trunks to the Canadian Government if the latter will indemnify the Bank and hold it harmless from all loss which it might suffer as a result of the release of the trunks.

5. The portion of the treasures which remained at the Records Storage Building was removed by the Polish Legation (Communist) and returned to Poland in 1948.

6. Since the end of the war we have received numerous protests and demands for the return of the treasures which, the Poles have alleged, were delivered to Canada "in trust". These protests have taken the form of Notes to the Department of External Affairs and to the Canadian Legation in Warsaw, letters and petitions from individuals and organizations in Poland, private conversations between Polish officials and members of the Department of External Affairs, and bitter articles in the Polish press. The question was also raised in the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1949 by the Polish Delegation. In reply to the latter's allegations the Canadian representative, General McNaughton, made a statement to the Plenary Meeting of the General Assembly on April 28, 1949, in which he reiterated the position of the Canadian Government to the effect that the Courts of Canada have always been open to the Polish officials, and that the Canadian Government had never accepted the treasures "in trust". This was the position which had been taken by Mr. St-Laurent in a statement to the House of Commons on March 4, 1948, and in our reply to the Polish Note of April 20, 1949, which was transmitted to the Polish Legation on September 20, 1949.[124] The last Note received from the Poles prior to that of June 27 was in March, 1952, when the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Warsaw was asked to call at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs where he was handed a more strongly-worded note than had to date been received.[125] We did not, however, abandon our position, and Mr. Pearson informed the Polish Foreign Minister in New York in December, 1952, that Canada had not accepted the treasures "in trust" and that court proceedings remained open to the Poles. Mr. Pearson did agree with him, however, that Canada had some responsibility to do everything possible to ensure that the treasures did not deteriorate, and promised to look into this question to see whether anything could be done.

7. Since Mr. Pearson's conversation with the Polish Foreign Minister in December, 1952, there has been no public statement or official communication to the Poles by the Canadian Government along the lines of our previous policy. This change in our position was due to a re-examination of certain legal aspects of the problem which revealed that the Canadian Government is probably responsible under international law for the portion of the treasures seized by the Quebec Government, and that the Polish Government might not be able to seek redress in the ordinary courts in Canada. Moreover it became clear that the Government could not avoid accepting a certain responsibility for the condition of the treasures; their alleged deterioration could make Canada subject to censure not only by Poland but by world opinion as well. We did not, however, indicate to the Polish Government these changes in our position, but instead assured it informally on a number of occasions during the past two years that we were keeping the matter constantly under review. Our position was made easier by the fact that the Poles in recent years have seemed more interested in making progress step by step than in embarking on a major effort to embarrass us internationally, and had accepted our assurances that we were attempting to find a solution to the Bank of Montreal treasures as a first step. Our failure to suggest any solution prompted the Note of June 27.

Note du chef de la Direction du Commonwealth et du Moyen-Orient pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, Commonwealth and Middle East Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], January 12, 1957

The new Polish Chargé, Mr. Sieradski called on the Minister this morning. He spoke of the difficult and delicate position in which Poland found itself, especially now with an election due on January 20. The chief danger came from the two extremes: those who would prefer to return to the position before the de-Stalinization and those who wished to go over to an openly anti-Soviet policy. The situation was complicated further by economic difficulties, but the Government had already received generous Soviet assistance and was at the same time turning toward the West for such commodities as cotton, wheat, agricultural and mining machinery, etc. with so far no indication of Soviet disapproval.

2. The Minister expressed sympathy with Poland's difficulties and admiration of the courage and wisdom the Poles had shown in their dealing with the Russians.

3. When the Minister referred to the question of the Polish Art Treasures, Mr. Sieradski said that he had had no instructions to speak on this topic and had not intended to mention it on his first courtesy visit. In his opinion, however, it would be of great significance and help to the Government in maintaining and consolidating the initiatives it had taken if even the part of the treasures held in the Bank could be returned. Such a gesture would gain a great measure of support for the Government from the people as a whole, for it would be an indication that the new policy was succeeding in improving relations with the West.

4. The Minister said that, speaking personally and privately, he was sure that if the Polish ecclesiatical authorities would interest themselves in the matter it might be very effective. We were facing an election here this year and the Government naturally did not wish this matter to become a controversial issue. The ordinary Canadian citizen who could not read behind the headlines did not understand the significance of a Nationalist Communist movement, and still thought of Poland merely as a Communist country and consequently pro-Soviet. There were some indications, however, with the improvement of the position of the Church in Poland, of a change of attitude in the Polish Canadian communities towards the return of the treasures.

5. The Chargé said that of the letters received at the Embassy on this subject about 99 out of 100 were in favour of the return of the treasures. Mr. Pearson said that we were looking into the legal aspects of the treasures deposited in the Bank. He understood that one of the two depositories, whose signatures were required for the release of the treasures, had died. Mr. Sieradski said that this was true, and that they had in their files a document signed by him authorizing the release of the treasures to the Polish Government. The Minister had not known of this and wondered whether the circumstance had been communicated to us. The Chargé said that he understood that the other depository, Mr. Polkowsky, now resident in Ottawa, was not opposed to the return of the treasures, but that the people behind him were. The Minister supposed that if Mr. Polkowsky signed, the matter would be solved as far as the treasures in the Bank were concerned. In any case, we would look into the matter again and see what could be done.

6. Mr. Sieradski said that he was spending a great deal of time these days reading the Polish press. It was full of critical material presented under the guise of socialism but actually anti-Communist and anti-Soviet. It was plain that now, for the first time in many years, people could say and write anything they pleased. The Government could, of course not permit action or organization for the carrying out of such opinions — that would be suicidal. He only hoped that the Polish temperament, which tended naturally to go to extremes, could be sufficiently restrained that they would not lose the ground they had gained.

7. The Minister told the Chargé that he would always be at his disposal if there were any matters he wished to take up with him. The fact that we had not exchanged Ambassadors made no difference in this respect.

Extract from Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 5, 1957

Last Saturday I had quite a long conversation with Mr. Jozef Winiewicz of the Polish Delegation. He was their Ambassador in Washington and is now Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs.

I have known him in the past, even when Poland was under Stalinist control, as a friendly and agreeable person. He now speaks much more frankly, of course, than he did because he is one of the leading moderates in the new régime and is delighted at the course of events. Indeed, he talked to me about Stalinist and Russian forces in Poland in the same terms that we would use among ourselves. He emphasized that the moderates were, however, faced with many difficult and complicated problems and that the struggle for supremacy between them and the Stalinists was still going on and the results were doubtful. One way of rallying public opinion against the Stalinists was to show them that the new régime got friendly understanding from the West. Obviously Western countries could not be too obvious in their support, any more than the Polish Government could be too obvious in its determination to follow a nationalist Polish policy. Indeed, he added, there were times when they would have to take a step backward in order to take two steps forward, but the trend was certainly in the right direction and the Western powers could help by their attitudes.

This gave him the opportunity to bring up the subject which was uppermost in his mind, the Polish treasures. He said that the Polish people were at a loss to understand why there had been no progress in settling this matter; that nothing had been done even in regard to that part of the treasure which was in the vaults of the Bank of Montreal in Ottawa. The Stalinists in Poland and the pro-Russians were continually using the fact of our refusal to do anything to meet the Poles in this regard as evidence of the irreconcilable hostility of countries like Canada even to a moderate Polish régime. They contrasted this with the Russian policy of returning to Poland everything that had been taken away during the war. Could we not do something; make a first move?

I told Winiewicz very frankly about our difficulties; that we were particularly anxious not to get this matter embroiled in domestic politics, and that we had an election coming up. However, I agreed to have another look at the question to see if we could not begin to discuss some mutually satisfactory arrangement regarding that part of the treasure in Ottawa, even if nothing could be actually done until after June.

POLISH ART TREASURES

There are a few recent developments in this question which I should like to bring to your attention.

2. As you will have noted in the press during the past few weeks, the evolution of a kind of national communism in Poland, and the support which the Catholic Church gave Gomulka in the January elections, have attracted widespread attention. The response of Poles in Canada has perhaps been more conservative than that of Poles in the United States who reacted very quickly with offers of relief when Poland's economic difficulties were publicized. Nevertheless, I have been particularly impressed by a marked change in the tone of articles in the Canadian Polish emigré press, notably in the Winnipeg Times, official organ of the Canadian Polish Congress, and ZWIAZKOWIEC, official organ of the Canadian Polish Alliance, both of which have of course been strongly anti-communist but are not now anti-Gomulka.

3. The editor of ZWIAZKOWIEC recently informed us that he was going to Poland this month to investigate conditions there on behalf of the Alliance, which now believes that there should be closer cooperation between Poles in Canada and the Gomulka Government. Many Poles have recently contributed money for Polish relief and Cardinal Wyszynski has agreed to be responsible for the distribution of this money. The Winnipeg Times has published several items expressing the opinion that the Polish Treasures belong, not to Poles in Canada, but to the people of Poland, a reversal of its previous position. As the emigré groups are in a position to facilitate the return of the Treasures, I think that these developments are of particular significance.

4. The question of the Treasures has recently been discussed by myself and members of the Department with Mr. Sieradski, the Polish Chargé d'affaires. Mr. Sieradski mentioned that the Legation had been in touch indirectly with Mr. Polkowski, one of the signatories of the Bank of Montreal Treasures. As a result of their soundings, the Polish Legation thought Mr. Polkowski might be willing to sign the papers the Bank would need in order to release the Treasures, but at present is deterred from doing so by the feeling among his principles in the Polish emigré groups in Canada that this action would not be in accordance with the wishes of all Polish Canadian groups nor with Canadian Government policy. Though Polish-Canadian opinion is still divided, developments in Poland, particularly the forthcoming visit of Cardinal Wyszynski to the Vatican may bring about greater unanimity among the emigrés on matters of national concern to Poland.

5. Mr. Sieradski also stated that the Polish Legation was in possession of a document signed by Mr. Swierz-Zaleski, the other depository of the Bank of Montreal treasures, authorizing the release of the treasures to the Polish Government. Mr. Zaleski returned to Poland in 1948 and died there in 1951.

6. On the basis of the above, we asked Mr. Sieradski if he could provide us informally with a photostat, of the Zaleski document in order that our Legal Division might study it. This has been done, and I have been advised that in view of the death of Zaleski, the document is technically inoperative from the strictly legal standpoint. We propose, however, to approach the Bank officials informally and privately in order to ascertain their precise requirements in this regard, apart from a Government indemnity such as we had discussed with them last year.[126] It may be that the Bank would consider a release signed by the surviving depositor (Mr. Polkowski), taken together with the obvious indication of intent which Mr. Zalekski's "power of attorney" represents, might meet the requirements of the Bank Directors, who are no doubt anxious to be rid of the Treasures if they can see their way to releasing them without the risk of incurring liabilities. We would however make it absolutely clear to them that the Cabinet has not yet decided to proceed with an indemnity waiver such as had been tentatively discussed with officials of the Bank last summer.

7. Depending on the results of our approach to the Bank, we might find some means of indirectly sounding out the Polish emigrés in a position to speak with authority on this matter to see whether we could come to an understanding with them which would enable Polkowski to sign a release.

8. If the Bank of Montreal would be prepared to release the two trunks in their custody on the basis of Mr. Polkowski's signature and the Zaleski document, then I think we should have to consider further whether any confidential and informal approach might be made on behalf of the Government to Mr. Polkowski or one of the other leaders of the Polish-Canadian group. Our object throughout should, I think you will agree, be to keep any governmental intervention very much in the background at this time, and so far as possible leave it to the Polish emigrés themselves to come to their own conclusions and take the credit for any progress in breaking the deadlock which may be achieved along these lines.[127]

POLISH ART TREASURES

Dear Sir:

By letter of November 7, 1956,† you requested my opinion with respect to certain legal aspects of the above matter. Certain discussions have been held between Miss Ritchie of this Department and officers of your own in an attempt to ascertain the questions upon which my comments were desired. I understand that these questions may be summarized as follows:

1. Whether Canada is under any international obligation to Poland arising out of:

(a) the storage of the treasures on Federal property and the entry of the Polish treasures as Polish State property in July, 1940 and the mere presence of the treasures in Canada;

(b) the removal of some parts of the treasure from storage in the Records Storage Building, Ottawa, in the Spring of 1945, by representatives of the Polish Government-In-Exile;

(c) any alleged failure of Canada to provide assistance to the new Polish Government in locating and obtaining possession of the treasure;

(d) any failure of Canada to prosecute the persons who removed the treasure from the Records Storage Building or subsequent places of custody or who have in their possession any part of the treasure.

2. What possible steps might be taken to recover the treasures.

3. Whether Polkowski, one of the original depositors of the treasure in the Bank of Montreal, could be prosecuted under Section 282 of the Criminal Code of Canada for breach of trust.

4. Whether Canada would be liable to Poland for deterioration of the treasures.

---

[127] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree L. St. L[aurent]

With respect to paragraphs (a) and (b) of the first question, I have not been referred to any authority that Canada could be said to have incurred any international obligation to Poland arising out of the matters therein set forth. The treasures were entered as Polish State property under custody of an official of the Polish Government, and without any inventory of the contents being furnished to the Canadian Government; they were held first at the Polish Consulate in Ottawa, under the custody of officials of the then-recognized Polish Government; they were stored thereafter by an arrangement between the Consul General of Poland, Victor Podoski, and Gustave Lanctot, then Dominion Archivist. The latter arrangement is set out in an exchange of letters dated August 1 and August 2, 1940, which supports the contention that Poland remained in full control of the space allocated, and retained a "free hand" in dealing with the treasures. The present Polish Government must be taken to be bound by this agreement.

Further, since full control over the treasures during such time as the former Polish Government was recognized by Canada, was exercised exclusively by the Government of Poland in the same manner as it exercised control over any of its other property in Canada, the Canadian Government could not legally have intervened to secure control of the treasures from the then-recognized Government of Poland.

Accordingly, on the above facts, I have not been able to ascertain any basis upon which Canada could be said to have become responsible to Poland by reason of the entry of the treasures into Canada or their storage on Federal property under the exclusive control of the Polish Government in accordance with the arrangement noted above.

Similarly, since those portions of the treasures which are the subject of complaint were removed by persons acting under the instructions of the Polish Government-in-Exile in the Spring of 1945, while such Government was still officially recognized by Canada and while its acts with respect to this Polish State property could not be questioned by Canada, I am unable to ascertain any legal basis upon which Canada can be said to have become responsible to Poland for the removal of the treasures from the Records Storage Building.

Paragraph (c) of the first question raises the problem whether Canada is under international responsibility to Poland arising out of any alleged failure of Canada to provide assistance to the new Polish Government in locating the treasure. I am not in possession of enough facts to be able to provide any comments of assistance on this aspect.

With respect to paragraph (d) of the first question, it appears that a State would be subject to international liability if it has failed to show "due diligence" in prosecuting and punishing wrong doers within its jurisdiction who have attacked the persons or property of foreigners. No information has been brought to my attention, however, which would suggest that any crime has been committed.

By the second major question noted above, the problem is raised as to the steps which might be taken to recover the treasure. The legal questions could probably be most satisfactorily determined by civil proceedings commenced by the Polish Government against the person or persons believed to have custody or control over the treasures. You might wish to refer to my letter of April 27, 1949 to Mr. E.R. Hopkins of your Department, suggesting that the Polish Government should canvass the possibility of taking action against Dr. Babinski. I might further direct your attention to the second, third and fifth paragraphs of Mr. Garson's letter of May 31, 1955 to Mr. Pearson discussing various possibilities of civil proceedings by the Polish Government.

I understand that the main ground upon which the Polish Government has refused to commence proceedings is that it is incompatible with the dignity of a sovereign State to take proceedings in foreign courts to recover its property. There is, as you know, a long line of cases which indicate that successor Governments claiming to be entitled to property by right of succession to predecessor Governments, have in fact entered the courts of foreign States to establish their claim. In the following cases this was the course followed:

Hullet v. King of Spain, 6 E.R. 488 (1828) H.L.;
The King of the Two Sicilies v. Willcox, 61 E.R. 116 (1851);
U.S. Prioleau (1866) XIV L.T.R. (N.S.) 700;
U.S.A. v McRae (1869) VIII L.R. (E.Q.) 69;
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics v. Belaiew (1925-26) XLII Times Law Reports 21 (K.B.D.);
U.S.S.R. v. Onou (1924-5) 69 Sol. Jo. 676, Acton J.;
Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless Ltd. (1939) Ch. D. 182. In the United States, see State of Yucatan v. Argumedo, 157 N.Y.S. 219 (1915) Special Term, New York County;
Irish Free State v. Guarantee Safe Deposit Co. 222 N.Y.S. 182;
State of Russia v. Bankers' Trust Co. et al, 4 Fed. Supp. 417 (1933);
Republic of China v. American Express Co., 195 F. (2nd) 230;
Nizam of Hyderabad and State of Hyderabad v. Jung (1957) 2 W.L.R. 217.

The existence of such cases supports the view that in the absence of special factors a successor Government assumes the responsibility for reducing into possession those parts of its property in a foreign State, even where it is necessary for such Government to prove its title thereto in the courts of the foreign State.

With reference to the treasures in the Bank of Montreal, I understand that you are concerned about the question whether or not the Bank of Montreal could interplead in view of the fact that the claim would involve foreign State property. You might wish to refer to Republic of China v. American Express Co. 195F. (2nd) 230 (U.S. Court of Appeals (2nd Circuit)). I understand that you are also concerned about the question whether the Bank of Montreal might plead the Statute of Limitations against a claim by the Polish Government. So far as I am aware, the Bank has not indicated an intention of making such a plea and it is therefore unnecessary to give further consideration to the question at this time. In any event the facts may well be such as to permit the Polish Government to commence proceedings against other persons (such as Mr. Polkowski or Dr. Babinski) who may be legally in control of the treasures in the Bank of Montreal. Depending upon the relationship between such persons and the predecessor Polish Government in respect of the treasures, it might be possible to contend that either of these persons is a trustee of the property, and that accordingly the Statute of Limitations would not bar legal proceedings against such person.

In the case of treasures allegedly held in the Killaloe district civil proceedings could probably be taken against persons who may have custody or control over such portion of the treasures.

So far as the treasures in the Quebec Provincial Museum are concerned, I agree that Canada would appear to be internationally liable to Poland for any unjustifiable detention by the Government of Quebec. It is possible, however, that the Quebec Government might take the position that the treasures were merely stored on its property and that they were under the legal control of Dr. Babinski. I would direct your attention to the fact that my letter of April 27, 1949 suggested, on the information provided to this Department, that Dr. Babinski[128] would appear to be a proper person to be the defendant in any action taken

[128] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
died July/57 [auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

by the present Polish Government to determine title and right to possession of the Quebec portion of the treasures. From the material provided to this Department it appears likely that Dr. Babinski should be regarded under Quebec jurisprudence as a trustee of the property and that the limitation period applicable would therefore be thirty years.

The third major question noted above is whether Polkowski, one of the original depositors of part of the treasure in the Bank of Montreal, could be prosecuted under Section 282 of the Criminal Code of Canada for breach of trust. Although I do not have detailed information as to the obligations which Polkowski assumed when he took possession of this portion of the treasure, the information which has been provided to this Department from time to time does not suggest any ground upon which Polkowski might be brought within the provisions of this section.

With respect to the last question, I see no reason why Canada should be liable to Poland for the mere deterioration of any portion of the treasures unless such deterioration can be traced to failure of Canada to implement some obligation to Poland arising out of one of the factors discussed above.

It might be added that although the above comments have reviewed the domestic and international law factors as they appear to me, nevertheless, the judgment of international tribunals, like the judgments of domestic tribunals, may on occasion prove unpredictable.

Yours truly,

F.P. VARCOE

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], May 6, 1957

POLISH TREASURES

Since your memorandum of March 7 to the Prime Minister (attached), we have heard from the local Manager of the Bank of Montreal that the Bank would be willing to release the two trunks of Treasures in their custody to whoever Mr. Polkowski and the executors of Dr. Zaleski agree jointly to designate. To this end the Bank would wish to be provided with an opinion by the Legal Adviser of this Department establishing that whoever signs on behalf of Dr. Zaleski's estate has sole authority to do so. The Power of Attorney executed by Dr. Zaleski in 1948 is (from the legal point of view) invalidated by his death, and it is for that reason we should now, I think, go back to Mr. Sieradzki, the Polish Chargé, and ask him whether he can provide the Department with the further documents we need in order to meet the Bank's legal requirements.

2. If you agree, we shall call in Mr. Sieradzki and ask him if he can provide us with documentation which will establish that the sole executors of Dr. Zaleski wish the Bank to release the trunks; we would not at this time raise with Mr. Sieradzki the question of to whom the trunks should be released — a point dealt with further in the last paragraph of this memorandum. In this way we shall be following up the letter† you sent to Mr. Sieradzki on April 25 telling him that discussions with the Bank had been reopened and you hoped to be in touch with him shortly when certain legal questions had been clarified.

3. Assuming that the Poles will be willing and able to produce the legal documents which the Bank has asked for, our next question will be when and how to approach Mr. Polkowski. From our informal contacts with the Canadian Polish Congress through Group Captain Sznuk, I doubt whether there is as yet unanimous agreement among the Polish Canadians that the Treasures should somehow be returned to Poland. Much will depend on the results of Cardinal Wyszynski's current visit to Rome where a representative of the Polish emigrés will probably be speaking to him about the Treasures. Until we know better how the land lies I think we should postpone any approach to Mr. Polkowski for the next month in any case.

4. By asking Mr. Sieradzki for additional legal documents we can in the meantime keep the Polish Government satisfied that the Canadian Government is genuinely trying to make some progress on this question.

5. When we come to the point of approaching Mr. Polkowski, however, we will probably be faced with the most difficult and delicate problem of all, i.e. to whom to return the trunks in the Bank of Montreal. In our talks with Mr. Sieradzki up to now this question has never been raised. If Cardinal Wyszynski is prepared to see the Treasures returned to the Gomulka Government, there should be little difficulty on this point but we may find ourselves in the awkward position of acting as intermediary in negotiations between Mr. Polkowski and Mr. Sieradzki as to whether the trunks may instead be returned to the Church in Poland,[129] rather than the State. For the time being, however, I should think we might proceed in our talks with Mr. Sieradzki on the assumption that a formula will be found for returning the Bank Treasures to the Gomulka Government.[130]

VISIT OF CARDINAL WYSZYNSKI

Personal for the Ambassador. Cardinal Wyszynski's visit to Rome may provide an opportunity to determine the views of the Polish Catholic hierarchy on the Polish treasures in Canada and open the door to a possible solution of this problem. Would you therefore try in a discreet way to see the Cardinal.

2. Mr. Berlis will be able to give you more background information but you will recall that these treasures, almost all of which are Polish state property, were sent for safekeeping to Canada in 1939 by the Polish Government. As a result of the post-war change of régime in Poland, the treasures have never been returned. The main part is at present stored in the Provincial Museum of Quebec, but two trunks are in a Bank in Ottawa. The government has always disassociated itself from any responsibility for this problem. Now, however, in view of the relatively favourably political trends in Poland, we should like to see this matter settled, if it can be done without involving the Canadian government too directly.

3. We have reason to believe that matters would be made much easier if the Polish hierarchy desired that the treasures should be returned now to Poland, in the new circumstances that prevail there. Please enquire from the Cardinal whether the hierarchy favour their return at this time, and if so, whether he intended to inform the Vatican of this view.

4. For your information, the Polish Canadian Congress is also attempting to have someone speak to the Cardinal about the treasures and present developments in Poland.

5. Please ensure that your informal meeting receives no publicity.

Memorandum from European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], May 10, 1957

POLISH TREASURES

In accordance with the Minister's approval of our memorandum of May 6, Mr. Sieradzki, the Polish Chargé d'Affaires, came in this morning at my request and I explained to him the legal requirements of the Bank of Montreal regarding the documents to be provided by Dr. Zaleski's heirs or executors. Lest there be any misunderstanding due to language difficulties in this technical legal matter, I gave Mr. Sieradzki a plain piece of paper,† unsigned, explaining exactly what we wanted. Mr. Cadieux had previously approved the text, which is attached.

2. Sieradzki seemed somewhat surprised when I told him that from the legal point of view the power of attorney executed by Zaleski in Montreal had become invalid with Zaleski's death. I told him that the legal experts in Warsaw would probably not be surprised at this as the Polish legal system was I understood, like that of Quebec, based on the French civil law. Sieradzki then considered the Bank's requirements and thought, as we had expected, that the Polish authorities would be able to secure or provide the documentation requested. He assumed that the document should specify that the Bank of Montreal trunks should be released to the Polish Legation officials on behalf of Poland, and I did not dissent or comment on this.

3. As regards the next step, Sieradzki asked when we intended to approach Mr. Polkowski, and expressed some doubt whether "those behind" Polkowski (remnants of the Polish Government in exile in London) would wish him to sign the release. We replied that we had taken some indirect soundings and proposed to approach Polkowski directly when he has been able to clear up the position regarding Zaleski's legal heirs or representatives. Although we had no means of knowing what Polkowski's position would be, we thought he might not be unreasonable. I added that the Bank would be only too glad to see the last of the Treasures for which it was responsible and was only seeking to protect itself legally against possible liability in the event that those signing for Zaleski were not entitled to do so.

4. At this point Sieradzki said, to our surprise, that the Polish Legation had for years been paying the deposit charges on the trunks in the Bank of Montreal, something like $48.00 annually. He also told me in answer to a question, that both Zaleski and Polkowski were employees of the museum in Warsaw from which the Treasures were removed.

5. I am informing our Legation in Warsaw of these developments.

Memorandum from Minister of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 14-56 [Ottawa], January 24, 1956

On January 23rd the Chargé d'Affaires and the Commercial Attaché of the Polish Legation conveyed to my Department a request for export credits guarantee covering the purchase of another 200,000 tons of wheat, plus a small quantity of barley, on the same terms as the guarantee authorized by Cabinet by P.C. 1955-1034 dated July 7, 1955 for

[131] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
This implied that Dupuy saw the Cardinal — but he didn't. A.J. P[ick]

250,000 tons, namely 15 percent cash and 85 percent payable at the end of twelve months from date of shipment.

All of the 250,000 tons covered by the original guarantee have now been purchased but less than 100,000 tons have yet been shipped. Payments will fall due over the period September, 1956 to March, 1957. The outstanding liability of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation will be about $17 million. All the wheat purchased was grade No. 5. The Polish representatives indicated that the 200,000 tons now under negotiation will be of the same grade.

In addition to the wheat purchased under the export credits guarantee, Canadian exporters have made cash sales to Poland of 30,000 tons of wheat and three cargos of rye.

At the last session of the United Nations in New York, the Polish Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs indicated to the Canadian Delegate, Mr. Martin, that Poland intended to buy substantial quantities of wheat from Canada from year to year. The Polish representatives confirmed this statement on January 23rd. In reply to a question they also affirmed Poland's intention to meet payments when they fall due and denied any intention of pleading inability to pay because of insufficient sales of Polish goods in Canada. Current surplus earnings in the United States would be available for this purpose.

Trade sources have informed the Department that Poland has already entered orders for 100,000 tons of No. 5 wheat, 90,000 tons from Eastern ports and 10,000 tons from the Pacific coast for delivery before the end of the current crop year, subject to authorization of the export credits guarantee. These conditional purchases tend to confirm the statement made by the Polish representatives that half of the 200,000 tons will be required during the current crop year and the remainder after the 1956 crop is harvested.

If at the time of the original request Poland had placed its requirements for current year at 350,000 tons rather than 250,000 tons, I would have been prepared to recommend acceptance on this basis. Even if the figure had been 450,000 tons covering a somewhat longer period, I should have thought that it deserved careful consideration particularly since Poland wished to purchase No. 5 wheat of which there were such large quantities. The request has, in fact, been made in two instalments and it is necessary to consider with respect to the second instalment, whether:

(a) It should be turned down;

(b) A counter offer should be made requiring a larger cash payment at time of shipment;

(c) The same terms should be accepted for a part of the requested amount, say 100,000 tons, to be shipped during the current crop year;

(d) It should be accepted in full.

The Canadian Wheat Board would welcome another substantial sale of No. 5 wheat for shipment during both the current and coming crop years. It cannot be assumed that the existing demand for this grade will continue indefinitely. On the other hand, the wheat trade is ordinarily carried on a cash basis and it is not desirable to encourage the practise of selling wheat on credit.

The probability is that, if we refuse the guarantee or stiffen the terms appreciably, Poland will obtain the wheat elsewhere — from Australia, for example, which is said to be offering 18 months' terms with quarterly repayments. Diversion of demand to other sources at this juncture would probably mean that Poland will not be a continuing market for Canadian wheat in the future.

On balance, therefore, I would be inclined to recommend acceptance of another 100,000 tons on the same terms, namely 15 percent cash, 85 percent at the end of 12 months, involving an additional credit risk of about $6.8 millions.[132] If, however, it is felt that some stiffening of the terms is considered desirable, I would be prepared to agree to a counter-proposal along these lines, although I believe we run the risk of losing a substantial and continuing market for Canadian wheat in Poland.

REQUESTS BY CZECHOSLOVAKIA AND HUNGARY TO PURCHASE WHEAT ON CREDIT

Czechoslovakia

On February 21st, Mr. Maresj, the Czechoslovakian Assistant Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade, called on my department to express an interest in obtaining Export Credits guarantee covering the purchase of 100,000 to 300,000 tons of Canadian wheat for shipment to Czechoslovakia. Mr. Maresj said that the grades would be Nos. 2, 3 and 4 Manitoba Northern and that shipment would be required during the present crop-year. The terms suggested by the Czechoslovakian representative were 25% down with the remaining 75% within twelve months from the date of shipment. Mr. Maresj stated that this should not be considered as a single sale but rather as a real forerunner of continuing business. Mr. Maresj is awaiting the final instructions from his Government but, in the meantime, expressed the wish that his proposal be considered by the Canadian Government.

Hungary

On June 15th, 1955, I submitted a Memorandum to Cabinet outlining an offer by Poland to purchase grain on credit and also describing an indirect enquiry that had been received from Hungary.[133]

Cabinet agreed that I should inform the Polish Government that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation would be prepared to enter into a contract of insurance under Section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act with respect to the sale of a maximum of 250,000 tons of wheat on terms 15% cash at time of purchase, the balance of 85% payable twelve months from date of each shipment. At the same time Cabinet agreed that, if a firm request were received from the Hungarian Government, the same terms should be extended to that country up to a quantity of 200,000 tons of wheat.

Subsequently the Polish transaction was consummated but the Hungarian sale has been in abeyance.

[132] Cette recommandation a été approuvée par le Cabinet le 25 janvier 1956.
This recommendation was approved by Cabinet on January 25, 1956.

[133] Voir volume 21, document 521./See Volume 21, Document 521.

Now, however, through the Canadian Embassy in Berne, Switzerland, an official request has been received from the Hungarian Government that "Canada give consideration to extending credit on terms not less favourable than those granted Poland for wheat in amount between 100,000 to 150,000 tons. Hungary wishes assurance that such eventual purchase will be included as part of such purchase commitments as Hungary may make should negotiations toward M.F.N. treatment successfully materialize".

In view of the apparently substantial market for grain in eastern Europe, I believe that Canada should continue to pursue sales possibilities in that area. I recommend:

(1) That the Export Credits Insurance Corporation should be authorized to extend insurance with respect to sales of wheat to Czechoslovakia up to a maximum quantity of 400,000 tons for shipment during the present crop-year. The terms would be 25% down and 75% within twelve months. Based on an insurance liability of 75% of the invoice value, and assuming No. 3 Northern to be the predominant grade, the liability of the Government would be around $19 million.

(2) That the Export Credits Insurance Corporation should be authorized to extend insurance with respect to sales of wheat to Hungary up to a maximum quantity of 150,000 tons for shipment during the present crop-year. The terms would be the same as granted to the Government of Poland. Based on an insurance liability of 85% of the invoice value, the liability of the Government could range between $9 million and $11 million, depending upon the grades purchased.[134]

Le sous-ministre adjoint du Commerce
au commissaire en chef adjoint, Commission canadienne du blé

Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Assistant Chief Commissioner, Canadian Wheat Board

[Ottawa], July 17, 1956

Dear Mr. McNamara:

The Minister has asked me to write you regarding the insurance of grain sales under the Export Credits Insurance Act during the coming crop year so that you may have some understanding of government policy before you begin your tour of Eastern Europe.

It is well understood in Ottawa that sales to Eastern Europe and to the U.S.S.R. account for a substantial portion of the increase in wheat sales during the present crop year. It is also well understood that a substantial drop in sales to these countries could not be readily replaced by sales elsewhere, having in mind particularly the mounting pressure of surplus disposal by the United States.

Sales to the U.S.S.R. are, of course, guaranteed for the next two years by the trade agreement with that country. Sales to Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary were insured under Section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act. Attached herewith is a statement of amounts† owing by these countries and by Jugoslavia under the contracts of insurance.

[134] Ces deux recommandations ont été approuvées par le Cabinet le 23 février 1956.
These two recommendations were approved by Cabinet on February 23, 1956.

The Government would, of course, prefer to see these accounts paid off when they fall due and business avert to the cash basis traditional in the grain trade. There have been indications, however, that the countries of Eastern Europe to which we sold wheat this crop year will be in the market again next crop year but will wish to avoid laying out dollars to repay debts and to buy additional supplies of grain in one and the same crop year.

If availability of credit becomes the decisive factor in disposing of grain in Eastern Europe during next crop season, the Department of Trade and Commerce will be prepared to recommend to the Government that sales of grain again be insured under the Export Credits Insurance Act. Preliminary discussions at the official level have revealed, however, that the Department of Finance would strongly prefer some contraction in the amount owed by each of the countries concerned by the end of the next crop year and would strongly resist any increase in the amount outstanding at any time.

It will obviously be necessary in discussions with Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary to avoid making commitments that the Government might subsequently be unwilling to approve. For your guidance when talking about credit sales, I suggest the following principles.

1. The Canadian Government has gone a long way towards meeting the temporary difficulties of Eastern European countries in procuring grain. It has gone farther for these countries than for its regular customers. The Government is confident that payment will be made when due but it could be subject to very severe criticism in Parliament if it enlarged its financial commitments. This has nothing whatever to do with politics or ideologies. There would be similar criticism of over-extension of credit to any Government.

2. The Canadian Government would prefer to do business entirely on a cash basis. This is best for all concerned, including the buyers who can thus avoid insurance and credit charges.

3. If, however, credit will again be required for next crop year, the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider applications providing, however, that the amount outstanding at any time is not increased.

4. If grain is wanted on credit terms for shipment before the existing credits fall due, the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider extending coverage on the following basis:

(a) prepayment of an equivalent amount of an existing credit at time of shipment of the newly purchased grain.

(b) insurance of the new credit for a period of one year plus the period by which prepayment of the existing credit is brought forward.

For example, if shipment required for December 1956 and the earliest date of repayment of an existing credit of an equivalent amount is say May 1957, insurance coverage will be granted for a period extending to May 1958 if the existing credit falling due in May 1957 is repaid in December 1956.

Enclosed, also, is an exchange† between the Governments of Canada and Hungary regarding a trade agreement, a subject which may be raised when you are in Budapest.

The Minister has read and approves this letter. I hope you have an enjoyable and profitable trip. My best regards to Bill Brooking.

Yours faithfully,

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 4, 1956

VISIT OF MESSRS MCNAMARA & BROOKING, CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD, TO EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES, JULY 24-AUGUST 10, 1956

Mr. McNamara and Mr. Brooking visited Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR this summer to investigate the possibilities for the sale of Canadian wheat to those countries. Their report† is attached. Mr. McNamara visited the Department on September 20 to discuss the trip. In this memorandum I shall summarize his remarks and the highlights of his report.

Wheat Trade

2. In Mr. McNamara's opinion, Poland offers the best possibilities for the sale of Canadian wheat over the next 4-5 years at least, provided suitable credit can be extended. Polish agriculture is in bad shape, this year's harvest will not be very good, the shortage of wheat as of other foodstuffs and consumer goods generally is severe, and the Russians, who have been shipping wheat to Poland for the last four or five years will ship none for this year at least. As a result, we may be able to sell as much as 400,000 tons per year on credit. The Poles have made enquiries about, and seem to think that they will be able to get, wheat from the U.S.A. after the elections, but Mr. McNamara does not know whether this is more than wishful thinking.

3. The Russians with whom Mr. McNamara spoke, who impressed him greatly with their business-like approach and their thorough knowledge of the grain trade, would not say definitely that Canada has a long-term wheat market in the USSR, except in so far as markets in the far eastern regions are likely to remain in view of Soviet internal transportation problems. Mr. McNamara thinks that it can at least be kept up beyond the three-year period of the trade agreement. No mention was made by the Russians of the establishment of an Exportkhleb office in Vancouver,[135] of increasing exports to Canada, or of foreign exchange difficulties in purchase of Canadian wheat. (Mr. McNamara learned, incidentally, that Mr. Lobatchov, the Commercial Counsellor at the Embassy here, was Vice-President of Exportkhleb before taking up his present position). The Russians will be net exporters of wheat this year, but say they are not re-exporting Canadian wheat. They keep their better grades, which approximate to our No. 3 Northern and export only lower grades. They watch world prices closely, particularly that of our No. 3 Northern, in establishing their own wheat prices for export and say that they have no interest in price-cutting competition.

4. The Hungarian interest in our wheat is probably short-term and the possible value is not great. The Hungarians are more interested in a trade agreement with Canada, in Mr. McNamara's view, than in the actual wheat purchases. They may ask permission to re-export our wheat. They expressed the hope of increasing sales to Canada to help pay for wheat purchases. We should hold out, in negotiations, for a minimum of 150,000 tons per year for the duration of the agreement, and at least for three years. The British Minister in Budapest, while he recognizes our wheat problem, does not think much of Canadian sales on credit as he feels that this merely helps bolster up the régime in Hungary and permits of political exports of low-grade wheat from Hungary. His attitude, however, must be seen in the light of the competition which British products are experiencing in under-developed countries from a number of competitors, of which the Soviet bloc may become another. The British Minister also feels quite strongly that the Canadian Government is not backing him strongly enough in his efforts to get children out of Hungary and re-united with their parents in Canada. He thinks some guarantees from the Hungarian Government on this score should be made a political condition of our entering into a trade agreement.

5. Conflicting opinions were expressed in Czechoslovakia about future purchases from Canada. One official thought they would this year take as much as last year, but another thought it would be considerably less, not more than 50,000 tons. If the quantity was small, they might not ask for credit. The Czechs made a particular point of the necessity of increasing their sales in Canada.

6. Mr. McNamara first saw in Hungary and later confirmed in the other countries he visited, that bug damage is developing in the wheat of all Eastern European countries. It is presenting a very serious problem as it affects seriously the quality of the wheat and renders it good for little but feed.

General Remarks

7. The impression Mr. McNamara gained from his admittedly fleeting visit was that general living conditions were worse in Poland than in any of the other countries he visited. He sensed a tension and uneasiness in Poland not evident elsewhere, arising partly out of discontent with inefficient running of the country and shortages of consumer goods, partly out of dislike of Russia. Although no particular resentment was expressed over the fact that Russia is supplying no wheat this year, he did not hear one good word spoken of the Russians, and some Poles are blaming the Russians for all their misfortunes. The attempts of Poland, and the other countries, to increase trade with the under-developed countries cannot be explained entirely on political grounds: it may well be closely related to the attempts to provide more consumer goods, especially foodstuffs.

8. Mr. McNamara found general conditions in Hungary better than in Poland, the people happier and more carefree, but feeling very isolated and longing for contact with the outside world. In all the satellites he visited, he had the impression of not too successful attempts being made to copy a foreign model, and of the imposition on the people of an alien system. In the Soviet Union, on the other hand, he found no obvious discontent or resentment of the system and indeed a people working efficiently under a system they accepted.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre du Commerce

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 25, 1956

Dear Mr. Bull,

I understand that the Canadian grain trade have been in touch with your Department and with the Polish authorities concerning the possibility of Canada meeting some of Poland's immediate grain requirements and that the question of export credits insurance covering wheat sales is one important consideration.

You will, of course, have to take into account when you consider the question of export credits insurance, the usual financial considerations such as the credit-worthiness of Poland, the amount of credit now outstanding to Poland and how close is the Export Credits Insurance Corporation to its statutory credit ceiling. In doing so, I hope that, bearing in mind the developments in Poland in the last few days, you will be as forthcoming as possible in considering the Polish request. The recent events have borne out our estimate that Poland offers the best prospects, of all the European satellites of the USSR, for asserting a degree of national independence. I would hope that if, because of the limitation on the amount of credit which the Corporation may have outstanding at any one time, a choice must be made between various Eastern European countries, the special position of Poland will be borne in mind. In particular, I would not want the present negotiations with Roumania to prejudice the chances of extending credit to Poland, since the latter country is not only likely to be a better customer of Canada, but has demonstrated in the last few days that it is more deserving of support politically than Roumania. Of course, it would be unwise to allow our insuring capacity to be exhausted, or pushed too close to the ceiling, in accommodating Eastern European customers, with the result that no room would be left to take care of the needs of really friendly countries for medium term assistance in financing purchases of commodities or industrial equipment from Canada.

It is a happy conjunction that Poland seems to be a good market for Canadian wheat at the moment and that there are also political reasons for giving the Poles what assistance we can. The one cautionary note that I would inject is that anything we are able to do to help the Poles should be done without undue fanfare. Any suggestion that the Western countries are trying to rush in to take advantage of Soviet-Polish differences may undermine the already dangerous road which the more nationally-minded Polish leaders are trying to take, and also stiffen the determination of the Soviet leaders not to let events in Poland go too far. We should be ready to offer help as it is requested, but should not foist assistance upon them.

If the Polish interest in purchasing more of our wheat is a genuine one — and I would certainly expect that it is — it might be wise to consider extending an invitation to the Poles to come to Canada to discuss the purchase. At that time, perhaps they could be the guests of the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg for a few days, as was suggested a few weeks ago in discussions between the Departments of Trade and Commerce and External Affairs. Otherwise, I would hope that the Wheat Board could shortly extend an invitation to the Poles to send a delegation next year on the same terms as the invitation to the Czechs.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

Le sous-ministre adjoint du Commerce
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, November 19, 1956

Attention: Mr. A.E. Ritchie

Dear Mr. Ritchie:

I refer to the despatch from the Chargé d'Affaires, Poland, No. 686 dated October 30th, 1956,† entitled "Conversation with Mr. Dabrowski, Minister of Foreign Trade — Possibility of Purchase of Canadian Wheat." This Department appreciates the initiative taken by Mr. Brown in bringing to attention the Canadian interest in selling wheat to Poland. It is noted that the Minister of Foreign Trade did not expressly state a desire to obtain wheat on credit even though he was anxious to see the progressive development in commercial relations between our two countries.

Canadian Wheat Board officials based on their trip to Poland in August were quite optimistic that Poland would again desire substantial quantities of wheat from Canada this crop year provided credit facilities were made available. They were at that time given to understand that a grain purchasing mission was expected to come to Canada prior to the end of the year. Much has, however, transpired since then and this Department has had no subsequent information to suggest that Poland is considering an early approach to Canada.

You are aware of press reports that Russia has offered Poland substantial quantities of wheat (mentioned at one million tons) provided Poland will supply coal in exchange. The grain firm of Leval today gave to understand that Poland has concluded arrangements with Russia to obtain 1.4 million tons of wheat between now and July, 1957, but there has been no confirmation of this from other sources. Also press reports suggest that Russia is making available wheat to Hungary which suggests that Russia may be expected to meet urgent requirements of the Satellites. Although the United States appears to be on the verge of offering economic aid to Poland, action has at least temporarily been postponed.

Poland offers a long term market for wheat which Canada should make every effort to cultivate.

Attached is a copy of a letter† dated October 29th from the Canadian Wheat Board to Rollimpex, the Polish Foreign Trade Corporation, responsible for grain imports. This outlines the export availability position. You will note that although Manitoba Nos. 2, 3 and 4 are immediately available, No. 5 is not expected to be available in quantity until into the new year. There will in fact be large quantities of No. 5 and lower available at this later period as approximately one-third of this year's Prairie Provinces' wheat production of 516 million bushels is in this category, mainly No. 5. There is thus available to Poland practically any grade of wheat that might be desired.

Poland has regularly made payment on outstanding credit under the Export Credits guarantee for wheat. I understand from the company concerned, namely Northern Sales that the payment due November 19th, 1956 of $627,621.30 was paid in full last Friday, November 16th. Thus out of the original guarantee of $20,962,515, the amount remaining is $17,605,731.14 due dates as follows:

December 20, 1956	$ 837,217.02
January, 1957	4,262,185.06
February, 1957	861,336.29
March, 1957	1,480,502.33
April, 1957	4,064,252.52
May, 1957	4,330,638.69
June, 1957	1,769,599.23

Although there has been no official correspondence with Poland, Wheat Board officials gave the Polish Foreign Trade Corporation "Rollimpex" to understand that future credit guarantees could only be extended on a revolving fund basis subsequent to repayment of amounts outstanding under 1955-56 arrangements. Attached is a letter from myself under this subject to Mr. McNamara, Assistant Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board, written prior to his visit to East European countries. It could conceivably be that Poland has refrained from making further approaches for credit as the amounts repaid on previous credits would on a revolving fund principle only allow the purchase of a relatively small amount of wheat.

I am sure it would be most helpful to have Mr. Brown pursue this matter with officials in the Polish Government to determine what basis might be found for supplying Poland with wheat during this crop year.

Yours faithfully,
M.W. SHARP

Note du ministre du Commerce pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Minister of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 226-56 [Ottawa], November 22, 1956

REQUEST BY ROUMANIA FOR CREDIT GUARANTEE ON WHEAT

1. Several weeks ago a representative of the Roumanian Government requested that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation undertake to insure wheat sales by Canadian exporters to Roumania up to a quantity of 300,000 tons during the present crop year. He was told at that time that, while the Canadian Government was not opposed in principle to the insurance of wheat sales to Roumania, it could not agree to insure an amount as large as 300,000 tons.

2. Within the last few days two other representatives of the Roumanian Government have arrived in Canada to continue the negotiations. In preparation, officials of the Department of External Affairs, Finance and Trade and Commerce met to discuss the advisability of extending insurance coverage to Roumania at the present time.

3. The Department of Finance drew attention to Roumanian Government bonds in the amount of $24 million held by the Canadian Government which fall due in 1968. This debt was contracted in 1922. Interest was paid up to the outbreak of World War II but nothing has been paid since that date. Arrears of compound interest amount to about $23.1 million. It was agreed that when the Roumanian representatives pursued the enquiry about wheat on credit the existence of this governmental debt should be drawn to their attention and they should be told that the Canadian Government was most reluctant to insure wheat sales until there had been discussion of the Roumanian Government's intentions with respect to their existing debt to Canada.

4. The Department of External Affairs recommend that while there is political advantage to be gained through encouraging western trade with the satellites, as it reduces dependence upon Moscow, if a choice is to be made between satellites, those which show greatest possibilities for reduced dependence upon Moscow should be favoured. The Department of External Affairs considers that Roumania does not fall into this category, at least at the present time. There is no political objection to agreement on wheat sales to Roumania although some delay in completing or announcing any arrangement would seem desirable. The Department of External Affairs has expressed concern that the extension of credit to Roumania should not prejudice the chances of extending further credit facilities to Poland or other nations more desirable from a political viewpoint.

5. On November 19 the three Roumanians met with the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce who informed them along the foregoing lines. The Roumanians replied that they had no authority to negotiate with respect to the existing governmental debt but would be prepared to transmit a message to their Government containing any proposals the Canadian Government might wish to make.

I RECOMMEND:

That the Roumanian Government be informed that the Canadian Government is not prepared to insure wheat sales to Roumania until the Roumanian Government has indicated a willingness to negotiate a settlement of outstanding obligations to Canada.

No efforts have in fact been made to collect overdue interest on the existing Roumanian debt probably because no opportune occasion for commercial negotiations previously presented itself. In any event, it may be presumed that the Canadian Government had resigned itself to a considerable if not a complete loss. Therefore, it seems to me that a willingness on the part of Roumania to negotiate would justify consideration of the wheat credit on its own merits before an actual settlement of existing obligations is reached.

Prospects for sales of wheat behind the Iron Curtain are not promising this crop year except in Russia which is bound by agreement to buy not less than 400,000 tons (approximately 14.7 million bushels) during 1957. We face a possible reduction in sales to Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary of approximately 30 million bushels.

Under the circumstances, and provided that Roumania indicates its willingness to negotiate a settlement of outstanding obligations to Canada, I favour insuring wheat sales of 150,000 tons to Roumania, and request authority to proceed with negotiations on the understanding that approval of the insurance of wheat credits will be subject to further Cabinet consideration in the light of the political situation at that time.[136]

DESPATCH NO. 836 Warsaw, December 18, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: My despatch No. 791 of December 3, 1956.†

ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND; PROSPECTS OF SALE OF CANADIAN WHEAT

Your telegrams SS 301 of December 7† and EE 423 of December 12† were received together on the afternoon of December 14. I am sending a brief telegram† tomorrow. In the meantime, here is the latest information by today's bag.

2. On December 6 at the Finnish reception, I learned from Mr. Rapacki, the Foreign Minister, that Mr. Dabrowski, the Minister of Foreign Trade, had not gone to China as expected, but had been sick. He also told me that a conference was taking place in Warsaw between the Ministry and the heads of various enterprises supplying Polish goods to its export trade. He advised me not to call on Mr. Dabrowski until this conference was over. (I will report separately on the reorganization of the Ministry).

3. On December 8, it was announced that Mr. Dabrowski had retired because of ill health and would be replaced by Mr. Trampczynski. You will recall that he has recently been Vice-Minister of Finance, and President of the National Bank of Poland, and also that he was one of the experts who accompanied Gomulka and his party on their visit to Moscow. The decision to appoint an expert economist and financier to head the Department of Foreign Trade is no doubt an indication of the importance which the régime attaches to Polish foreign trade being molded according to the realities of Poland's difficult economic position.

4. This development prevented my following up again with Mr. Dabrowski as you suggested. However, I did not believe that any important disclosure of Poland's intentions in regard to the purchase of grain could be expected because of Mr. Dobrzanski's comment referred to in paragraph 14 of my despatch under reference. In the meantime, however, trade agreements have been announced with France, China and Finland, and over the past weekend with Australia. A United Kingdom trade delegation is now in Warsaw. The agreement with Australia sounded as if it might be important and I arranged to call today on Mr. Lewandowski, head of the North American desk at the Foreign Ministry, and Mr. Dobrzanski of the Ministry of Foreign Trade above mentioned. In the result, I was able to obtain a pretty accurate picture of the present Polish position in respect of Western economic assistance and the purchase of grain.

Economic Aid

5. The Polish Government maintained so far as it could its trade connections with the Western world during the period of the cold war. Its trade was restricted by the strategic controls. That Poland had a special interest in such trade was accepted by its other partners in the communist bloc. No impediments were placed at the Moscow conference in the way of Poland's efforts to expand her economic relationships with the West. Poland has need of economic assistance. It must obtain this from the West. It does not want this assistance in the form of "aid". The elimination of all reference to "aid" is politically important to Poland. I deduced that this importance stems largely from the desire to prevent Poland's acceptance of economic assistance from the West giving fuel to the attacks of Stalinist elements in other countries of the bloc who are alarmed at the liberalization in Poland. Poland is interested particularly in long-term credits. It would prefer to tie these credits to specific trade agreements, but recognizes that the methods of trading in the West would normally call for financing by separate loans for such long periods. Five or six years is what the Poles have in mind. They wish to be realistic and wish also to conduct their trade on a businesslike basis. They appreciate that it may be more politically possible for the West to give Poland economic assistance on some collective basis such as through the World Bank than on the basis of initiative of individual states. They are currently exploring the possibility of a loan from the World Bank and also some arrangement with the United States Import-Export Bank. (The latter information was given me on what Lewandowski called an "off-the-record" basis. I assume that he knew I would pass the information on, but that he did not wish to be quoted). The credits under the recent French agreement are regarded as valuable assistance.

Purchase of Wheat

6. The supply of grain from the USSR is definite in quantity and its arrival assured. 1956 deliveries of grain to the State by Polish peasants are not completed and cannot be estimated. (My impression is that since the VIIIth Plenum in October, there has been a reaction throughout the countryside which resulted in the virtual defiance of the Government on compulsory deliveries, but that the situation is gradually getting better). It would not be until the end of January, therefore, according to Dobrzanski, that any decision will be made.

7. The Australian agreement was of a general nature. Dobrzanski said that no grain had yet been contracted for, but merely the possibility opened of its being contracted for. He says that in the recent past Australia gave more favourable terms than Canada. He said this was 18 months with no down payment. The new agreement has "opened the possibility" of a two-year credit term. Shipping charges are up, which has increased the cost of importing by water. However, Dobrzanski said this was a worldwide condition and he did not seem to think that the increase in freight rates would be a material factor in any decision to purchase grain from the West. He assured me they were quite interested in a Canadian purchase early in the New Year, provided that we could offer the best terms. These terms continued to be of vital importance. Poland could not be blamed, he said, if it tried to buy the identical product on the best terms possible.

8. I mentioned the possibility of our extending payment for a period equivalent to one year plus a number of months equal to the period of pre-payment of a corresponding amount of old debt discharged, as outlined in Mr. Sharp's letter to Mr. McNamara of July 17. Copy of this letter was attached to Mr. Sharp's letter of November 19.† I was somewhat taken aback when Mr. Dobrzanski told me that they had made all payments to Canada except a balance of 27 million roubles, which he said would be paid in full by the end of March. This does not tally with the figures set forth in the letter above mentioned. I asked Dobrzanski whether there had been a supplementary agreement which might have prolonged the payments. He said they had bought Canadian grain through France and that "Dreyfuss had arranged it" and that they had thereby avoided the 10% down payment. I am rather puzzled by this and I am wondering whether the Poles have been carrying a transaction on their books relating to France which you have regarded as being a direct obligation of Poland to Canada. In the time available before our bag closes tonight, I cannot unravel this mystery.

9. Mr. Dobrzanski told me they are thinking of sending trade experts to Canada early in the New Year and he hinted that he might go himself. I gathered that they did not tie this necessarily to the purchase of wheat, but rather to the improvement of their own channels for selling Polish products in Canada. He mentioned their dissatisfaction at the refusal of the Canadian Government to permit the opening of a consulate in Montreal.

10. Speaking generally of Canadian-Polish trade, Mr. Dobrzanski emphasized that their most careful calculations of the Polish position had convinced them that Poland would have to import grain for at least four or five years, and he suggested that Canada should not regard Poland as a temporary outlet, but rather as a prospective permanent customer. On the whole, I would say that there was a maximum of good will toward Canada shown on the part of both men.

P.S. Copy of this despatch is being forwarded to Mr. J.B. Lawrie, European Manager of the Canadian Wheat Board.

TELEGRAM 425 Warsaw, December 31, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND AND SALE OF CANADIAN WHEAT

1. At his request I called on Dobrzanski who asked me to sound you out on possibility of your deferring for one year the payment due in five months February to June inclusive on existing purchase agreement. He apologized for inaccurate statement mentioned in my paragraph 8 which he ascribed to bad briefing and produced a set of figures given him by Polish National Bank which tally generally with Mr. Sharp's. He said January payment would be made on schedule and also that if your reply was negative all other payments would also be made on schedule.

2. Reasons for request are as follows: Poland must have Western economic assistance to tide it over period of one year now seen as emergency period of readjustment on switch away from heavy industry to consumer goods; economic assistance requires time to arrange; postponement of Canadian dollar payment would be form of temporary assistance (group corrupt) to Poland in period of great pressure on available exchange resources; Canada is believed to be alive to long term interest in Poland and also fostering future of Polish Canadian trade; postponement is envisaged as highly desirable rather than absolute necessity.

3. Dobrzanski said they would like to establish two year credit (balance?) and if this were done they would give Canada preference over other suppliers on future wheat purchases. They expect to know within a few weeks how much grain they will have to buy for delivery "after June". The unknown quantity continues to be compulsory delivery which government dare not collect from 90 percent of farms privately owned and which peasants rely on currently hoarding in their cellars and refusing to sell for zlotys.

4. If our willingness to discuss revision and arrangements were confirmed Dobrzanski would go to Ottawa late January accompanied by financial expert to arrange details. Such a visit would be immediately known in both countries and Polish government would like to avoid possibility of adverse Polish reaction to an unsuccessful visit. I believe any agreement with Canada at this juncture which was of financial benefit to Poland would support present Polish leaders against reactionary Stalinist elements, and probably also strengthen government's hand in dealing with peasants whose present attitude has some of the elements of a hold-up.

5. I told Dobrzanski that I believed Canadian government's hands were tied by prior legislation but that I would report his request in spirit in which it had been made. If some encouragement were given and Dobrzanski headed a delegation to Ottawa they would discuss at the same time additional grain purchases founded on new credit principle which they would have hoped to have established in the course of the discussions. He would also attend to sundry problems relating to promoting sale of Polish products in Canada.

6. There are strong political reasons for assisting Poland at this time. If government were unwilling to recommend a long term loan to Poland credit sale of wheat might be a useful expedient. I think it would be a mistake to dismiss this approach out of hand on basis of past wheat sales policy. If proposal is unacceptable I urge you strongly to find some alternative to induce the Poles to go to Ottawa.

7. Dobrzanski has offered to arrange for me to pay a formal call on his new Minister. A date around January 10 was suggested but is subject to confirmation and I can avoid or postpone visit if you prefer. In the meantime I would like to convey your reply orally to Dobrzanski as soon as instructed by you.

8. Your telegram EE-494.† paragraph 7. My letter is more accurate than my telegram. Dobrzanski in last talk stopped short of any positive assertion that credit had been promised by Australia. At same time he clearly wished to leave impression with me that Australian credit was possibility. Is it possible Australians have been stringing the Poles along?

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 10, 1957

You will have seen telegram 425 of December 31 from Warsaw concerning economic aid to Poland and the sale of Canadian wheat. It reported that the Poles say they must have Western economic assistance to tide them over a period of one year while they readjust from the present emphasis on heavy industry to the production of consumer goods; and that the postponement for one year of the payments for Canadian wheat (due between February and June inclusive) would be a useful form of temporary assistance to Poland. They propose that if they could establish a two year credit basis for wheat purchases they would give Canada a preference over other suppliers. If we are willing to discuss the revision of our arrangements with Poland, they would like to send officials to Ottawa to arrange details.

2. This question was discussed this morning by officials from External Affairs, Trade & Commerce and Finance. We indicated that we would be inclined to favour the negotiation of more favourable treatment for the Poles in view of the political reasons for assisting Poland at this time. The Department of Trade & Commerce was anxious to accept the Polish suggestions on condition that the Poles agreed at this time to significant new purchases of wheat. If, however, Poland would not undertake to buy more wheat or if the Canadian Government was unwilling to grant fresh credit to Poland, Trade & Commerce would not see any advantage in merely agreeing to defer for one year repayment of the present Polish debt. The Dept. of Finance on the other hand was inclined to favour a deferment for one year of these Polish obligations, for international political reasons, but was very doubtful about the wisdom of extending fresh credit for further wheat purchases. Mr. Harris, however, had not yet been consulted on this question.

3. There are several reasons why it may not be found easy to agree to the full Polish request. The first is that a very substantial proportion of the $100,000,000 which can be guaranteed under Section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act is already committed or partially committed in respect of wheat. There are, at the same time, a number of other large contingent commitments for other items — for example jet aircraft for Germany, farm equipment for Brazil, railway equipment for Argentina and Mexico. Some of these sales are quite doubtful, but if several of them went forward the limit of the authority under Section 21 might be reached. If, therefore, the Cabinet should decide to increase the amount of credit outstanding to Poland by say $10,000,000, they might have to have in mind the possibility that at some future date Parliament might have to be asked to increase the existing authority under Section 21.

4. The other difficulty is the very tight monetary position in Canada at the moment. In order to sell grain under a Section 21 guarantee the grain exporters have to get credit from their banks. It is this credit which is guaranteed by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. Even though no risk is involved the grain exporters may find it difficult to get their banks to extend credit on this scale during the present state of monetary stringency, and any encouragement from the Government for the banks to do so might seem inconsistent with the Government's general monetary policy.

5. Another aspect of the problem which needs to be borne in mind is that once we have given two year credit to the Poles it may become very difficult to give less favourable terms to any other Eastern European country in the future.

6. I do not think these difficulties need necessarily be insuperable. A few months ago the Government was willing to commit itself to the possible guaranteeing of $11,000,000 worth of wheat for Hungary and a lesser amount for Roumania. It does not appear likely that either of these transactions will take place in the near future and it would seem sensible to put the needs of Poland ahead of those of other Eastern European governments.

7. The Department of Finance has undertaken to consult Mr. Harris as soon as possible. In the meantime I should be glad to have your comments in order that we may start to prepare recommendations for next week's Cabinet meeting.

WHEAT; SALES TO POLAND; EXPORT CREDIT GUARANTEES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JAN. 25, 1956)

18. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said sales of wheat to Poland had been guaranteed, under the Export Credits Insurance Act, to a total of approximately $22 million. Payments had been made on the dates due and if a further payment due within the next few days was made, as expected, this total liability would be reduced to about $12.5 million, payment of which was due in several instalments terminating in June of this year.

The Polish government had now proposed that payment of this balance be deferred for one year. A similar arrangement for a year's deferment had been granted Jugoslavia. The Polish government would have to approach the companies which had arranged the sales of wheat to see if they would extend credit for a further year. The companies in turn would have to make arrangements with their bankers. Extension might be difficult to obtain in view of the present credit position.

The Minister recommended that agreement be given in principle to a deferment to Poland of up to one year on existing credits.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 17, 1957 — Cab. Doc. 11-57†)

19. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Gomulko government was in difficulties. It was trying to maintain some degree of independence from the U.S.S.R. and anything that Canada could do to help would be useful.

(b) The government's part in the picture was to provide insurance. Recommendations for changes should properly come from the companies concerned. If they were willing to extend the payment time, the government would have no objection. There had been some talk of an exchange by Poland, of wheat for Egyptian cotton, which arrangement would be difficult to justify.

(c) The proposal really meant that part of the payment would be postponed for six months and the remainder for one year. Would it not be easier for the Poles to find the money if the total were spread out in the form of monthly payments. Against this it was indicated that the trade arrangements had been for payment twelve months from the date of individual shipments so that they were already spread over a number of months.

20. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on a request from the Polish government for deferring the balance of payments on imports of Canadian wheat, and agreed in principle to a deferment of up to one year of repayment of existing guaranteed credits; details of the arrangement to be worked out between the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance.

Note du ministre du Commerce pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Minister of Trade and Commerce to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 59-57 [Ottawa], March 14, 1957

SALES OF WHEAT TO POLAND UNDER EXPORT CREDITS GUARANTEES

A delegation from the Government of Poland has been in Ottawa for the last month discussing with Canadian officials arrangement of an extension for payment of amounts still owing on last year's wheat purchases as well as a credit basis for purchases during the current and following crop year.

During the 1955-56 crop year, Poland purchased about 340,000 tons of wheat from Canada on terms of 15% cash and 85% in one year. The Export Credits Insurance Corporation insured the exporters (under Section 21 of the Act) for 85 per cent of the value of each shipment. Poland has honoured all payments at due date, the present position being as follows:

Total Amount Insured	$20,962,514
Due and Paid	9,762,725
Due March 14th to June 30th, 1957	$11,199,789

During the negotiations I insisted that no extension of insurance of existing credits could be granted unless Poland agreed to purchase substantial quantities of wheat during the present crop year. I now recommend acceptance of the following proposal which has been agreed to by the Polish Delegation:

(1) The Polish Government be granted an extension on outstanding credits as follows:

25% paid on present scheduled due date
25% 6 months from present scheduled due date
25% 12 months from present scheduled due date

25% 18 months from present scheduled due date.

(2) The credit extension be made subject to agreement by the Polish Government to purchase wheat on the following basis:

Quantity:

150,000 tons of wheat 1956-57 crop year
150,000 tons of wheat 1957-58 crop year

Terms:

10% cash
90% credit on invoice value of each cargo shipped, the total insurance coverage not to exceed $12.5 million with respect to each crop year, the aggregate not to exceed $25 million.
Insurance premium at the rate of 1% per annum.

Repayment:

1/3 payable 2 years from date of shipment
1/3 payable 2 1/2 years from date of shipment
1/3 payable 3 years from date of shipment.

(3) The Polish Government be permitted to resell any wheat purchased under these arrangements to countries other than those of Western Europe (including West Germany and Finland).[137]

This may set a new pattern for future sales of grain under export credit insurance provided by the Canadian Government. The essential difference from previous arrangements is the commitment by the recipient countries to guarantee purchases not only for the immediate crop year but for a year ahead.

In most agreements the insurable amount has been limited to 85% rather than the 90% I recommend in this instance. The difference is not a significant factor in risk calculation. The Poles regard the 90% credit as important and in view of their readiness to conclude an agreement, I favour granting this concession.

During the 1955-56 crop, export credit arrangements were extended to the following countries:

	Tons	Insured Value
Poland	342,520	$20,962,514
Czechoslovakia	326,938	$17,719,452
Hungary	30,262	$ 2,222,445
Total	700,720	$40,904,411

During the 1956-57 crop year, apart from Poland, the only countries which have expressed an interest in negotiating the purchase of wheat on credit are Hungary, Roumania and Ireland. No agreement is likely to result from any of these negotiations.

[C.D. HOWE]

SALE OF WHEAT TO POLAND ON CREDIT; INCREASE IN AMOUNT
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 14)

39. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the Polish government wished to increase its purchases of wheat during the current crop year to 300,000 tons instead of the original amount of 150,000 tons. This revision of the agreement seemed to be desirable.

40. The Cabinet, on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, agreed that 300,000 tons of wheat instead of 150,000 tons be sold to Poland during the current crop year on the same credit terms as those already approved.

TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH HUNGARY

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that Hungary wished to enter into a most-favoured-nation trade agreement along the lines of the agreement of last February between Canada and Russia.[138] It had been agreed that Hungary could send a delegation here to negotiate an agreement on the understanding that she would buy approximately 150,000 tons of wheat each year during the life of the agreement. Should an agreement be negotiated, substantial sales of other Canadian products could not be expected and it was unlikely that Hungary would succeed in selling in volume in Canada. However, Hungary would probably wish to open a trade office in this country which would add to the difficulties of Canadian security authorities. The Hungarians would also likely press for credit on which to buy wheat but it had already been made clear that this could not be discussed within the context of the proposed negotiations. If they wanted export credit insurance on shipments in excess of the contractual amount, their application could be considered on its merits.

There was not much value in an agreement of this nature but an assured market of 150,000 tons of wheat a year for three years would be desirable.

The Minister recommended, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and of Finance, that officials of the departments concerned be authorized to negotiate with a view to concluding an agreement along the lines of the Russian arrangement made earlier in the year, and that the quantity of wheat to be purchased each year should be 150,000 tons if possible, but not less than 100,000 tons, and be sold for cash.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 2, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 187-56†)

11. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) While wheat sales were of course desirable, it was surprising that they should be made to communist countries when Egypt was able to buy wheat from Russia at below world prices. However, Russia had always sold wheat grown in the southwest part of the country to markets in Europe and the Middle East, while importing substantial quantities for eastern Siberia.

(b) These negotiations were, in the Hungarian view, preliminary to the establishment of diplomatic relations. If this happened, the Canadian mission in Czechoslovakia would be asked to look after our interests in Hungary. It would be hard to refuse a Hungarian request to establish a trade office in Canada but this should be in Ottawa to minimize security problems.

12. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding trade negotiations with Hungary and agreed,

(a) that officials of the interested departments, headed by Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, be authorized to negotiate with the Hungarian delegation;

(b) that the delegation should aim at the conclusion of an agreement along the general lines of the agreement of February 29th, 1956, between Canada and the U.S.S.R., and that in particular they should insist upon similar escape clauses as well as upon an Hungarian undertaking to purchase an appropriate quantity of wheat each year during the life of the agreement; and,

(c) that the quantity of wheat to be purchased annually should be 150,000 tons if possible, but in any event not less than 100,000 tons, and should be for cash.

CONVERSATION WITH MR. TIBOR BARABAS,
HEAD OF THE HUNGARIAN TRADE DELEGATION

Mr. Barabas called on Mr. Watkins this morning to discuss the question of exchange of diplomatic representation with Hungary.

2. Mr. Watkins opened by referring to our shortage of personnel and our present commitments for extension of our diplomatic service as reasons which have kept us from exchanging missions with Hungary. He said that our first commitment in Eastern Europe would be to provide Ministers for our posts in Prague and Warsaw, and that after these commitments had been met we might be able to consider double accreditation from Prague, Warsaw or Vienna. Mr. Barabas said that, in the absence of full diplomatic representation, this would be satisfactory to the Hungarians. He said that they had no preference as to which of these three heads of missions might be accredited, though some countries, such as India, had found the Vienna-Budapest combination not unsatisfactory.

3. Mr. Barabas then went on to say that, even though diplomatic representation might not be possible at the present time, the Hungarians would be very happy to be allowed to open a Consulate-General in Toronto "in which area the majority of the Hungarian population of Canada is located". Almost as an afterthought to the consular aspect, he said that, if a trade agreement were concluded, Toronto would be a good centre from which to promote sales.

4. Mr. Watkins then went on to raise other questions of relevance to Canadian-Hungarian relations. He referred to the people in Hungary who would like to join their relatives in Canada but who, despite representations made by the Canadian Red Cross and by the British Minister in Hungary, had not yet managed to obtain exit permits. Mr. Barabas was very interested in this, intimating that he might be able to use his good offices to obtain some satisfaction for us. He said that, if we would supply him with details, he would wire Budapest about it immediately. (I am having this looked into right away to see what information we can pass to Mr. Barabas.) It was suggested that, if Mr. Barabas were in Toronto, he might discuss this with Dr. Stanbury of the Canadian Red Cross, whose name he knew.

5. Mr. Watkins also raised the matter of the Canadian passports which have been taken by the Hungarian authorities from Canadians who have returned to Hungary since the war, and said that the Canadian Government, as owners of the passports, would like to get them back. (We have raised this matter recently with the Polish Legation, which acts for Hungary in this country, and with the Hungarians through the British Minister in Budapest). Mr. Barabas was less forthcoming here than on the matter of relatives but promised to look into it.

6. Finally, Mr. Watkins mentioned the position of the church in Hungary, and Cardinal Mindszenty, explaining that this was bound to be raised publicly and in the House if there were any question of closer relations with Hungary. Mr. Barabas was strong in insisting that there was complete freedom of worship in Hungary, that the churches were filled, and that the hierarchy, with the exception of the Cardinal, were operating freely. He was, however, a bit evasive on the Cardinal's whereabouts and function.

7. I would think, from this conversation, that the main concern of the Hungarians is to obtain permission to open a consular office here, rather than the full exchange of diplomatic missions. Mr. Watkins told him he could venture no predictions as to our decision, but that we would discuss this request with you. Mr. Barabas would like to have an answer before his departure from Canada in about a fortnight, but he was told this might not be possible.

8. If a trade agreement is concluded, it will be rather difficult to resist a request to open a Hungarian office of some sort for trade promotion. Rather than a Consulate-General, which would clearly be interested primarily in the Hungarian population in Canada, I think it would be preferable to have a straight trade office,[139] perhaps a branch office of a Hungarian import-export agency, on the same terms we offered the Russians (no privileges or immunities; limitation of size; to exist for the duration of the trade agreement only; and with the right for us to open a comparable office in Hungary) — if the Hungarians request it. This would be easier to control, on security grounds, than a Consulate-General in Toronto, and presumably less objectionable to the Hungarian population in Canada.[140] A small diplomatic mission in Ottawa would also be easier to control than a Consulate-

[139] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

General in Toronto, but presumably you would not want to permit the opening of a Hungarian diplomatic mission until we were closer to opening in Budapest than we are now. If a trade agreement is not concluded, I think we might say that we are not able to consider the establishment of any sort of Hungarian office in Canada at least until after the elections. Do you agree?[141]

9. I do not know whether Mr. Barabas will be able to do anything about exit permits for close relatives, but if he does, this might make a trade agreement, even on terms less favourable than we originally hoped for vis-à-vis wheat sales, more defensible than it otherwise would be. We recently heard from our Ambassador in Washington, who arranged a meeting between a Canadian of Hungarian origin and the Hungarian Minister in Washington, that, according to his Canadian informant, some 30 Hungarian exit permits are being issued for prospective immigrants to Canada "in order to create a good impression in Canada so that the opening of a Hungarian Legation in Ottawa should be welcomed." It is welcome news that the Hungarians seem to be taking positive steps to remove one of the difficulties which stand in the way of better Hungarian-Canadian relations.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 17, 1956

HUNGARIAN-CANADIAN TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

You will recall that it was agreed by Cabinet, prior to the arrival of the Hungarian trade delegation, that the Canadian Government would be willing to extend MFN treatment to Hungarian goods on condition that Hungary agreed to purchase for cash a fixed quantity of wheat over a three-year period. Our starting figure was to be 150,000 tons per year, but the Canadian team was authorized to go down as low as 100,000 tons per year if necessary. The figure of 150,000 tons per year, for cash, was communicated to the Hungarians prior to the arrival of their trade team as the basis for discussion.

2. It is not necessary here, I think, to go into the details of the discussions which have been taking place over the last ten days. The Hungarian position may be summarized as follows:

(a) Though they started with a figure of 50,000 tons per year, they now speak of a figure of at least 300,000 tons over a three-year period, possibly a mixture of wheat and barley, and possibly with a purchase of flour this year. They might be willing to take more than one-third of the total this year.

(b) They want, because of a shortage of cash reserves to have credit facilities. Further, the export credit guarantee would give them a very favourable interest rate compared with what they would have to pay in Europe. They cannot commit themselves to a cash purchase of a fixed amount over three years when other sellers may well be willing to offer credit terms. At minimum, they want to purchase this year's portion with credit facilities, and to be considered for credit facilities if Canada is granting any credit at all on wheat sales in subsequent years.

[141] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes L.B. P[earson]

(c) Even if their goods are granted MFN treatment, they have no hope of earning, from their sales in Canada, more than a very small fraction of the hard currency needed to pay for the wheat they would buy from us.

3. The case they made was a good one, and one logical conclusion might have been that, if Canada insisted that MFN had its cash price, there was no basis for concluding a trade agreement. The discussions might therefore have been narrowed to a straight purchase of wheat with export credit insurance facilities, as the Hungarians had done earlier this year. We are currently discussing a possible sale with the Rumanians on this basis.

4. At the discussions yesterday, however, after consultations with Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris, the Canadian team accepted in principle the Hungarian proposals and agreed to discuss the details. It is assumed that the trade agreement proper would refer only to the exchange of MFN treatment. They have been given a draft agreement, modelled on the agreement with the USSR, but with the shipping and legal clauses deleted. Attached to the draft is a proposed exchange of letters setting out what is, in effect, an escape clause for Canada, allowing us to fix values for duty purposes in the event of imports damaging Canadian industry. The draft letters are modelled on similar letters attached to the Japanese and USSR agreements.[142]

5. A separate exchange of letters would set forth the Hungarian obligation to purchase a set amount of wheat and/or barley and/or flour over a three-year period, the total amount to be at least 300,000 tons. It is proposed that another note would set forth the understanding about extending credit facilities — assured for this year, and for consideration in subsequent years. The Hungarians have also suggested that we discuss a formula for setting fair market values of their goods for customs purposes, along the lines of the understanding with Czechoslovakia.

6. As I intimated in my memorandum of October 11 might be the case, the Hungarians have now said that, if there is to be any substantial delay in exchanging diplomatic representatives or in establishing a Consulate-General in Toronto, they would like permission to open a one- or two-man trade promotion office, probably in Montreal. I shall be sending you shortly a separate memorandum on this subject.

7. It is on this basis that the negotiations will be resumed on Thursday of this week.

HUNGARIAN REQUEST TO OPEN A TRADE PROMOTION OFFICE IN MONTREAL

In my memorandum of October 11, I intimated that, in the absence of Hungarian diplomatic or consular representation in Canada, the Hungarian trade delegation might request permission to establish a trade promotion office in the event a trade agreement was concluded. The Hungarians have now made the request definite and have asked for a one- or two-man office, probably in Montreal.

2. From the trade viewpoint, the request is a reasonable one. If the Hungarians are to make any sales in Canada in order to earn even a small fraction of the hard currency needed to pay for wheat purchases, they probably need a small office to explore the Canadian market and to make and maintain contact with Canadian buyers of their products, as well as to make arrangements for purchasing and shipping wheat. It would also seem to follow that, if we grant MFN treatment, we extend not only the lower MFN tariff rates but the opportunity to take advantage of the lower tariffs as well.

3. The objections which arise are on political and security grounds. The Hungarian population in Canada cannot be expected to look with great favour on the establishment of any sort of Hungarian office here, particularly as we may take it for granted that any such office will devote at least part of its time to propaganda activities to making contact with Hungarians in Canada and probably trying to persuade them to return to the homeland. The security objection is that any Hungarian office can be expected to engage in espionage and subversive activities. At the moment, they must send their representatives in Washington to make contacts in Canada, and it would certainly be easier for them if they had a permanent office in this country.

4. If and when we grant permission for the opening of a trade office, I think we should set the following conditions, similar to those we set for the opening of a Soviet office in Vancouver:

(a) it should be entitled to no diplomatic or consular privileges or immunities;

(b) it should remain in existence no longer than the duration of a trade agreement;

(c) it should be limited to a fixed and small number of Hungarian nationals (the Russians have permission for three and we are about to grant the Czechs permission for six);

(d) it should be a branch office of, say, a Hungarian import-export agency or agencies rather than an office of the Hungarian Government proper.

(e) We should have the right to open a similar office in Hungary if we so desired, and if the Canadian staff of such an office would be subject to travel restrictions of any kind within Hungary, then the Hungarian staff of the trade office in Canada would be subject to comparable restrictions.[143]

These conditions would not interfere with legitimate trade promotion, would be consistent with the treatment we are according other Iron Curtain countries, would make security control easier, and would be more easily defensible publicly.

5. A situation I should not welcome could arise if we gave permission forthwith for the Hungarians to open a trade office. If, a year or so from now, we were to grant the Hungarians permission to open a diplomatic mission in Ottawa, (they are pressing for an exchange of diplomatic representatives), we should then find ourselves with two Hungarian offices on our hands. We might, therefore, set an additional condition that a trade office be set up ad interim, but that if at a later date arrangements were to be made for the Hungarians to establish a diplomatic mission in Ottawa we would expect them to integrate the trade office and the diplomatic mission.

6. I have already suggested, in my memorandum of October 11, that we tell the head of the Hungarian trade delegation that we cannot consider an exchange of diplomatic representatives or a Hungarian Consulate-General in Toronto at least until after the elections. I had first thought of deferring the opening of a trade office for the same period, but I now think that this might be unduly restrictive and suggest that we were not offering MFN treatment in good faith. The Department of Trade and Commerce feel strongly that, if an agreement is concluded, no unreasonable impediments should be put in the way of expanding Hungarian exports to Canada, and that the request to open a trade office is a perfectly reasonable one from the trade point of view. The trade motives take priority in this, though the rapid changes in the political situation in Hungary also argue in favour of a more forthcoming attitude towards the Hungarians than would have been possible a few months back. May I, therefore, have your permission to tell the Hungarians that they may open a trade office, once a trade agreement is concluded and ratified, subject to the sort of conditions set forth in paragraphs 4 and 5 of this memorandum.

[143] Vois aussi document 534.
See also Document 534.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH HUNGARY; EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ON GRAIN SHIPMENTS
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE OCT. 18)

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said provisional agreement had been reached on the text of a trade agreement with Hungary and five accompanying exchanges of letters.

The agreement was quite similar to the one made recently with the U.S.S.R. and was substantially along the lines of other Canadian trade agreements and of the main provisions of the G.A.T.T. Unlike the Russian agreement, however, it did not include provisions on shipping, on the legal treatment of citizens and firms, and on arbitration of disputes. It would come into force provisionally on signature but was to be ratified as soon as possible; its duration would be three years.

The exchanges of letters included a reservation by Canada of the right to fix values for ordinary and dumping duty if, as a result of Canadian obligations under the agreement, any product was imported in such quantities or manner as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian producers. The letters also specified the normal procedures to be followed by the Department of National Revenue in assessing values for duty on imports from Hungary. The establishment of a Hungarian commercial office in Canada was also authorized by letter.

It was also proposed that Hungary would agree by letter to purchase, during the terms of the agreement, not less than 300,000 metric tons of wheat in amounts of not less than 50,000 tons each year. Equivalent quantities of barley or wheat flour could be purchased instead of the wheat itself. Finally, agreement had been reached on an exchange of letters providing for the extension of export credits insurance during the present crop year and promising consideration of coverage in the two following crop years.

During the negotiations a number of other questions outstanding between the two countries were discussed, and the Hungarians had promised to bring Canadian representations on those matters to the attention of their government.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce had been informed of the main features of the agreement and supported them. Accordingly, Mr. Pearson recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance and the Acting Minister of National Revenue, that this agreement be entered into, that the proposed exchanges of letters be effected and that the agreement be ratified after Parliament would have had an opportunity to discuss it.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated

(Minister's memorandum, October 24, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 205-56†)

8. Mr. Pearson, as Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, also recommended that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation be authorized to enter into contracts of insurance to cover shipments to Hungary of wheat, wheat flour and/or barley in an amount equivalent to 150,000 tons of wheat, on terms of 15 per cent cash and 85 per cent one year after shipment, at specified rates of premium and with specified insurance liability.

9. Mr. Pearson added that, in view of recent developments in Hungary, it might be desirable to delay signing the agreement for a few days. If the Russians were suddenly to reimpose full control over the country, the present would not be the moment to take this formal step.

10. During the discussion it was said that if a delay in signing might mean that the Hungarians would not purchase wheat, the effects in the Prairie Provinces would be serious. Whatever happened in Hungary at the moment should not affect Canadian action on the agreement. Nevertheless, it would be desirable in present circumstances to postpone signature for a few days if the Hungarians were agreeable.

11. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed,

(a) that a trade agreement of the nature described in the Minister's memorandum of October 24th be made with Hungary;

(b) that the Minister be authorized to sign the agreement on behalf of the government; it being understood that the actual date of signature would be determined by the Minister in the light of developments in Hungary;

(c) that the proposed exchanges of letters accompanying the agreement regarding the fixing of values for ordinary and special duty, the purchase by Hungary of not less than 300,000 metric tons of wheat during the three-year term of the agreement, the insurance of export credits on wheat or barley, the procedures for the valuation of goods imported into Canada and the establishment of a Hungarian commercial office in Canada, be made at the same time as the agreement was signed;

(d) that the agreement be ratified as soon as possible after Parliament had had an opportunity to discuss it; and,

(e) that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation be authorized to insure sales of wheat, wheat flour or barley in an amount equal to 150,000 tons of wheat valued at $13 million to Hungary for shipment during the crop year ending July 31st, 1957, on terms of 15 per cent cash and 85 per cent one year after shipment, at a premium rate of 1 per cent of 85 per cent of the gross invoice value of each shipment, that the liability be limited to 85 per cent of the gross invoice value of each shipment, that the aggregate maximum liability of the corporation under the insurance contracts be not more than $11 million, and that the total amount of insurance outstanding at any time did not cover more than 150,000 tons of wheat or its equivalent.

(Orders in council were passed accordingly in respect of (b) and (e) above; P.C. 1956-1955 and — 1602, Oct. 25)

Note du chef de la Direction économique

Memorandum by Head, Economic Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 2, 1956

PARTING CALLS OF MR. BARABAS, HEAD OF THE HUNGARIAN TRADE DELEGATION

At Mr. Barabas' request arrangements were made for him to call on Mr. Pearson on the afternoon of Thursday, November 1 as he wished to explain why he considered it desirable to defer signature until he reached Paris. Since Mr. Pearson had to leave at noon that day for the General Assembly Mr. Barabas called instead on Mr. Léger.

2. In his conversation with Mr. Léger Mr. Barabas explained that although his Full Powers were still valid he thought it only fair to both Hungary and Canada that he should secure reconfirmation of his original instructions before committing his government to the agreement in its present form. He was satisfied that this agreement was within his original instructions but he wanted to be certain that it was agreeable to the new government of Hungary and that this government would be prepared to carry out its obligations under such an agreement. He remarked that there had been a "fundamental change" in the Hungarian régime and it was therefore necessary for him to communicate directly with those now responsible for his Ministry, which he could do much more readily from Paris (via Frankfurt) than he could from here. He had sent off a telegram but he was not even sure that it had arrived.

3. Mr. Barabas went on to say that the changes which had occurred might affect the inclination of various countries to provide economic assistance to Hungary. He just did not know how likely this was but it was a possibility that had to be allowed for and might affect the attitude of the government to the proposed agreement. On the other hand the new government might be very anxious, as one of its first official acts, to conclude a trade agreement with such an important and highly respected country as Canada.

4. Mr. Léger replied that he thought Mr. Barabas' attitude was quite understandable. He observed that many of the changes which had taken place had been in a direction which would be welcomed by the Canadian people. Canada had always been prepared to be friendly towards Hungary but in the past it had not always been evident that Hungary itself desired Canada's friendship. The "normalising" of relations in many fields was clearly in the interests of both countries. As Mr. Barabas had undoubtedly seen while in Canada, Canadians were sympathetic with the Hungarian people in the difficulties through which they have been going during the past few weeks. It was to be hoped that the trade agreement could now be signed and would be found to be of advantage to both Canada and Hungary. If, of course, there were points in the present agreement which might seem to require further discussion, the Canadian authorities were prepared as always to talk such matters over with Hungarian representatives. In our judgment the present agreement would provide a basis for mutually advantageous trade relations.

5. On the morning of November 2 Mr. Barabas telephoned Mr. Ritchie from Montreal to report that he had now received a message from Frankfurt indicating that his earlier telegram had reached Budapest and that in all probability the Ministry concerned would be confirming his Full Powers and his instructions on Saturday or Monday. In that event he would be able to go ahead and sign the agreement with Mr. Désy early next week. He would be able from Paris to discuss the agreement in more detail with his people in Budapest. If they had problems on particular points he wondered whether he could assure them that even after the agreement had been signed in its present form amendments could be considered under the Consultation Article. Mr. Ritchie said that he was certain that such was the case but he added that if of course the other party found itself unable to accept a proposed amendment the unmodified agreement would presumably continue to be effective for the three year period.

6. Mr. Ritchie also remarked to Mr. Barabas that in the rapidly changing situation there was inevitably at least a remote possibility that legal or other substantial problems might arise up to the last moment. Consequently we had asked our Ambassador in Paris to give us several hours (say twelve) notice of signature in order that we may be able to give final consideration to the matter then. He did not anticipate any difficulty at all but he thought this was a desirable safeguard in order to ensure that both governments were quite satisfied about signature at that time. Mr. Barabas agreed fully and said that he would try to let Mr. Désy know definitely on Monday and then signature might take place the following day.

7. Finally Mr. Barabas remarked that he wished to send brief telegrams of appreciation to Mr. Bull as Head of the Canadian Delegation and to Mr. Léger who had received him in Mr. Pearson's absence. Whether or not these telegrams might be released to the press would be a matter for Mr. Bull and Mr. Léger to decide. Mr. Ritchie said that he was sure Mr. Bull and Mr. Léger would be glad to receive such messages and that they might wish to send some word of appreciation to him in Paris. Even if they did not manage to do that, Mr. Barabas could be sure that we had enjoyed our negotiations with him and had been very happy to have him visit us in Canada.

SIGNATURE OF THE HUNGARIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

The Head of the Hungarian Trade Delegation left Canada on Friday with the intention of communicating with his Government from Paris and then advising our Embassy of the date on which he would be in a position to sign. Before his departure he was told that we would expect to have twelve hours' notice from our Embassy before signature to permit us to consider whether in the legal and political situation existing at the time we would be willing to proceed with the signing.

2. We have not yet heard from our Embassy but may hear later today or tomorrow. In the light of developments in Hungary over the week-end I would recommend that the Government should decide now whether it would be ready to enter into a trade agreement with Hungary in the foreseeable future. If the decision is that signature should be postponed indefinitely I would suggest that a public announcement to this effect should be made immediately as the newspaper correspondents in Ottawa are already beginning to speculate concerning the Government's intentions. In that event the Head of the Hungarian Delegation would be told when he appears at our Embassy that we have decided not to go ahead with signature for the time being. We might give no reason or we might explain our reluctance to sign in terms of the deplorable methods used to install the present Government in power and our uncertainty concerning our future relations with that Government. If we were to give such reasons we would have to recognize that in doing so we were ruling out any trade agreement with Hungary for a good while to come.

3. In considering whether or not to proceed with signature you will undoubtedly wish to take account of the fact that a failure to complete this agreement may affect the sale of 100,000 or more tons of wheat during the current year and further sales in the two subsequent years. Although such a possible consequence may deserve considerable weight, I think you will agree that it is more than outweighed by the domestic and international political repercussions of what might appear to be a friendly act towards this new and objectionable Soviet puppet régime in Hungary.[144]

4. You may wish to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister if you agree that a decision should probably be taken before Cabinet next meets.

HUNGARIAN TRADE DELEGATION

It is somewhat difficult to give impressions of the Hungarian Trade Delegation retrospectively. In the following notes, however, I have tried to record what my impressions were at the time and have tried to keep them from being coloured by subsequent developments.

2. As you are aware, this delegation consisted of:

Dr. Klara Tolnai
Mr. Tibor Barabas (Head of Delegation)
Mr. Zoltan Szakacs
Mr. Karoly Rose

In addition, Mr. Schaeffer, who apparently looks after Hungarian affairs at the Polish Legation here, was associated with the delegation although in fact I recall having seen him with them only once and that was at the time of their arrival at the airport.

3. I think it would generally be agreed by those participating on the Canadian side that throughout this group behaved in a manner which was considerably different from that to which we had become accustomed in our earlier negotiations with delegations from Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR. Although those other delegations (particularly the ones from the USSR and Poland) had impressed us with their ability and flexibility, these qualities were even more marked in this Hungarian group. In addition, they seemed to be genuinely interested in Canadian "culture" and Canadian affairs. There were several evidences even during the early stages of the negotiations (which began around October 2) that they were anxious to widen their contacts in many fields with other countries, including Canada. They were also quite obviously proud of the achievements of Hungarians abroad, even though such Hungarians were clearly unfriendly to the Communist Government of Hungary. When I remarked to Barabas on one occasion that Hungary seemed to have produced a lot of prominent economists for such a small country (e.g. Kaldor and Balogh in the United Kingdom and Varga in the USSR) he replied that Hungary's contribution of outstanding people to the rest of the world had not been confined to economists. He observed that in almost any field you could think of Hungarians had distinguished themselves in many parts of the world (e.g. Ormondy, etc.). They even seemed pleased that a Hungarian Canadian had been chosen as "Miss Rough Rider" despite the fact that the local press played up her political differences with the Hungarian Government.

4. There was quite definitely an appearance of independence and national pride in the case of these Hungarians which I had not noticed to anything like the same degree in the other Eastern European delegations which have been here.

5. Both in the negotiations themselves and in private conversations all four of the Hungarians talked very much in terms of Western concepts and never used the clichés which almost always seemed to intrude into the talk of representatives of other Eastern European countries at one point or another. The matters raised by them in the negotiations were invariably related to practical trading questions and there was no attempt to bring in extraneous considerations, although Barabas quite frankly admitted on several occasions that a trade agreement was of even greater interest to his country for the purpose of developing general relations with Canada than for the purpose of expanding trade. Unlike the Russians he did not try to make something out of the rather phony issue of the treatment of natural and juridical persons. In fact, when we omitted this provision from the draft agreement he made no comment whatever.

6. Even before things started happening in Hungary several of the Canadian officials remarked on the obvious intelligence of the delegation and the ease with which ordinary conversation could be carried on with them. This was particularly true of Barabas and also, I think, of Rose. Dr. Tolnai, the lady member of the delegation, claimed that she had been a teacher of English language or literature and her conversation seemed to bear this out. It was a little difficult to determine exactly what her role was, although she did take fairly copious notes at the various meetings (but not apparently in shorthand). I had less conversation with Szakacs (who was said to be the heavy industry man while Rose was the representative of light industry), but my superficial impressions of him were not as favourable as in the case of Barabas and Rose. The words which were used most frequently by several Canadian officials (Sharp, Plumptre and Rasminsky) to describe Barabas, and even the group generally, were "cultivated" and "civilized". Parenthetically, it might be noted that, unlike other delegations from that part of the world, this Hungarian group appeared to be remarkably abstemious. While they had a drink socially with us on several occasions there was no tendency to convert a quiet party into a drinking bout. Their own cocktail party for the Canadian delegation was subdued and pleasant.

7. All of the delegation apparently had families still in Budapest. Dr. Tolnai had an elderly mother and the others seemed to have younger families about which they appeared much concerned when the uprising started.

8. We did not get a great deal of information on the backgrounds of the individual members of the delegation, although Barabas himself was clearly an experienced negotiator who had been working out trade agreements with many countries at least over the past six months. He remarked to me that he had in fact negotiated on four continents (including South and Southeast Asia) within that time and for that reason was anxious to get back to see his family from whom he had been almost continuously separated during this period.

9. There were no apparent differences in the reactions of the individual members of the delegation to the events in Hungary. All seemed personally troubled but none commented very precisely on the politics of the situation except at a luncheon which Mr. Watkins gave on October 26. On that occasion I was sitting between Rose and Szakacs, and found Rose quite prepared and even anxious to talk about political developments at home. Although we had excused the temporary postponement of signature of the agreement on practical grounds and had not related it to developments in Budapest, Rose did not attempt to take advantage of this in order to avoid discussing the uprising. Instead he remarked almost at the beginning of the meal that he found our disinclination to sign immediately quite understandable in view of the headlines which were appearing currently in the newspapers. He thought it might look quite strange to see such headlines and then find on an inside page an announcement that a trade agreement had been concluded with Hungary. From this opening remark he went on to express some views on the significance of what was happening.

10. He said quite vigorously that something like this had become inevitable. People were so discontented that some outburst could not be avoided. When Schwarzmann on his left asked him whether economic conditions lay behind this discontent he replied that this was part of the reason. Undoubtedly living conditions had become worse and people were dissatisfied. He thought the old government had gone much too far in emphasizing heavy industry and doing nothing obvious about the standard of living of the ordinary people. In addition people had become restless at the suppression of criticism. He felt that the former government had unnecessarily repressed free criticism. It could have tolerated much more criticism without suffering seriously. The people would then have been happier and the government might have been better. Another factor was the treatment of Nagy who was very popular and who had become an important symbol. So long as he was kept out of public life a lot of Hungarian people could not be satisfied that everything was alright.

11. Rose expressed the view that the great mistake of the previous government had been to delay Nagy's return by just about two days too many (and also to delay too long the eviction of Geroe whom Rose described as the representative of the "extreme left wing"). During this interval the pressure began to grow and things simply got out of hand. "Right wing elements" were able to take advantage of the situation.

12. Rose had no doubt that the government would continue to follow a "socialist" course. He thought, however, that their agricultural policy might be modified somewhat. The pre-war situation with a few large estates and many minute peasant holdings had been quite unsatisfactory. Since the war agricultural policy had probably gone too far in the other direction. Nagy was very popular with the people in the countryside and would undoubtedly be more responsive to their interests and wishes.

13. About half way through the luncheon Rose and Szakacs more or less simultaneously started enquiring of their luncheon neighbours concerning the organization of the "Reformed Church" in Canada. This led to a lengthy comparison of the organization of the Presbyterian Church in Canada (of which Gordon Urquhart happened to have been an officer for some 35 years) with the Reformed Church in Hungary. Both Rose and Szakacs seemed to be very familiar with the set-up of the Reformed Church, with Rose rather inclined to defer to Szakacs on some of the more technical points. The conversation of this subject went on so long that when Mr. Watkins made some general remarks to the luncheon party at the end of the meal he prefaced them with an apology for interrupting the "theological discussion" which was still proceeding actively at the other side of the table.

14. The only other point of interest in the luncheon conversation of Rose was a remark which he made about the role of the Soviets in the Middle East. He asked me what I thought about the latest news reports on developments in the Middle East. After I replied that I thought it looked pretty bad he mused that it struck him as very strange that a Communist state like the USSR should be associating closely with thoroughgoing Muslim states in that area.

15. When the signing of the agreement was repeatedly delayed Barabas and his colleagues seemed quite understanding and made no attempt to press us or embarrass us. On October 30 when Barabas and Rose called in to discuss a possible date for signature they asked me whether we had an AFP news ticker as they were anxious to get the latest reports on what was happening in Budapest. When I took them in to the ticker the first item which caught their eye was the announcement that the Hungarian Delegation to the United Nations was being dismissed and replaced by one more representative of the new government. Rose remarked to Barabas that fortunately things didn't change that way in the trade field.

16. In a separate memorandum I have already reported on the parting calls which Mr. Barabas made on November 1. Attached is the text† of the en clair message which Mr. Barabas sent on the following day to Mr. Léger. A somewhat similar message (without the references to democracy and independence) was sent to Mr. Bull. In the light of subsequent developments we thought it best to give a security classification to Mr. Barabas' personal message to Mr. Léger. Mr. Bull is proposing to send a personal message to Barabas in care of the Hungarian Embassy in Paris in which he will speak highly of the respect which we developed for Barabas as a negotiator and for the able way in which he represented the trading interest of his country in the negotiations. Since this message will undoubtedly end up in unfriendly hands (that is the main reason for sending it) it will be expressed in such a way as to make it difficult for the present government to pretend that Barabas was not an effective negotiator on behalf of his country.

17. Attached is a copy of Telegram 819 from the Embassy in Paris concerning the decision which Barabas apparently has taken. We do not know what has happened to the other negotiators. Dr. Tolnai had planned originally to spend two or three days in London on the way back and both we and Earnscliffe had made a considerable effort to get her a visa without undue delay. When Barabas and Rose were in the office on October 30 they indicated that Dr. Tolnai was anxious to have her passport back as she was now planning to go directly to Hungary. Although we told them on the basis of information from Earnscliffe that there was some hope that her visa could be issued later that day, even though it might have to be after hours, they asked to have her passport back since they said Dr. Tolnai was leaving on a plane for Europe the next day. Accordingly we returned the passport to them. Dr. Tolnai was not present herself on that occasion as she was said to be in Montreal where the delegation had spent the past week except for the occasional visits to Ottawa for calls on this Department.

HUNGARIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Barabas called to see me yesterday afternoon before your telegram had arrived. He handed me the sealed envelope containing the documents and said at once that in view of the political situation in Hungary he could not sign the agreement. He asked particularly that no publicity should be given to his decision since it might give rise to difficulties for his family who are still in Hungary.

HUNGARIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Désy, in his telegram attached,† reports that Barabas has approached him requesting signature of the proposed trade agreement with Hungary. Copies of this telegram have been passed to the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance for the comments of their Ministers. At the same time, it was noted that I would recommend to you that no action on the agreement be taken under existing circumstances. (Mr. Harris has signified his concurrence with this but has also suggested that later signature should not be ruled out, and should, in fact, take place at the earliest favourable opportunity).

If you agree and if the Department of Trade and Commerce also report that Mr. Howe concurs, I will send a telegram† to Mr. Désy telling him to inform Barabas that signature cannot now be agreed to, but that this does not rule out signature at a later date if conditions are more favourable.[145]

VIETNAM — THE NEXT MOVE

Your letter under reference with its enclosures (a) "The Next Move in Vietnam",[1] and (b) "Canadian Objectives in Indochina",[2] on which you asked our early comment, reached us only on January 4. In view of your interest in an early response, we shall limit this message to the more general observations which have occurred to us on reading these thoughtful memoranda, and these only in outline as you suggested.

Essentiality of the Commissions

2. Both memoranda underline the necessity of continuing the Commissions in Indochina — memorandum (a), which envisages the withering away of the Commissions after July 1956, perhaps less so than memorandum (b), which deals with the Commissions as essential and continuing features of "the delicate structure on which the peace of Asia might depend".

3. Let us as the devil's advocate question this major premise of essentiality and suggest that the presence of the Commissions in Indochina is only "desirable" rather than "essential". Is it not the fear of war or an acceptance of the status quo (as mentioned in both memoranda) which keeps the peace in Indochina? If the Communists change their minds, would the presence of the Commissions be a major deterrent to renewed hostilities in Indochina (or in Korea where the Communists moved in 1950 with a UN body on the scene)? What real backing has the Commission in Vietnam now that its primary task of overseeing the peaceful redeployment of opposing forces has been completed? The British and French Governments are already somewhat embarrassed by their Geneva commitments and may in time feel not dissimilarly about the Commission in Vietnam; the Soviet Union seems content at the moment to avoid any initiative in Indochina; the United States is specifically uncommitted to the Geneva Accords beyond a pledge not to upset them, and finally, perhaps the most concerned party, South Vietnam, openly opposes the Geneva settlement and has been cool towards the Commission. Other Geneva Conference powers have shown little interest in the settlement or the Commissions, nor have they been encouraged to do so. Are the supervisory powers wise then to be more interested in continuing their onerous duties than those powers on whose behalf they were invited to serve? Would it not be better to let the present Commissions wither as fast as natural political forces allow, avoiding provocative action but leaving it to the powers who must assume responsibilities if the peace is threatened to make the pace?

[1] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 643.
[2] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 640.

4. If, on the other hand, the presence of the Commissions is essential (bearing in mind that the Geneva formula is now unrealistic), what does this mean for Canada in terms of length of service, friction with our friends, our reputation as an objective middle power, and new responsibilities for the maintaining of the peace? The current attitudes especially in Vietnam are not likely to change even after July 1956; do we therefore face indefinite service? We may expect continued differences over Indochina to impinge upon our relations with India and the United States particularly. If the Commissions of which we are members must more and more turn the blind eye to the violation of the letter and the spirit of the Geneva Agreements, will our international reputation not suffer? If, on the other hand, we agree to serve in circumstances where "the Geneva Conference powers recognize the unworkability of the existing programme for a political settlement", do we not assume new responsibilities not in our original agreement to serve?

5. We are not certain of the correct answers to the questions posed above. In our view, however, they suggest that we should carefully weigh the two factors of Commission essentiality and Canadian interest before embarking on any firm plan of action.

Canada's Stake in the Commissions

6. We must ask ourselves whether we would wish to remain on a Commission or Commissions which by inaction would in some sense condone violation of the agreement under which the Commissions served, whether by the Communists or by others. The Swiss and Swedes face this uncomfortable issue now in Korea. Behind the facade of an agreement supervised by an international body the Communists in Korea are building up their military strength while berating the UN for alleged violations which we have been assured have not taken place. While there is little direct evidence in Vietnam as yet of similar violations, i.e., in the matter of military reinforcements, there is no guarantee that this condition will prevail. In Laos we know that the Pathet Lao cannot and do not stand alone. In Cambodia there has been some recent evidence of Polish skulduggery.[3] We know from experience that Communist régimes cannot be counted on to carry out their pledged agreement, even to a bargain, and further that Communists generally tend to regard concessions by the other side as evidence of weakness to be exploited. Nor can we be certain that

[3] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 666.

Western advice will be accepted in every instance by the Diem Government in Vietnam or the royal government in Laos. The Commissions in Indochina up until now have a good record. Should we be anxious to continue our association with them if it is to become almost impossible to maintain that good record?

The Link Between the Settlements

7. Memorandum (b), more so perhaps than memorandum (a), gives prominence to the importance of the link which exists in the Communist mind between the activities not only of the three Commissions in Indochina but also of the NNSC in Korea. Mention is made as well of the inter-relation of events in the Formosa Straits, Korea and Indochina. The sound argument which is based on this analysis of Communist thinking is that the West should be careful not to disturb the Communists unduly in any one section of this sensitive chain lest this provoke dangerous Communist reaction in another section. It is perhaps equally valid to argue that firm (not provocative) action by the non-Communist powers concerned in one section of the chain would have a beneficial effect elsewhere; if, for example, some balancing action is taken in Korea to offset obvious Communist violation of the armistice, there may be less inclination on the part of the Communists in Vietnam to follow these same practices.

The New Formula

8. The formula suggested in paragraph 20 of memorandum (a) is ingenious although it might perhaps be interpreted as giving the final declaration of the Geneva Conference even more weight (by indirection admittedly) than it has at the moment, and for that reason the Diem Government might find it difficult even to acquiesce by silence. It might be a slight improvement to refer to Article 14 of the Cease-fire Agreement rather than to the Final Declaration.

9. If, on the other hand, it could be assumed that the acceptance by the interested powers of the status quo in Vietnam, rather than the Armistice Agreement or the Commission itself, keeps the peace, it may be possible to do something more positive than is suggested in the formula to involve the one important party in the continuance of the Commission which is so far not deeply involved, i.e., the [... Govern]ment. A part of the idea suggested by Scott, the U.K. [Commissioner General] in Southeast Asia (our letter 1988 of December 9)† [...][4] Vietnam might be asked a series of questions concerning the political settlement. Their answers would probably indicate that there was no basis for immediate action and this lack of agreement in a sense would be a new agreement replacing the Geneva formula. Some such approach might be even more satisfactory to the Indians if, as memorandum (a) suggests, the Indians desire some alternative arrangements "outside the Geneva settlement".

Consultations

10. It seems to us that whatever plan you contemplate adopting for dealing with the immediate situation in Vietnam should be discussed, in general terms at least, with the United States Government as well as with the United Kingdom and French Governments. It has been our experience that important suggestions such as those contained in the Departmental memoranda are discussed by the Foreign Office with the State Department

[4] Les crochets comprendraient la partie du texte qui manque à l'original, un des coins de celui-ci ayant été déchiré.
The material in square brackets indicates the portion of the text missing from the original, which has been torn in one corner.

as a matter of routine. We would recommend, however, that, for the more substantial reason of United States interest and responsibility in Indochina, we should discuss with the State Department, from an early stage, our ideas on the future of the Commissions. Whenever we have adopted this practice we have had a measure of success in gaining for our positions the support of the State Department and its not inconsiderable influence on the specific matter under consideration. Finally, with reference to paragraph 23 of memorandum (a), we would suggest that perhaps in discussing our plans with the Indians, we should not become involved in threatening the Indians with United States action even by allusion.

11. We shall not include in this message a number of the further detailed comments which occur to us on specific points made in the two Departmental memoranda because our object here has been to indicate the main questions which arise in our minds (and which may arise in other minds) in studying the memoranda. Memorandum (a) as it stands is the kind of balanced analysis which could serve as a good basis for preliminary discussion with other interested governments. We hope that some of the ideas in this message might, however, assist in making that memorandum even more effective.

VIETNAM: THE NEXT MOVE

I am somewhat reluctant to adopt the policy recommended in the Departmental memorandum [The Next Move in Vietnam] enclosed with the letter under reference until we get a clearer picture of the Indian appreciation of the Vietnam situation and particularly of Mr. Nehru's attitude which I believe to be of fundamental importance. Consequently before we embark on any campaign to convince the Indians of the desirability of maintaining the Vietnam Commission in being for an indefinite period I would be grateful if you would try to see Mr. Nehru himself and ascertain the direction of his thinking.

2. As a point of departure for your enquiries you might take the section on Indochina in the Nehru-Bulganin-Khruschev communiqué[5] and ask for information on the views exchanged on this subject with the Soviet leaders. I would particularly like to know what Indian intentions are likely to be in the event that the "impediments" to the Vietnam settlement alluded to in the communiqué persist — i.e. if the South Vietnamese Government persist in their refusal to assume responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement and to engage in substantive discussion with the Democratic Republic on the holding of elections.

[5] Voir/See New York Times, December 14, 1955.

3. If Mr. Nehru is inclined to reply by enquiring about Canadian views you might indicate that your interpretation of whatever information you have leads you to believe that the tentative direction of our thinking is along the following lines:

(a) It is vital to the maintenance of peace generally and to the working out of a more durable settlement that the existing armistice be maintained.

(b) Collapse of the present arrangements for international supervision of the armistice might well lead both the Democratic Republic and the State of Vietnam to seek other props to their security which could contribute to tensions and instability in the area (for your information — not for mentioning to Mr. Nehru — what we have in mind is that weakening of the present framework of the armistice and apprehension of a new threat from the North might lead South Vietnam to appeal for more explicit United States and SEATO commitments to the defence of South Vietnam).

(c) It would be extremely difficult to get the Geneva Conference powers to negotiate a new settlement within the next several months which would take account of the present political realities in Vietnam, or even to agree upon new terms of reference for the International Commission. The British and French (let alone the South Vietnamese) could hardly agree to more specific undertakings for a settlement than that contained in paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration, and on the other hand the Communist Governments could hardly accept any dilution of the present programme for a political settlement.

(d) We recognize and indeed share India's desire not to be a party to the frustration of the Geneva settlement, and would be prepared to consider joining India in seeking the guidance and assistance of the Co-Chairmen in dealing with the problems relating to the future of the Commission. Pending progress towards a political settlement or pending the issuance of new instructions to the present Commission the question arises as to whether it might not be possible or desirable to get all the Geneva Conference powers to acquiesce in the continuance for the time being of the present arrangements both of the armistice and of international supervision of it. Both sides presumably wish to see the cease fire maintained and the present state of North-South relations and the international situation generally suggest that some degree of international supervision may be needed for a time in order to maintain the armistice. Acquiescence by the Geneva powers in this sense would surely absolve the Commission powers from any responsibility for contributing to the frustration of the Geneva settlement.

(e) We are anxious to liquidate our supervisory obligations in all three Indochinese States, but are even more anxious that in the process of doing so we do not contribute to the development of new tensions in the area and a new threat to the peace which could have serious repercussions elsewhere.

(f) We contemplate the continuance of the anomalies in the Vietnamese situation with anxiety, but nevertheless believe that they are not nearly so serious as in Korea, where it has been possible to maintain a relatively stable armistice even though the South Koreans denounce its terms much more vociferously than the South Vietnamese object to their armistice, and offer no practical cooperation whatsoever.

4. If you find it necessary to advance these views it should be done on a very tentative basis only. The main object of your interview should be to elicit Indian ideas, not to press our own. Before putting a case of the kind outlined in our memorandum to the Indians we would like to exchange views with the British and possibly the Americans and French as well on the basis of such information as you are able to obtain concerning Mr. Nehru's thinking. We will wish to study your report on your interview with Mr. Nehru before we pass any information concerning our own or Indian views on this matter to other friendly governments.

5. If you sense any intention on the part of the Indians to state their position formally in the near future or to deliver to the Co-Chairmen any ultimatum about withdrawal from the Commission, particularly in response to the recent circular note[6] from the Co-Chairmen to the Geneva Conference powers and the Commission powers, you might express the hope that they will not act without again exchanging views with us.

VIETNAM — NEXT MOVE

I called on Mister Nehru January 18 to discuss the atomic reactor project[7] and Vietnam. He had been briefed by M.J. Desai just before I saw him. My impression is that he used part of this briefing in speaking to me although what he said was not entirely consistent with Desai's line later in the day. I do not think he has been giving much attention lately to Vietnam. His mind has been on other things. For instance, it was only on the 16th that the government announced its decisions on most of the difficult problems connected with states reorganization.

2. As you suggested I started the discussion by referring to the section of the Soviet-Indian communiqué. Nehru said that there had been virtually no discussion with the Soviet leaders on Indochina. There had been not much more than a reference by them to the lack of cooperation by South Vietnam. They indeed showed little desire to talk about East Asian or Southeast Asian problems generally. Thus they would say about some problems that they understood that these were being discussed by the Chinese with the U.S. Ambassador in Geneva. They gave the impression that they were content to leave to China the responsibilities for dealing with problems in this area.

3. When I referred to the two impediments as being, first, the refusal of South Vietnam to assume responsibilities under the Cease-fire Agreement, and secondly the refusal to engage in substantive discussions with the North on the holding of elections, Nehru said it was really one impediment. He was not particularly concerned by the refusal of the South formally to accept responsibilities under the Agreement as long as they gave practical cooperation. The important thing was to get the two sides to meet to talk about elections. He did not think anything much would come of the talks to begin with but he always considered it was better to talk on matters like this than not to talk.

[6] Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 2834, Documents relating to British Involvement in the Indo-China Conflict, 1945-1965, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1965, Document 60, pp. 114-115.

[7] Voir/See Volume 22, Document 670.

4. He went on to say that the only people who could do anything were the two Co-Chairmen. He did not know what steps they could take except to give strong advice (presumably he meant to the South) to get the two sides to meet. He again repeated that "The important thing is that they should meet."

5. As you will see from my immediately following telegram† Desai took the line that the South should formally accept responsibilities under a new agreement. I did not draw his attention to this apparent divergence from the views expressed to me by Nehru in the morning since I think it is just as well as this stage that Indian policy should not become too rigid. My impression is that once Nehru becomes fully aware of the problem he will agree with Desai.

CONVERSATIONS WITH UK OFFICIALS — INDOCHINA

Departmental officials had useful discussions yesterday and today with Sir Harold Caccia and Sir Hubert Graves (Far Eastern adviser to the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington) on Indochina. They showed us a draft message to Mr. Nehru (which has now been despatched for oral delivery by Mr. MacDonald, and which is being repeated to you separately) arguing that the Geneva Agreements should be maintained in force but that no useful purpose would be served at this stage by a reconvening of the Geneva Conference.

Vietnam

2. With respect to Vietnam we indicated our general accord with the substance of this message, subject to an amendment mentioned in paragraph 3 below. We expressed the view, however, that this démarche to the Indians — while a most useful step towards deferring a crisis on the political aspect of the Geneva settlement — may not of itself suffice to dispose of all the causes of Indian irritation with the present situation in Vietnam. Refusal of the Diem Government to accept responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement was rendering the Vietnam Commission progressively more unworkable, and it was desirable that steps be taken now to avoid a situation in which Indian patience might be stretched to the breaking point, thus precipitating a premature withdrawal of the Commission in circumstances that could have unfortunate results — e.g. increased tensions owing to uncertainty regarding the continuing implementation of the armistice, incidents on the demarcation line, increased aggressiveness on the part of the Vietminh, increased involvement of SEATO in Vietnam, and — most important of all — Indian exasperation with the Diem Government and its Western supporters for their unwillingness to co-operate with and support Indian efforts to make the Geneva settlement work.

3. While it was admitted that the Diem Government would probably continue to oppose very firmly any legal commitment to uphold the Geneva settlement, it was agreed that everything possible should be done to induce the French and Vietnamese to work out some arrangement for the transfer of responsibilities now resting on the French high command which would enable the Vietnam Agreement to continue in force. The Vietnamese request for the early withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps from South Vietnam provides an immediate occasion for the resumption of Franco-Vietnamese negotiations concerning future responsibility for the discharge of the present obligations of the French high command under the Cease Fire Agreement. Efforts to promote the success of these negotiations should go some way towards reassuring the Indians that something is being done to put the Vietnam Commission on a more workable basis (it was for this reason that we suggested that the message to Mr. Nehru include some reference to the prospect of the early commencement of these negotiations, which now appears as paragraph 3 of the message). Moreover if the negotiations are successful — or even partly successful — the prospect of winding up with the makings of a reasonably stable armistice would be much improved.

4. As a result of our discussions concerning Vietnam we understand that the United Kingdom are prepared:

(1) To raise with the French the desirability of getting started as soon as possible on negotiations with the Vietnamese concerning the transfer of responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement of the French High Command;

(2) To obtain from the French draft proposals for an exchange of notes with the Vietnamese on this subject, with a view to their discussing with the United States ways and means of furthering the progress of the negotiations; and in this connection;

(3) To take the matter up with the Diem Government before the South Vietnamese Assembly is convened and to impress upon it the advantages to the South Vietnamese of reaching an agreement with the French and thereby enabling the Armistice Agreement to remain in force; and

(4) To keep the Indians informed of the progress of the negotiations and to counsel them to exercise patience with respect to the Commission's difficulties while the negotiations are in hand.

Laos

5. The Pathet Lao reply of January 25 to the January 7 political resolution can be considered as a rejection and the Commission has agreed to a factual report on the outcome to the Co-Chairmen, probably within the week. We informed the United Kingdom officials that it might be difficult to persuade the Indians that the Commission should give publicity to the results, although our Commissioner in Vientiane has not given up hope that this might take place. We agreed that it would be desirable to make the most of the Pathet Lao refusal and Sir Harold Caccia expressed the opinion that Mr. Lloyd would undoubtedly agree to send Mr. Molotov a strong note and give it full publicity. We hoped, however, that any publicity given by the US or UK Governments to the fact that the January 7 resolution upheld the Royal Government's right to restore its administrative control over the Northern provinces would be phrased in such a way as not encourage the Royal Government to expect SEATO backing for an attempt to recover control by military action.

6. We also took the opportunity to brief our United Kingdom colleagues concerning the latest developments regarding the cease fire resolution of December 9, 1955. Both the Royal Government and the Pathet Lao accepted this resolution, which was also reiterated in the January 7 political resolution, but the Royal Government are unwilling to agree to a military demarcation line set by the Commission's military committee on the basis of earlier agreements reached between the military liaison groups of both parties and confirmed by the Katay-Souvannavong cease fire agreement signed at the Rangoon Conference. As all hope of an early political settlement appears to have faded the RLG are afraid, and quite rightly so, that by agreeing to a demarcation line they would in fact be agreeing to a formal de facto partition of their kingdom.

7. The Indians are insisting that a demarcation line is the only sensible way of preventing hostilities and that the RLG must live up to its former agreements. They argue that one of the major purposes of the International Commission in Laos is to ensure that the armistice is kept. The Indian's insistence on a demarcation line recommendation being passed by the Commission confronts us with the choices of

(a) abstaining

(b) voting against the Indians, and Poles who are supporting their views, or

(c) voting for a recommendation which the RLG will not accept.

8. Because of earlier positions we took in the Commission on this subject, admittedly at a time when we had more hope that a political settlement might be worked out, we would find it difficult now to split with the Indians on this issue without antagonizing them to an extent where we might lose their co-operation in our efforts to place the blame, where it principally lies, on the Pathet Lao for their failure to accept the restoration of the RLG administration in Phongsaly and Samneua. If we vote for a demarcation line resolution, however, we would run a very grave risk of having to follow this up with a censure of the Royal Government for its failure to co-operate with the Commission in its attempts to put a stop to hostilities. We suggested, therefore, that we might consult urgently with the Foreign Office in London on the basis of recent communications from our Commissioner and the United Kingdom Ambassador to try to determine the right course to be followed in this perplexing situation.

Cambodia

9. Although Cambodia was not mentioned in the United Kingdom communication to Nehru we discussed the future of the Commission in Cambodia with our United Kingdom visitors. We explained that, while we had an understanding with the Indians regarding the desirability of a progressive reduction of the Commission's personnel and activities leading up to its eventual withdrawal, the Indians might decide, on legal grounds, to accept the Polish view that a decision to withdraw the Commission must be unanimous and that any one member has a legal veto power over its dissolution. In such circumstances it might be difficult for the Commission to dissolve itself, especially as the Poles have indicated they are opposed to this.

10. We suggested that United Kingdom Government might initiate a frank discussion of the problem with the Cambodian Government pointing out that the settlements in Laos and Vietnam are of concern to the security of Cambodia and that therefore they should be patient and not take any precipitate action regarding the Commission. We also suggested that it would be helpful if the United Kingdom would point out to Cambodia that it should in its own interests avoid bringing any new business, such as the recent border disputes with South Vietnam, to the Commission for settlement. The United Kingdom might also consider telling the Cambodians that a way would be found to withdraw the Commission from Cambodia in a few months. In the meantime Cambodia might be warned to be prepared to give assurances that it will accept responsibility for the continued implementation of those articles of the General Agreement which will continue to apply until there is a settlement in Vietnam.

For London — We did not have an opportunity to check this outline with Sir Hubert Graves or Sir Harold Caccia. Copies are however being made available to Earnscliffe and we suggest you pass copies to CRO and the Foreign Office.

For Washington — You may brief the State Department orally and in general terms concerning our talks as outlined above, checking first to ascertain whether the United Kingdom Embassy has passed a copy of the message to Nehru to the State Department.

For New Delhi — You will receive a separate message concerning information which might be passed to the Indians.

For Paris — As the United Kingdom will be discussing the Vietnam problem with the French in the near future, it might be more helpful to the United Kingdom approach if no detailed information on the Vietnam talks were passed to the French at the present time. If UK Embassy has informed French about communication to Nehru you could say we discussed this and prospects of improving Vietnamese cooperation with the Commission. You may give full information on Laos and Cambodia discussions.

INDOCHINA — UNITED KINGDOM MESSAGE TO NEHRU

Subject to minor textual amendments following is the message from Mr. Selwyn Lloyd to Mr. Nehru, despatched yesterday to New Delhi for oral delivery by Mr. MacDonald.

Message begins:

1. The position in South Vietnam, although improving, is not yet very solid. The majority of the population, which now includes three-quarters of a million refugees from the North, remains very sensitive to any move which might suggest the possibility of an eventual extension of Vietminh rule to the South. The view of the government appears to be that to embark on consultations with the more populous and tightly-organised North, with the prospect of eventual nation-wide elections as the final stage in the process, would disturb, and indeed alarm, public opinion to such a degree that further efforts an internal consultation would be fruitless. In this they may be right. At any rate, our view, based on the advice we have received from Saigon, is that until there is a government which has received a popular mandate in the March elections, Mr. Diem would be most unlikely to move far from his present position. In these circumstances, we think that no useful purpose would be served at this stage by re-convening the Geneva Conference. This does not mean that we have abandoned the stand we took in 1954 over the desirability of genuinely free, properly supervised elections. But we must base our policies on the facts as they are. We would hope that when the Government in South Vietnam is more soundly based, they would be in a more solid position to make contacts with the North, which may open up more far-reaching possibilities. We shall certainly use our influence to persuade the Government of Vietnam to work towards this.

2. Meanwhile, we are convinced that the efficient discharge of the onerous duties imposed on the International Supervisory Commissions in Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, and especially the additional chairmanship and secretarial functions undertaken by the Indian authorities have contributed largely to the upholding of the cease-fire agreements. By exercising a practical judgment on various issues, the Commissions have helped to ensure the continued effectiveness of the agreements. We are, of course, well aware of the practical difficulties which the Commissions have encountered.

3. A recent development has also to be taken into account. We understand that the French have been formally requested by the Vietnam Government to withdraw their expeditionary force. We fully expect that negotiations will be held between the French and the Vietnam[ese] regarding the obligations which the French now have under the 1954 Agreement. We shall, of course, do what we can to impress on Mr. Diem the necessity of placing the relations between his Government and the Commission on a more workable basis.

4. So far as Laos is concerned, we have been impressed by the finding of the Supervisory Commission as disclosed in its resolution of January 7. This drew attention once more to the rights of the Royal Government throughout its territory and pointed to violations of the agreement by the Pathet Lao faction. We have since heard that the International Commission received an entirely unsatisfactory reply in a letter dated January 25. We trust nevertheless that Mr. Nehru will share our view that the terms of the resolution of January 7 shall be fulfilled, and that no steps shall be taken which would appear to result in the formalisation of the partition of the country.

5. We have given much thought to these several problems of Indochina and our conclusion is that there is much to be gained by doing all we can to sustain the 1954 Agreements. We very much hope that we shall have Mr. Nehru's valuable support along the lines suggested. Message ends.

For your information only, we had an opportunity to see the message in draft form and to suggest amendments to paragraph 3 and 4. The message in its final form was concurred in by the Minister.

CONVERSATIONS WITH UK OFFICIALS — INDOCHINA

We suggest that you take an early opportunity to inform Mr. Nehru or Mr. Desai of the general nature of our discussions with United Kingdom officials concerning Indochina. Without associating us with the message which Mr. Lloyd sent to Mr. Nehru, you might say that so far as the political aspect of the Geneva settlement was concerned we agree with the considerations which have led the United Kingdom to the conclusion that no useful purpose would be served at this stage by seeking to reconvene the Geneva Conference. We do not think that Diem would agree to South Vietnamese participation.

2. You might go on to say that we reviewed with the United Kingdom officials the present and future tasks of the three Commissions. In connection with Vietnam we discussed in particular the difficulties facing the Commission there arising from the separation of responsibility and authority in South Vietnam — difficulties which would have to be rectified if the International Commission is to perform its task properly. We called attention to the recent South Vietnamese request that the French Expeditionary Corps be withdrawn, which should provide an immediate occasion for the resumption of Franco-Vietnamese negotiations on the future discharge of the obligations under the Cease Fire Agreement now resting on the French High Command. We expressed the view that the solution of this problem by the French and the South Vietnamese would be necessary if the Armistice Agreement were to be continued in force. We asked the United Kingdom to use its influence with both parties to encourage the progress of these negotiations. We are making similar representations to the Americans.

8. The foregoing outline of our exchange of views with the United Kingdom is not intended as the considered views on the future of the Commission which the Indians presumably expect from us in exchange for what they have told us of their own thinking. If you think it desirable you might tell the Indians that you have the personal impression that we may have some more detailed comments concerning the future course of developments with respect to the Geneva settlement to pass on to them in the near future. For your information, we hope to get these to you within the next week, but do not wish to make a commitment to give additional views until these have been approved by the Minister.

9. We received the impression that one of the principal reasons why the United Kingdom are anxious to avoid a reconvening of the Geneva Conference is that they think the United States and South Vietnam would refuse to participate, and since the French would be chiefly interested in unloading their special responsibilities, the United Kingdom would be placed in the embarrassing position of having to defend a weak position against Chinese, Russian, Vietminh and Indian pressure.

10. In view of the United Kingdom message to Mr. Nehru and of your impression of Krishna Menon's intention to propose three-cornered discussions in New Delhi on Vietnam in the near future, you may be sounded out on this proposal, which both the Communist states and the Indians may regard as the next best substitute for a reconvened Geneva Conference. We would regard it as a great mistake for us to participate in a meeting whose principal object would be to draft amendments to the programme for a political settlement: we would be unable to protect the position of South Vietnam in any paper plan which might be devised for the holding of free elections and subsequent unification. The production by the supervisory powers of any revised version of Paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration — either with or without Canadian concurrence — would serve only to provide the Communists with the means of bringing additional pressure on South Vietnam and putting them at an even greater propaganda disadvantage. We might have to adopt a more flexible position on proposals that the Commission powers meet to review progress and prospects in the implementation of the cease fire agreements and even the drafting of amendments to the cease fire agreements, since there is provision for this in the agreements themselves.

11. Accordingly, if the Indians raise this idea of a special meeting of the Commission powers, you might say that you would have to consult Ottawa, but that your own impression is that we have always regarded our responsibilities with respect to Indochina as limited to the supervision of the three armistices, and that you believe that the Government would be very reluctant indeed to take part in discussions concerning the political settlement in Vietnam, particularly in the absence of the parties directly concerned; that consideration by the supervisory powers of amendments to the cease fire agreements might be a different matter, but your own opinion is that until the results of Franco-Vietnamese discussions insofar as they relate to the assumption of responsibilities by South Vietnam for the maintenance of the armistice are apparent, it would be difficult for the supervisory powers to do a constructive job in this field.

VIETNAM

We received today, February 9, your telegram under reference covering the recent Ottawa conversations on Indochina with United Kingdom representatives. Several days ago arrangements had been made for a discussion today with Young, the Director of the State Department's Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, by Old Commonwealth representatives, as one of the regular series of talks which we have with him. Sir Hubert Graves, who had been in Ottawa, attended for the United Kingdom. In the course of the discussion, perhaps inevitably, we found ourselves in the somewhat awkward position of listening to Sir Hubert outline Canadian thinking on Indochinese subjects which had become evident in the talks in Ottawa. We saw Young separately following the Commonwealth meeting, to supplement from your telegram under reference Sir Hubert's account of the Ottawa meeting. What follows is an outline of Young's reaction to the points of immediate concern made both at the Commonwealth meeting and at our separate meeting with him.

2. We might mention that Sir Hubert, in addition to covering much of the same ground on Vietnam which was covered in your telegram under reference, said that United Kingdom officials had been impressed with the Canadian argument as to the necessity of speaking to Diem immediately on the matter of his assuming practical responsibility for the Commission's activities in Vietnam. Graves said it was your view that to leave an approach to Diem on this score until after the March elections in Vietnam would be delaying action too long. He said that the Foreign Secretary agreed with your point and had instructed Graves to speak to the State Department along these lines. Sir Hubert spoke to Walter Robertson last night in these terms and developed the argument further with Young at our meeting. The final text of the United Kingdom message to Mr. Nehru was to be given to the State Department later today.

3. Much of the discussion with Young on Vietnam both at the Commonwealth meeting and at our separate meeting with him centred on the Vietnamese request for the early withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps. At the time of our earlier conversation with the State Department on this matter (our telegram 216 of February 6†), officials did not know of the second South Vietnamese letter to Hoppenot, which actually requested the withdrawal of the FEC.[8] Young said that even now, however, the State Department's view is that South Vietnam would be willing to see a reduced French Military Mission remain in the country. Young made it clear as well that officials would recommend to Mr. Dulles that a strong and early approach be made to Diem urging him to reach a satisfactory arrangement with the French which would involve the continued presence of a sizable French Mission (perhaps a few thousand personnel). It seemed to be Young's view that Diem might respond favourably to such an approach if it were based mainly on practical grounds of South Vietnamese self-interest, i.e., the continued build-up of the South Vietnamese armed forces and continued trouble-free relations with the United States on the matter of the proper handling of United States military equipment in South Vietnam (cf. our telegram 216 of February 6). Naturally, stress would be laid as well on the importance of providing continued logistic support and security for the International Commission; if, however, the approach to Diem was to be successful, it had to take into account his inability to go too far towards assuming formal responsibility under the Geneva Agreement as such. Young continued to believe that the South Vietnamese letter to the French, in spite of what it said, should be regarded more as a move to force the French to negotiate than as indicative of a real desire by Diem to force the French out of Vietnam entirely. From Young's comments we are inclined to believe that United States action will be taken with Diem which will in part, at least, meet your point that everything possible should be done to induce the French and the Vietnamese to work out some arrangement which will enable the Vietnam agreement to continue in force and which should go some way towards reassuring the Indians that something is being done to put the Commission on a more workable basis.

4. There could be no doubt from our discussion that Young appreciated the other major point with respect to Vietnam made in your telegram under reference, namely, that every effort should be made to avoid the precipitation of a premature withdrawal of the Commission by failure to take into consideration the Indians' views. He expressed the State Department's interest in "an orderly transition from what has been to what is to be". He said that the State Department would be giving immediate thought to the broad possibilities of what came next in Vietnam and he was impressed by the Canadian argument that valuable time between now and March should not be lost. He recognized that the parties mainly concerned should pool their ideas on the future as quickly as possible.

5. Young's more general but interesting comments† on Indochinese developments will be sent to you by bag. We believe that this would be a particularly appropriate time to put considered Canadian views on future moves in Vietnam to the State Department. At a time when reconsideration is being given to United States policy in Vietnam, we can expect Canadian views to have the greatest impact.

DESPATCH 148 Ottawa, February 10, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Our telegram No. Y-229, February 7, 1956.

INDOCHINA

We are enclosing copies of the memoranda on the Future of the Commissions in Indochina which were prepared as departmental papers in connection with the visit earlier this week of the United Kingdom ministers. Copies of these memoranda were made available to United Kingdom officials, and have been passed to the Australian and New Zealand representatives here. You may make copies available to the State Department, and we will pass a copy to the American Embassy here.

2. You will note that these papers were prepared in relation to the three countries individually. It will readily be apparent, however, that certain of the considerations mentioned in relation to the separate Commissions apply with equal force to the Indochina picture when viewed as a whole. Although for the most part we like to deal with the problems of each country separately — and there is a sound basis for this approach — it is, we believe, desirable to keep an eye on the broader view, not merely because the Communists and the Indians tend to regard the Geneva settlement as an integrated whole, but to ensure that there is a uniformity and common purpose to Western policy in Indochina and to ensure that particular and local problems in each of the Indochinese states are dealt with not just in particular and local terms but also as part of a more comprehensive problem.

3. The axiom that peace is indivisible applies with particular force to Indochina when viewed as a whole. There is no question that if serious hostilities were to break out in one country they would soon boil over into the other two, or at least jeopardize the situation in the others to the extent that they would have to be regarded as likely theatres of war. This interrelationship also applies to situations short of war. It would, for instance, be quite impossible to accept the risks of a complete breakdown of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam with nothing left but an armed frontier at the seventeenth parallel uninsured by any mutually accepted armistice arrangements, and still hope to maintain an armistice agreement in Laos and to work towards the restoration of the Royal Government's administration in the two northern provinces by peaceful means. If there is to be an agreed armistice in one country it is necessary to plan for the same in the other and to take the steps necessary to keep an agreed armistice in existence.

4. In addition to serving as shock-absorbers between the two sides in a local sense in Laos and Vietnam (and to some extent between Cambodia and the Vietminh) the International Commissions undoubtedly have a value as a present and living representation of the agreements reached in Geneva in 1954. In the past year and a half, in spite of the difficulties encountered, the shortfalls on performance and the gradual evaporation of any prospect that ever existed of a lasting political settlement, the great powers committed to the Geneva settlement — the USSR and Communist China on the one hand and, on the other, the United Kingdom, France and the United States (so far as their declaration goes) — have benefitted from the existence of the Commission in the sense that they have been insured against blow up in Indochina of the kind that could suddenly produce a major international crisis. The commitment of both the great power blocs to support the Indochina armistices had undoubtedly been rendered somewhat more firm by the presence of the Commissions through the earlier and more sensitive stages of the peace. To what extent the continued existence of the Commissions will contribute to the firmness of this commitment is hard to say, but in assessing the future value of the system of international supervision its contribution in the past in the sense mentioned here should not be overlooked.

5. In addition to the commitment of the Great Powers to the support of the Geneva Settlement, the settlement itself has benefitted by the moral support of neutral Asia, particularly as represented by the participation of India in the key role of chairman in the International Commissions. India's participation in the supervisory task in Indochina has enabled her to play two roles for which she doubtless regards herself as being particularly well fitted — that of presiding over the departure of a European imperial power from Asia and that of mediating between two offshoots of the two great power blocs. Performance of these tasks by India at the request of the Geneva Conference Powers has undoubtedly given new prestige in Southeast Asia to the Indian policy of non-alignment.

6. If, as a result of South Vietnam's refusal to accept responsibilities for maintaining the armistice the Geneva settlement in Vietnam should collapse in the near future, and India is forced to admit the failure of her mission in Indochina, it will be a blow to her prestige which will be keenly resented. We have suggested in paragraph 3(e) of our memorandum on Vietnam the consequences which we believe might follow from Indian withdrawal under these circumstances. We do not believe that the Indians will be rigid in their insistence upon a full assumption of legal successor responsibilities by the South Vietnamese. If there are no indications that the Diem Government and its western backers are willing to make a real effort to make the armistice settlement work, the attitude which the Indians have adopted in the Fourth and Fifth Interim reports[9] and the views they have expressed to us on other occasions suggest that they will feel compelled to consider withdrawal from the Vietnam Commission, a step which clearly they would prefer to avoid.

7. For these reasons we believe it is important for the SEATO countries to consider the desirability of following policies in Indochina which will enable India to maintain her constructive interest in contributing to the maintenance of the peace in Indochina. This need not involve the indefinite maintenance of the whole Geneva structure or the indefinite continuation of the system of international supervision in its present form; but it will involve very definite efforts in the immediate future to prevent an early breakdown of the Geneva settlement, particularly in Vietnam.

8. Our telegram under reference and the enclosed memorandum set forth pretty clearly our views as to what the efforts in the immediate future should be — namely the commencement and advancement of the Franco-Vietnamese talks concerning the assumption of responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice by the Diem Government. We are aware that the United States has been playing down the significance of the South Vietnamese request for the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps and their apprehensions about the consequences of early withdrawal; United States views on this subject need not conflict, however, with our belief that the Vietnamese request should provide an immediate occasion for the resumption of these negotiations. Neither does the early or complete withdrawal of the FEC play a necessary part in the policy we are suggesting. The essential thing is that the negotiations should begin and that there should be some results to show in the very near future, which would enable us to convince the Indians that some movement from the present impasse is on foot. You will recall that in both the Fourth and Fifth interim reports of the Vietnam Commission we have expressed the view that the difficulties arising out of the division of authority and responsibility in South Vietnam can best be solved by negotiations between the French and the Vietnamese. In order to sustain this position we will need to have some results to show.

9. While the assumption of full legal responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement by South Vietnam should perhaps be the initial objective to aim at, it is most important that the negotiations should not be permitted to founder on the refusal of the South Vietnamese to assume responsibility for the whole Geneva settlement. We believe that a close look at the responsibilities which now rest on the French High Command will make it possible for the South Vietnamese to single out those residual responsibilities which they would be able to assume in the interests of maintaining the peace without jeopardizing their position on the programme for a political settlement and without accepting responsibility for the original division of the country. It could be made clear in any exchange of Notes that the French assumed responsibility for the conclusion of the Armistice and had full responsibility during the regroupment period. Vietnam would only be assuming future obligations. Conditions for the assumption of responsibility by South Vietnam in respect to the various specific obligations now resting on the French High Command might be negotiated and transferred stage by stage, and the Diem Government could from time to time announce its assumption of certain obligations and functions formerly discharged by the French, if this would be easier for Diem. The final stages of the negotiation, involving the actual dissolution of the French High Command, will certainly present very serious difficulties, but these should not be permitted to deter the negotiators from commencing their task and getting through the easier stages first.

10. Even the final dissolution of the French High Command need not, in our view, involve the withdrawal of all French Forces. We see no reason why a French military mission should not remain in Vietnam for some time to complete certain tasks unrelated to the Cease Fire Agreement (such as the training of the South Vietnamese Army and the orderly turnover of US military equipment in South Vietnam) as well as the tidying up of certain residual tasks under the Cease Fire Agreement which the South Vietnamese might be unwilling to assume (e.g. prisoners of war). However, in our view a military mission is a very different type of legal entity than a High Command (even with relatively few troops left) and we think that it would compound the present anomaly if the High Command was dissolved and went through the form of passing its functions to a military mission.

11. The United States can, of course, make an invaluable contribution to the progress of these negotiations through consultations with Diem on the broad principles involved and with the French on detailed aspects of the negotiations. In their approach to Diem the Americans might with profit endeavour to channel the forces of Vietnamese nationalism represented by Diem in the direction of the assumption of responsibilities for maintaining of the truce with the idea that this would be, in a sense, the achievement of full national and independent status by the Republic of Vietnam. Continuation of the present anomalous arrangements in Vietnam, whereby the French continue to try to meet international obligations which affect the security of Vietnam, means in effect the continuation of South Vietnam's colonial status where Frenchmen speak for Vietnamese instead of the Vietnamese speaking for themselves. No one will be convinced that the Republic of Vietnam has achieved fully independent national status so long as the handling of her most important external problem — the maintenance of the armistice — is left in the hands of the former colonial power. Assumption of responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice need not involve the assumption of responsibility for the whole Geneva settlement (though the more of it that is assumed the more stable South Vietnam's international position is likely to be). None of the governments concerned with the Geneva settlement can accept for long the refusal of the South Vietnamese to accept any responsibility for the maintenance of the armistice, but if there is a demonstrated willingness on the part of the South Vietnamese formally to accept responsibilities for the more important features of the armistice, there will be a greater disposition to forgive the refusal to accept some of the less important provisions.

12. We have been favourably impressed by the more forthcoming attitude which Foreign Minister Mau has recently been adopting towards the Commission — particularly his willingness to talk with it directly about matters arising out of the Cease Fire Agreement and his undertaking to find out the reasons for some of the delays in replies to Commission enquiries. Having gone this far the South Vietnamese should be able to extend the area of their cooperation and practical responsibility without jeopardizing their position on the political settlement. If full practical cooperation with the Commission is combined with real progress in the Franco-Vietnamese discussions we are hopeful that it may be possible to prevent an early breakdown of the settlement in Vietnam on the issue of the division of authority and responsibility in South Vietnam.

13. We believe that it is most important that any discussions which the Americans have with Diem concerning the assumption of responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice should be kept quite separate and distinct from the political settlement problem. We think that the confusion of these two issues in the past may have contributed somewhat to the obduracy of the South Vietnamese in refusing to contemplate the assumption of responsibilities under the Cease Fire agreement. We also believe it is important that representations to Diem on this subject should be made far enough in advance of the elections so that he will be able to adopt a policy of assuming responsibilities for the armistice before the situation becomes further confused by a politically inexperienced assembly. There is a good enough case to be made in nationalistic terms for the assumption of responsibilities for the armistice by South Vietnam from the French for Diem to be able to promote it with some confidence in a nationalistically minded Assembly.

14. In making their approach to Diem the Americans will no doubt give due emphasis of the value of South Vietnam's assuming responsibilities for the armistice settlement in terms of South Vietnam's own security. It could be pointed out to Diem that the whole complex of commitments binding not only the parties to the Cease Fire but the supporting powers as well — Communist China, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States — form a guarantee of South Vietnam's security which depends on the validity and workability of the cease fire arrangements themselves, and that this structure cannot be held together and the security to South Vietnam which it provides cannot be maintained unless South Vietnam assumes commitments not merely to maintain an armistice in the sense of an absence of hostilities but to maintain and operate certain specific armistice arrangements.

15. We suggest that in passing the attached memoranda to the State Department you convey to them the views and suggestions which we have outlined above. We are encouraged by the contents of your telegram No. 243 of February 9 to hope that these views will have a favourable reception, and that the State Department will not delay in taking these matters up with the Diem Government.

Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 3, 1956

THE FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

VIETNAM

In the Fourth and Fifth Interim Reports of the Vietnam Commission and on other occasions the Indians have expressed their conviction that the Vietnam Commission cannot carry on beyond July 1956 (if that long) under existing arrangements. If there is no constructive response at all to the appeals which the Indians have made to the Co-Chairmen for resolution of the current difficulties, there is a strong indication that the Indians will be disposed to withdraw their delegation some time this year and thus force the dissolution of the International Commission.

2. Apart from its general function as a shock-absorber between the two sides and as an agency for keeping temperatures down, the Commission's principal continuing tasks of supervision relate to:

(a) demarcation line and the demilitarized zone;

(b) ban on the introduction of troops and war materials;

(c) ban on establishment of foreign military bases or adherence to military alliances;

(d) complaints alleging violations of Article 14(c) (democratic freedoms);

(e) residual cases of prisoners of war, civilian internees and refugees (freedom of movement).

3. Despite the frustrations involved in carrying out these supervisory functions and the doubtful effectiveness of some of these provisions and despite the Canadian desire to be relieved of the assignment in Vietnam, the prospect of the withdrawal of the Commission in the manner indicated in Paragraph 1 above should not be lightly accepted by the major governments concerned without a searching look at the possible consequences, which are estimated to be as follows:

(a) Increased Tensions Owing to Uncertainty Regarding the Continuing Implementation of the Armistice. Although withdrawal of the Commission should not affect the continuing legal obligations of the parties to abide by the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement, it would have an unsettling effect on both sides. Without the prodding of the ISC, implementation of the less important clauses of the agreement almost certainly would cease, and each side would be led to wonder how many of the remaining provisions of the armistice the other side would continue to honour. This uncertainty would be compounded if South Vietnam had accepted no responsibilities for maintaining the armistice and if the French Expeditionary Corps had been almost entirely withdrawn.

(b) Danger on the Demarcation Line. While the Commission can prevent incidents in this area only to a limited degree, withdrawal of the Commission and the consequent increase in tensions would certainly lead to more incidents, and eventually to the moving of troops into the demilitarized zone. The danger of clashes between forces whose governments have no channel of direct communication would then be acute.

(c) Increased DR aggressiveness. With international supervision withdrawn and with the South Vietnamese Government uncommitted to the armistice terms, the Vietminh would no longer have grounds for confidence that the South would comply fully with those provisions of the armistice to which it attaches most importance — the ban on the introduction of war materials and fresh troops and the ban on the establishment of military bases and participation in military alliances. The Vietminh would furthermore calculate with some justice that its prospects of getting delivery on the programme for a political settlement would be much dimmer after the ISC had withdrawn. These developments would greatly reduce the stake which the Vietminh now has in the armistice settlement, and would largely eliminate the Vietminh's chief motives for good behaviour. In these circumstances — and with no ISC to deter them even in a limited way — the Vietminh could be expected to undertake an all-out campaign of subversion against the Diem Government.

(d) Increased Involvement of SEATO. In view of the general uncertainty about the stability of the armistice and because of a more aggressive attitude on the part of the Vietminh, the Diem Government might feel compelled after the Commission's withdrawal to rely more and more on United States and SEATO support and even to seek more military assistance from them. In any event the SEATO powers, which under the conditions of a comparatively stable armistice have been able to work out their basic organization on a modest scale and in a comparatively unobtrusive way, might find themselves — in view of the increased tensions — obliged to consider much more extensive and explicit military commitments with respect to Vietnam than hitherto. Any apparent increase in SEATO activities in South Vietnam (e.g. enlargement of the US military assistance mission) would probably lead to charges by the Vietminh that the United States was breaking its pledge not to disturb the armistice by the use of force or the threat of force. Both the Vietminh and the Chinese Communists in these circumstances might take precautionary counter-measures which would contribute further to tensions in the area.

(e) Offence to India. Since India's policies of mediation have been on trial in Indochina and since, as chairman, she has had a key part to play in the Commission, success of the Geneva settlement has a prestige value for India, and there is a danger that she may feel snubbed by the lack of Western response to her efforts to preserve the essence of the Geneva settlement. If the Indians are compelled to withdraw because their warnings go unheeded, it is quite possible that in doing so they would blame not only the Diem Government but its Western supporters as well. This could have a serious effect on India's relations with the West and particularly with the United Kingdom — both as a Co-Chairman power and as a member of SEATO. Indian resentment might well find expression in determined efforts to undermine SEATO just at a time when SEATO would need greater strength and more sympathetic understanding on the part of the uncommitted countries of Southeast Asia. The position of the West in Southeast Asia has hitherto been based on a combination and blending of the SEATO "hold-the-line" concept and the deterrent moral influence of the Five Principles.[10] It is for consideration whether a rebuff to India over the Vietnam settlement might not mean that the position of the West would have to be based on the SEATO idea alone working against an increasingly unfriendly form of neutralism.

4. The foregoing prognostications are based on the assumption that the Commission is forced to withdraw because the Western powers make an insufficient effort to keep the Geneva settlement working or to bring some alternative arrangement into being. On the other hand there are liabilities for the West in the continued working of the Commission which should also be taken into account:

(a) The Commission's supervision of the import of war materials is undoubtedly far more effective in the South than in the North, and hence benefits the Vietminh more than South Vietnam.

(b) The difficulties which the Commission has in the South arising out of the refusal of the Diem Government to accept legal responsibilities under the Cease-Fire Agreement and the Commission's handling of Article 14(c) concerning democratic freedom provide the Vietminh with a wealth of raw material for propaganda attacks on the South.

(c) Polish members of Commission teams in the South and Vietminh liaison officers can facilitate the gathering of intelligence and can maintain contacts with Vietminh agents in the South.

(d) A significant number of Canadian personnel are tied up doing work of little immediate constructive value, which at the same time puts undesirable stresses on Indian-Canadian relations.

5. In view of these considerations the planning of western policy in Vietnam, if not directed towards ensuring the survival of the International Commission, should be designed at least to avoid the worst consequences of the Commission's sudden withdrawal in the absence of other measures to shore up the Vietnam armistice — particularly a rapid build-up of tensions in the area and the withdrawal of India in an embittered mood.

6. In view of the many imponderables in the situation it is not possible at this stage to formulate policy objectives in terms of the sort of régime which might best replace the Geneva settlement. The governments concerned must consider now, however, whether to make an effort to keep the Geneva settlement working on the theory that even if this effort is unsuccessful, the advances made will at least make possible a transition to an armistice with some degree of stability, or whether to accept the risks outlined above and let the Geneva structure break down in the very near future from the flaws which are now in it.

[10] Les Cinq principes (respect mutuel de l'intégrité et de la souveraineté territoriales, non-agression, non-ingérence dans les affaires internes l'un de l'autre, égalité et avantage mutuel, et coexistence pacifique) avaient été convenus entre le premier ministre de l'Inde Nehru et le premier ministre de la Chine Chou En-lai le 28 juin 1954. Ils avaient aussi été adoptés lors de pourparlers tenus le lendemain entre le premier ministre Chou En-lai et le premier ministre de Birmanie, U Nu. Voir Documents on International Affairs, 1954, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1957, pp. 313 à 314.

The Five Principles (mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty, non-aggression, non-interference in each other's internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit, and peaceful co-existence) were agreed between Indian Prime Minister Nehru and Chinese Prime Minister Chou En-lai on 28 June, 1954. They were also adopted in talks the following day between Prime Minister Chou En-lai and Burmese Prime Minister U Nu. See Documents on International Affairs, 1954, London: Royal Institute of International Affairs - Oxford University Press, 1957, pp. 313-314.

7. If the former course is to be attempted, the first desideratum is to get the South Vietnamese Government to accept some responsibility for the maintenance of the armistice. This is a rudimentary requirement for the continued functioning of the International Commission even for a relatively short period, but more important still it is essential as the basis for any workable armistice arrangement which might survive the failure to maintain the broad Geneva settlement. The recent request of the South Vietnamese Government that the remainder of the French Expeditionary Corps be withdrawn from Vietnam opens the door for early consideration of this question. If a premature breakdown of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam is to be avoided, it is important that Franco-Vietnamese negotiations be brought to fruition within a reasonable time, and that the Indians be kept aware of their progress.

8. As to the substance of the negotiations — if, as seems likely the Vietnamese Government continues to refuse to take over the legal responsibilities of the French High Command under the Cease-Fire Agreement, it should be possible for the French and Vietnamese to work out an exchange of notes in which the Vietnamese would undertake to do virtually all the things which the French are obliged to do under the Cease-Fire Agreement, without actually assuming obligations as the legal successor to the French High Command under the Cease-Fire Agreement. The more important continuing responsibilities are:

(a) respect for the demarcation line and keeping troops out of demilitarized zone;

(b) restriction on the entry of foreign military personnel;

(c) restriction on the entry of war materials;

(d) restriction on the establishment of new bases;

(e) restriction on foreign military bases and participation in military alliances;

(f) participation in the Joint Commission and liaison with the International Commission.

The Vietnamese could presumably accept (a) without difficulty. With respect to items (b), (c), (d) and (e) they would presumably have to qualify their acceptance with some escape clause which would ensure that they were not making a unilateral commitment which would continue to apply no matter what happened to the Geneva settlement. The practical difficulties implicit in (f) are very considerable but should not be insuperable if both the French and the Vietnamese determine to make the Joint Commission work, which appears to be of special importance in the adjustment of the disputes in the demilitarized zone. (It might even be possible, for instance, for the South Vietnamese Government to keep some French military personnel for purposes of maintaining liaison with the PAVN through the Joint Commission). Liaison with the International Commission should present no special problem, since the Vietnamese are already dealing with it at the top level on a practical basis.

9. Acceptance of responsibilities by the South Vietnamese along the lines suggested above, while falling short of the assumption of full legal responsibilities under the Cease-Fire Agreement would provide a practical basis for keeping the agreement working. Certainly it should make the Canadian task of counselling patience in the Commission much easier, and should go some distance towards ensuring that the Indians will not withdraw precipitately and in anger from their mediatory role.

10. If the long term threat to the Geneva settlement posed by the unfulfilled political settlement can be held off until the short-term threat involved in the lack of an effectively responsible party in the South is disposed of, the possibility of ending up with an armistice with a reasonable degree of stability to it and one which may command some degree of Indian support will be that much better. This means that the Chinese Communist proposals for a reconvening of the Geneva Conference should be resisted, since such a meeting would certainly bring out into the open the basic incompatibility of the Vietminh and South Vietnam on the political settlement issue. Turning aside the Chinese proposals may be difficult if, as seems likely, the Indians support them. If the Polish idea that the three Commission powers should meet first to draft amendments to the Cease-Fire Agreement and to the programme for a political settlement is put to the Canadian Government directly, the Canadian position would probably be that in the Canadian view it would be neither appropriate nor helpful for the Commission powers to discuss these subjects in the absence of the parties directly concerned.

11. If the South Vietnamese will assume some practical responsibilities for maintaining the armistice there should be a more relaxed atmosphere in which to explore the prospects for a more permanent régime. Under such circumstances the United Kingdom and the United States might consider the possibility of its making some gestures to keep alive the idea of a political settlement, as a means of keeping the Vietminh "on the hook" and of retaining continued Indian moral support for the maintenance of the armistice.

12. The assumption of commitments by South Vietnam along the lines suggested in paragraph 8 above might also provide a basis for reducing and even virtually eliminating, if desired, the Commission's work under Article 14(c) and the residual tasks in relation to prisoners of war, civilian internees and freedom of movement, thus making possible some reduction in Commission activities and personnel.

13. It is quite possible that the admittedly anomalous arrangement whereby the South Vietnamese would assume obligations for maintaining the armistice outside the framework of the Cease-Fire Agreement would not permit the Geneva structure to hold together for long, although the length of time would depend partly upon how far the South Vietnamese would be prepared to go towards keeping alive the idea of a political settlement. If and when it developed that the Cease-Fire settlement could not keep functioning under this anomalous arrangement, the Commission might then be able to withdraw without the same fear of consequences of the kind outlined in paragraph 3 above. In these circumstances the Diem Government might be able to turn the situation to advantage by declaring its willingness to honour the undertakings suggested in paragraph 8 above on the condition that the Vietminh would assume similar obligations. There would, in other words, be the makings of a stable armistice.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 3, 1956

THE FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

LAOS

The future of the International Supervisory Commission for Laos is tied up with the future of the Vietnam Commission. Up to now there has been little actual discussion within the Laos Commission concerning a possible date for termination of its activities. It is reasonable to assume that the political settlement mentioned in Article 14 of the Geneva

Agreement for Laos will be resisted by the Communists until some form of settlement acceptable to the Communists is reached in Vietnam.

2. The Commission's principal continuing tasks of supervision in Laos are to observe the Cease Fire Agreement in order to keep to a minimum the sporadic hostilities now taking place between the Royal Government forces and the Pathet Lao, to control the rotation of personnel and supplies to the French security forces in Laos permitted by the Agreement, to control the introduction of military personnel and war material, to ensure that no new military bases are established in Laos, and to deal with complaints alleging violations of Article 15 (democratic freedoms).

Attitude of the Royal Laotian Government

3. The Commission's role in Laos has, and can probably continue to have, more beneficial effects for the RLG than its sister Commissions in Cambodia and Vietnam have for the Sihanouk and Diem governments. The Royal Government benefits:

(a) From the presence of the commission teams in the two northern provinces of Phongsaly and Samneua which undoubtedly deters the Vietminh from openly assisting the Pathet Lao. Although the Pathet Lao and the Poles have largely managed to frustrate the teams in their efforts to exercise effective supervision, their continued presence has restricted the Vietminh to under cover assistance.

(b) The Commission has lent, and can continue to lend, moral support to the Royal Government in its claims for re-establishment of its authority throughout the entire kingdom. The passing by the Commission of its resolution of January 7, which recognizes the right of the Royal Government to the administration of the two northern provinces and recommends that this be implemented, is an example of this kind of moral backing.

4. In spite of these benefits the Royal Government is showing a growing impatience with the Commission because of the latter's failure to assist them effectively in what they rightfully consider to be the aim of the Geneva settlement which is the unification of all Laos under a central government. The recent victory at the polls of the Katay government; the admission of Laos to the United Nations, and the declaration by the SEATO powers guaranteeing the frontiers of Laos have all tended to bolster the ego of the government and diminish their awareness of the benefits of having the Commission in their country. There is a danger therefore that, in spite of the fact that the United States continues to counsel moderation, the RLG may attempt something rash on the military side. If they do this it would be an indication that they have decided to place their reliance on SEATO and the United Nations rather than on the Commission. The dangers inherent in this action by the RLG are manifold:

(a) Increased military action would probably result in increased and more open aid to the Pathet Lao by the Vietminh and could lead to the involvement of SEATO. The Royal Government would probably not be able to achieve its desires by military action without outside help especially if the Pathet Lao receive increased support from the Vietminh.

(b) The benefits which the Royal Government derive from the Commission's presence would largely disappear especially as the Indians would be very intolerant of any move by the RLG on the military side.

(c) Increased Communist subversion and infiltration might weaken the RLG internally.

Indian Attitude

5. While the Indians generally concede that the claims of the Royal Government are just, they are hesitant to foster any action by the Commission which might antagonize the Communists and increase the dangers of the latter renewing hostilities. The Indians tend to look at the problem of Indochina as a whole and there is some indication that they would be willing to accept, although somewhat reluctantly, a partition of Laos as the best way out as long as the Vietnam problem is unresolved. There is evidence that Indian thinking has been tempered lately by their realization that their policy of not wishing to offend Communists has resulted in an increasing mistrust of Indian intentions on the part of the Royal Government and that this in turn has lead to a danger that the RLG and not the Communists might initiate a renewal of hostilities. It may be because of this realization that the Indians finally supported the January 7 resolution. Their firm stand on the demarcation line issue, however, indicates that their main concern still continues to be a separation of the forces in order to avoid hostilities. While we have had no really clear indication of Indian thinking concerning the possible termination of the Commission in Laos, the Commissioner there has indicated that he would favour:

(a) A meeting of the three Commission powers to try to work out a new basis for either the continuation or cessation of the Commission's activities in the three Indochina states.

(b) A meeting of the Geneva powers, possibly some time after April, to consider these recommendations.

(c) A reference to the Co-Chairman concerning the immediate problems facing the Commission.

We have no information as to whether this reflects the thinking in New Delhi but it is in line with views expressed by the Commissioner in Vietnam.

6. If remedial measures in Vietnam are not taken to present the breakdown of the Geneva arrangements and the early withdrawal of the Commission, there could be serious repercussions in Laos, particularly if the Indians were to withdraw from their supervisory role in Vietnam in disgust. The Communists and the Indians alike regard the Geneva settlement for all three countries as an integrated whole, and withdrawal of the Indian delegation from Vietnam might make it very difficult to retain their continued cooperation in maintaining the Commission's position in Laos.

7. In considering the future of the Commission in Laos we should keep in mind that:

(a) The future of the Commission is closely tied up to the future of the Commission in Vietnam.

(b) The presence of the Commission is more beneficial to the Royal Government than to the Communists.

(c) The remaining tasks of the Commission are perhaps greater than in the other two states.

8. Until the situation in Vietnam clears a move towards termination of the Commission's activities in Laos would seem unwise. In addition, the Western Powers might usefully continue to exert their influence on the Royal Government to persuade them to accept the present situation as the best possible one at the moment. Pressure on the Indians to push the January 7 resolution on a political settlement is also desirable.

Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 3, 1956

THE FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

CAMBODIA

With the conclusion of the elections in Cambodia held on September 11, 1955, the major part of the work of the International Commission came to an end.

2. During the remaining period of its work in Cambodia, the Commission's principal continuing tasks of supervision relate to:

(a) Foreign military bases and military alliances and the entry of military personnel and war materials (Article 7).

(b) Residual cases involving democratic freedoms.

3. In continuation of the programme of reduction already under way, the Indians and Canadians have agreed that the two remaining teams in the field should, if possible, be eliminated by the end of March or the first week of April, but the Polish attitude is that the reduction of these two remaining out-station teams should only be discussed at that time.

4. General agreement has been reached between the Indian and Canadian delegations that these reductions should lead to an eventual wind-up of the Commission's activities. The Indian Commissioner has envisaged a withdrawal of the Commission on July 1. The Canadian Commissioner has agreed to recommend that the question of whether or not the Commission should be wound up this Summer should be considered in April. The Poles, on the other hand, do not wish to even consider the winding up of the Commission until the first week of July 1956.

5. Withdrawal of the Commission must be considered in the light of Article 7 of the Cease-Fire Agreement, which consists of the text of the Cambodian Government's declaration of July 20, 1954 concerning foreign bases and the solicitation of foreign aid in war materials, personnel and instructors. The application of this latter part of the declaration was to apply only "during the period which will elapse between the date of the cessation of hostilities and that of the final settlement of political problems in that country". While the presumptive date for the final political settlement in Vietnam was July 1956 or shortly thereafter, it seems clear that the Cambodian Government's undertakings will continue to apply after that date and as long as the political settlement in Vietnam along the lines suggested in the Final Declaration remains a generally recognized objective of the Geneva Settlement. It will not, therefore be possible for the Cambodian Commission to withdraw on the grounds that the Cambodian Government's obligations under Article 7 of the Cease-Fire Agreement cease to apply from July 1956. The case for withdrawal will have to be argued on practical grounds and the Cambodian Government's continuing obligations under its unilateral declaration will have to be recognized.

6. Although the Canadian Commission has the general support of the Indian chairman for seeking to achieve the complete withdrawal of the Commission this Summer, strong Polish opposition may be expected and it may not be possible for the Commission to reach unanimous agreement on the winding up of its activities. It is desirable, however, that the demise of the Cambodian Commission should be arranged in accordance with the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement concerning reductions of Commission activities, and the efforts of the Poles to make this impossible under the unanimity rule will have to be circumvented.

7. It may eventually become necessary, therefore, to explore other means of terminating the Commission's work in Cambodia by an initiative taken by:

(a) a recommendation from the Co-Chairmen, or,

(b) unilateral action by the Cambodian Government.

8. The Canadian desire to end the Commission in Cambodia now that its work is actually completed, should if possible be met without affecting the futures of the other two Commissions. The process should be as painless as possible. If the dislocation cannot be achieved without undesirable results consideration may have to be given to prolongation of the life of the Commission in Cambodia until such time as the more important decisions are reached about the futures of the Vietnam and Laos Commissions. Every effort however must be made to avoid this prolongation.

FUTURE OF THE COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

The papers enclosed with our despatch No. 148 may be described as departmental papers which have been approved by the Minister. The views therein could be described as relatively firm. The papers were not intended as formal expression of Government views and they have not been submitted to Cabinet for this purpose.

2. We would like you to "make representations" with respect to a United States approach to Diem and any parallel discussions with the French which will assist in promoting those aspects of the Franco-Vietnamese negotiations relating to the assumption of responsibilities by the South Vietnamese Government to maintain the armistice. Much of the remaining content of our memoranda and despatch concerning our assessment of the consequences of a premature breakdown of the Geneva settlement would come under the heading of conveying views.

3. We would indeed like to have some United States response to the views expressed. When inviting an expression of United States views, however, you should indicate clearly that we would not welcome a description of the difficulties which the State Department may anticipate in making an approach to Diem along the lines we have suggested. We are aware of these difficulties and have taken them into account in formulating our suggestions. If exhaustion of Indian patience with the present situation is to be avoided and if the realities of the situation in Vietnam are to be grappled with we believe that it is essential that Diem should be resolutely tackled by both the United States and the United Kingdom. The expected difficulties of the task should not prevent it from being undertaken.

4. While we prefer to deal with the day to day work of the Commissions as the discharge of a responsibility in some degree distinct from our close ties with the Free World, this consideration does not apply to the present situation. The broader implications of the question of the future of the Commissions are of concern to the United States not simply as one of the participants in the Geneva Conference but as the leading SEATO power with vital interests in the future course of developments in Southeast Asia. In these respects it is important to us to know United States views on these matters.

5. We have been encouraged by the United Kingdom response to our views on Vietnam and by their willingness to take some positive action along the lines we have suggested. We have also been encouraged by the preliminary reaction of the State Department to Graves' report of our talks in Ottawa. We are most anxious, therefore, to drive home the advantage gained, and we hope you will be able to take this matter up at a suitably high level in the State Department and impress upon the officials concerned the importance we attach to the démarche to the South Vietnamese and the French which we hope both the United States and the United Kingdom will make.

6. We trust that our despatch No. 148 has settled the points raised in your telegram No. 253 of February 13.† It might be wise to indicate more explicitly to the State Department our views about the proposal for a meeting of the Commission powers to consider amendments to the Geneva settlement, our reasons for wishing to avoid participation in any meeting where the political settlement would be discussed and our desire to see any discussions of amendments to the cease-fire agreement carried on within the framework of the Commission under Article 41. (Reference our telegram to you No. Y232 of February 8 and our telegram No. 35 of February 10† to Hanoi referred to you by bag).

FUTURE OF THE COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

We saw Young, the Director of the State Department's Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, on February 18 to leave with him the departmental papers on the future of the Commissions in Indochina which were attached to your despatch Y148 of February 10. We left with him as well an unsigned summary of paras 8 to 14 of your despatch, a copy of which will be forwarded by bag; this summary concerned the scheduled Franco-Vietnamese discussions on the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps.

2. We pointed out that the views in the departmental papers had been approved by the Minister and were relatively firm. We urged that a United States approach should be made to Diem and to the French with a view to assuring a successful outcome of the Franco-Vietnamese discussions insofar as they related to the assumption of responsibilities by the South Vietnamese Government for the maintenance of the armistice. We conveyed to the State Department your more general views on the broad question of the future of the Commissions which were outlined in paragraphs 2 to 7 of despatch Y148. We indicated that your wished to have some United States response to the Canadian views contained in the material which we gave to the State Department.

3. We thought it wise in the first instance to speak to Young. He holds a fairly senior position in the hierarchy and he is well disposed to us; furthermore, with a full outline of Canadian views in his hands, he is in a position to condition the thinking of his superiors, particularly Walter Robertson, so that any further representations we might decide to make at a higher level might be more effective. We shall use our discretion as to whether further representations should be made to Robertson later this week; he is out of town until the middle of the week at least. The experience of the British Embassy as well had some influence on our decision. As you know from other correspondence, the first United Kingdom approach to Robertson did not yield much in the way of positive results. A further United Kingdom approach (that foreshadowed in paragraph 2 of London's telegram 160 of February 16†) was made to Young on February 17.

4. Young expressed the State Department's gratitude for such a full expression of Canadian views. He said he would not attempt to comment on the substance of these views immediately but would attempt to give us some State Department reaction later this week. At our meeting he made only three points:

(a) he described the exchanges on the same subject with the United Kingdom;

(b) he indicated that the State Department was giving urgent consideration to the problems raised in our papers; and

(c) he expressed the State Department's keen interest in continued exchanges of views with interested governments.

5. There was nothing new in what Young had to say concerning US-UK discussions. He indicated, however, that the State Department had been somewhat surprised at the "more urgent nature" of United Kingdom views after the Ottawa meetings when at the Washington meetings the United Kingdom representatives had apparently agreed that representations to Diem could wait upon Dulles' visit to Saigon in early March.

6. So far as the State Department's action was concerned, Young emphasized the United States recognition that a real problem existed in the matter of the scheduled Franco-Vietnamese discussions; nor was the State Department blind to the need for consideration of the longer-term problem of the future of the Commissions in Indochina. Interested officials were examining these two aspects of the problem as matters of urgency. Their object was two-fold:

(a) to preserve insofar as possible the freedom of free Vietnam to work out its own destinies; and

(b) to maximize the concerted efforts of interested governments in the free world alliance to maintain the peace in Southeast Asia. In the circumstances it seemed highly desirable that Diem should be more forthcoming than perhaps he had been in assuming responsibilities for the Commission; on the other hand, it was simply not possible to "lay down the law" to Diem. It seemed essential that any immediate United States representations which might be made not court outright rejection by Diem for undoubtedly there would be need in succeeding months for additional representations to Diem.

7. Young said finally that the State Department needed and would welcome the advice of all interested governments as to the best course which could be pursued with respect to South Vietnam. For that reason the outline of Canadian thinking which we had made available to the State Department was most timely. Young went on then to request a further expression of Canadian views along the lines dealt with in our telegram 290 of February 20.[11]

VIETNAM

I would be grateful if you would take an early opportunity to communicate to the Indians the following as our considered views on the obstacles to the proper implementation of the Geneva Agreements in Vietnam.

(1) We believe that in considering the course of action that should be pursued to improve the implementation of the Agreements in Vietnam, it is most important that the governments concerned should not lose sight of the fact that it is vital to ensure the maintenance of an armistice arrangement, and that every proposal should be tested first by an assessment of the effect which it will have on the maintenance of the cease fire. An agreed armistice arrangement of the kind we now have in the Cease Fire Agreement is an essential pre-requisite for the maintenance of peace in Vietnam, and only under conditions of a stable peace can any progress towards a political settlement be made. Any proposals for modifications or adjustments to the present armistice framework will therefore have to be considered with the greatest care to ensure that the present structure does not collapse.

(2) We agree with the Indian view that a modified Cease Fire Agreement and a redefinition of the International Commission's remaining responsibilities are desirable. Our own appreciation of the position of the South Vietnamese Government leads us to the conclusion, however, that it will be necessary for the Commission Governments to exercise considerable patience in getting these adjustments. It seems to us, furthermore, that before a modified agreement is sought, efforts should be made first to get the South Vietnamese Government to accept a greater degree of responsibility for the basic provisions of the present Cease Fire Agreement. If the South Vietnamese can be induced to accept responsibilities of this kind and can gain confidence from the discharge of these responsibilities, the prospect of their considering modifications in the present agreement will in our view be enhanced.

The State Department wanted to have Canadian estimates on "the internal security situation in South Vietnam, and (b) Communist intentions with respect both to the cease-fire agreement and the political situation settlement in Vietnam." Washington to Ottawa, Telegram 290, February 20, 1956, DEA 50052-A-40.

(3) We differ from the Indians with respect to the best method of inducing the South Vietnamese to accept responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice. As our delegation has indicated in the Fourth and Fifth Interim Reports of the Vietnam Commission, we are of the opinion that this is a matter for settlement between the French and the South Vietnamese. Now that a new French Government has been installed and now that the South Vietnamese have taken the initiative in requesting the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps, an opportunity for a resumption of Franco-Vietnamese negotiations on military problems has presented itself. We think that within the framework of such negotiations lies the best prospect for getting the South Vietnamese to assume responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice, and that in these negotiations the French are not wholly without bargaining power.

(4) While negotiations between the French and the South Vietnamese along the lines suggested above cannot produce a modified agreement of the kind envisaged by the Indians, such negotiations in our view present the most encouraging prospect for getting the basic essential of a modified agreement — assumption of responsibility for the maintenance of the armistice by the South Vietnamese. It is clear that the South Vietnamese Government at the present time is prepared to talk about the matter of responsibilities for maintaining the armistice only in connection with the question of the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps.

(5) We are very doubtful about the value at this time of endeavouring to get the South Vietnamese to accept responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice by exerting further pressure on them through the Commission and the Co-Chairmen. Action by the Co-Chairmen in fact means action by the United Kingdom (since the USSR does not deal directly with the South Vietnamese) and we are sure that the United Kingdom will be able to achieve much more towards inducing the South Vietnamese to accept greater responsibilities by informal efforts to promote the Franco-Vietnamese negotiation than through any formal approaches it might make as a Co-Chairman Power in response to further requests for action by the Commission. We have expressed these views to the United Kingdom and understand they are prepared to intervene with Diem to this end. We have also urged upon the United States the desirability that they do what they can to encourage Diem to accept responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice. We are hopeful that representations by the United Kingdom and the United States along these lines will be successful in persuading the South Vietnamese that their own interests will be best served by taking over responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice, and we are convinced that this approach is more likely to succeed with Diem than any other at the present time.

(6) Although the impracticability of elections in July 1956 is now generally recognized, we do not think it would be wise at this particular time to attempt to revise the provisions of Paragraph 7 of the Final Declaration. We would not suggest that Paragraph 7 can be ignored, but simply that the policy objectives stated therein should stand unaltered pending a clarification of the South Vietnamese Government's position on the assumption of responsibilities for the armistice. An attempt to revise nothing more than the date for the elections might at this point push the South Vietnamese into adopting positions which would prejudice the possibility of their assuming obligations for the maintenance of the cease fire.

(7) While we recognize that there is a possibility that failure to provide for a new basis for the political settlement by July might lead the Viet Minh to denounce the Cease Fire Agreement, we consider this unlikely as they would by this action destroy their claim to a political settlement along the lines laid down in the Final Declaration. We fear that there is a more serious danger that failure to resolve the problem of responsibility for the armistice in the South might lead the Viet Minh to inaugurate an all-out war of nerves against the South, which would in turn jeopardize the peace and render even less likely the achievement at a later date of a political settlement.

(8) For the foregoing reasons we believe that a reconvening of the Geneva Conference or indeed any other organized attempt to revise both the political and military provisions of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam at this stage either with or without the participation of the South Vietnamese Government would be self-defeating. A resolute and sustained attempt to clear up the problem of responsibility for maintaining the armistice in the South, if successful, should greatly reduce the difficulties now facing the Commission and provide the basis for a more stable armistice. It may also provide better conditions for considering modifications of the settlement and a redefinition of the commission's responsibilities.

2. For London, Washington and Paris: You may inform the Foreign Office/State Department/Quai d'Orsay of the substance of the foregoing paragraphs.

VIETNAM

When I saw Desai yesterday afternoon he gave me the text of the Indian note to the two Co-Chairmen referred to in my telegram 139 of February 21.† I cabled you the text of the Indian note in my telegram under reference. In return I gave Desai a memorandum dated February 23† based on your telegram Y147 of February 20. I will send you a copy of our memorandum by bag.

2. When I gave Desai our memorandum I suggested that it might possibly be useful for me to discuss Vietnam with Mr. Nehru sometime next week. Desai agreed.

3. Although Desai was in no position to give me his considered views on our memorandum he did state forcibly that he had no confidence in the outcome of renewed France-Vietnamese negotiations. He agreed when I said to him that he seemed to think that the French were the worst possible people to negotiate a settlement with the Vietnamese. He indeed insisted that he was certain from his experience in Vietnam that the only effect of the French negotiation would be to make it more difficult for anyone else to negotiate successfully after the inevitable failure of the French negotiations. The basis for Desai's certainty that nothing constructive will emerge from the Franco-Vietnamese negotiations is the dislike which the Diem Government has of the French. Desai repeated several times that Diem cannot forget that the French opposed his coming to power.

4. Desai expressed the hope that when we send our comments to the Co-Chairmen we will take into account the Indian views which they expressed in their note to the Co-Chairmen. Specifically Desai hopes I think that we will support the Indian request that the Co-Chairmen meet to discuss the problem. In Desai's view it is only the Co-Chairmen who can bring influence to bear on the Democratic Republic and Diem. They should meet to agree on a common policy. Afterwards the job of the Russians would be to bring pressure to bear on the Democratic Republic and the job of the U.K. would be to bring pressure to bear on Diem.

5. There has to be a bargain between the U.K. and USSR. The USSR will know the limitations of its influence on the Democratic Republic. Thus Desai believes that it would not be enough for the South to accept limited obligations to maintain the armistice since the Democratic Republic would then declare it is no longer bound by the Cease Fire Agreement because of the non-fulfillment of the political settlement.

6. Desai argued that the Democratic Republic must have a "carrot" to keep it sweet. The question for decision was how far away the carrot could be held from the DR's nose. The hope that the situation would not develop into a stalemate with no likelihood of a political settlement emerging might serve as such a carrot. The DR will not agree to an indefinite freezing of the status quo, if frozen the less is their chance of getting Vietnam united under their Government.

VIETNAM — ENTRY OF UNITED STATES MILITARY PERSONNEL

The British Ambassador and I were asked to see Murphy, Deputy Under-Secretary, today, February 25. Murphy gave us a copy of a State Department note to the French Government[12] which was given to the French Ambassador earlier this morning. The text of that note is included in my immediately following telegram.† In summary the note indicates:

(a) that the United States "sees itself obliged to despatch to Vietnam, subject to Vietnamese agreement and for a temporary period, a small number of additional United [12] Voir/See United States, Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS), 1955-1957, Volume I, Washington D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1985, pp. 644-647.

States military technical personnel whose sole function will be to supervise the recovery and maintenance of MDAP equipment in Vietnam" and

(b) that the United States "would appreciate it if the French Government would retain in Vietnam for another year approximately 1000 French military personnel" to assist in the processing of MDAP equipment.

2. Murphy explained that the situation was serious in the State Department's view. Some $700 million worth of United States equipment was involved. Ninety percent of this equipment was in "open storage", i.e., rice paddies in South Vietnam. The United States has maintained title to this equipment even though it was in French custody originally and is presently in Vietnamese custody. The Vietnamese did not have the technical ability to look after it. The rapid rate of French reduction made it apparent that they would no longer be in a position to look after the equipment.

3. Murphy went on to say that the United States found it necessary to send approximately 350 United States military personnel and approximately 1000 Philippines and Japanese civilian technicians to process the turn over of the equipment. It was believed that the job could be done in twelve months with French assistance. These personnel would, of course, be additional to the present United States MAAG. Murphy said that the South Vietnamese Government had not been approached as yet on the matter but the United States Government intended "after a reasonable period of time" to do so. The United States hoped to have some response from the French before an approach was made to the South Vietnamese.

4. Immediately the question was raised as to whether or not the planned United States action would be a violation of Article 16 of the Armistice Agreement for Vietnam. Murphy said that in the United States view it would not. He went on to say that, leaving aside Article 16 (which, of course, did not bind the United States) the United States Government felt it had the right to protect United States property just as it had the right and the duty to protect United States nationals in South Vietnam. Even though the United States was not a signatory to the Geneva Agreement, it had respected the terms of the Agreement; it did not believe that this proposed action violated the spirit of the Armistice Agreement because the main task of the proposed United States Mission would be to remove military potential from the area. The United States had no illusions as to the attitude which the Communists would take in this matter but the situation was such that Communist charges would have to be borne.

5. I referred to the memorandum which we had left with the State Department last November (CF our telegram No. 1953 of November 26) and asked whether the United States would, on a regular basis, meet the Commission requirements decided upon on November 7 (CF paragraph 5 of your telegram Y-1983 of November 23).[13] Murphy said

[13] À l'automne 1955, la Commission convenait que les pays dépêchant du personnel militaire au Vietnam du Nord ou au Vietnam du Sud à des fins non militaires devaient lui fournir les informations suivantes : le nombre de personnes en question; la date et le point d'entrée; les objectifs visés; ainsi que la date et le point de sortie. La correspondance sur ce sujet, ainsi que le mémoire communiquant cette décision au département d'État figurent dans MAE 50052-40.

In the fall of 1955, the Commission agreed that countries sending military personnel to North or South Vietnam for non-military purposes should provide the Commission with the following information: number of military personnel; date and point of entry; objectives; and date and place of exit. The correspondence on this subject, as well as the memorandum transmitting this decision to the Department of State, is located on DEA 50052-40.

that the United States could not provide such information to the Commission on a regular basis. It was almost administratively impossible and in addition, of course, the United States was not committed to the Geneva Agreement formally. Consideration was being given to notification of the Indian Chairman of the Commission of the United States intention to send in the temporary mission. While no decision had been taken on this point, Murphy thought it likely that this would be done. It would, however, be informal notification and on a one-time basis.

6. In the course of the discussion it became apparent that the United States is determined to protect MDAP equipment; that it does not regard its action as a violation of Article 16; that it does not feel itself bound by Article 16 in any case and that if the issue is forced, it would be prepared to argue publicly against a restrictive definition of Article 16. (Young, Director of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, told us after the meeting that, while the United States would hope to avoid the issue, it would be prepared to argue that restrictive implementation of Article 16 in the South could not be equalled in the North with respect to the entrance of material and personnel through the ports or over the Chinese border; the United States would certainly hope to avoid arguing publicly with the Commission on this score but would have no other alternative if the issue were forced).

7. I said that this issue would raise difficulties for us in the Commission but that I would draw the matter to your attention immediately. I said that I was not unsympathetic to United States requirements but that the Canadian attitude would have to be determined in the light of a number of factors including the views of our colleagues on the Commission. Murphy confirmed my understanding that this information was being given to the Canadian Government as such and not to the Canadian Government as a member of the Commission. I asked whether the United States Government wished our comment and Murphy said our comments would be welcomed. I promised to supply those comments as soon as possible.

8. With respect to the specific issue, Makins, the British Ambassador, took much the same line, i.e., that he would seek London's comments as quickly as possible. However, armed with a bulky aide mémoire on the more general topics of the Franco-Vietnamese negotiations, the reconvocation of the Geneva Conference and the future in Vietnam, he re-emphasized United Kingdom concern that something be done to persuade Diem to accept responsibilities for the Armistice Agreement. He characterized the specific United States problem dealt with above as but one element of the broader problem and left the delicate threat that the United Kingdom comments on what Murphy had given him would be prepared in the light of United States response to United Kingdom representations in the broader field. This broader subject will be dealt with in another telegram.†

9. I should be grateful for your early instructions as to what response should be made to the State Department. I realize that we shall have to look at this in the light of our Commission responsibilities. We shall also have to take into consideration the apparent determination of the United States to protect its interests and its willingness if necessary to contest too restrictive an implementation of Article 16.

VIETNAM: FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

We asked Young, the Director of the State Department's Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, today, February 28, what United States response was likely to be made to the United Kingdom aide mémoire[14] dealt with in our telegram under reference and to the representations made earlier by ourselves and the United Kingdom concerning Franco-Vietnamese negotiations and South Vietnamese assumption of responsibilities for the armistice.

2. Young said he hoped that a full response could be made to United Kingdom representations by tomorrow or the next day, i.e., prior to his departure with the Secretary for the forthcoming SEATO meeting. A copy of that response will be made available to us. Young indicated that the State Department would probably agree in principle at least with the kind of United Kingdom response to the Soviet note of February 18[15] which had been set out in the United Kingdom draft, the text of which you have. On the broader question of bringing pressure on Diem to assume greater responsibilities for the armistice, Young was somewhat more reticent to express views, since this matter will have to have the attention of Mr. Dulles.

3. Young said that the two basic United States objectives with respect to Indochina were:

(a) the maintenance of "lack of major hostilities" in the area; and

(b) the build-up of a non-communist South Vietnam.

4. Young went on to say, albeit somewhat indirectly, that one course towards these objectives (and he left the strong impression that this was the preferred course in the United States view) was the maintenance of the status quo with perhaps a few modifications, i.e., the maintenance of a framework not dissimilar from the present Geneva Agreement framework, but one which would not force either South Vietnam or the United States to formal commitment to the Geneva framework as such. The State Department seems to continue to hope, as we have indicated in other correspondence, that the French can be persuaded to continue to share some responsibilities if South Vietnam will take a more forthcoming attitude in assuming certain specific responsibilities under the Armistice Agreement. The State Department apparently hopes that the French will maintain a military mission in South Vietnam and that one section of that mission would carry out liaison functions with the International Commission and the Vietminh. Diem would, however, be expected to have assumed more formal responsibilities (in writing, if necessary) for the security and support of the International Commission and for the administration of the Demilitarized Zone. The State Department does not seem to think it likely that the South Vietnamese would accept the responsibilities with respect to restrictions on the entry of foreign military personnel and war materials, nor for the restrictions on the establishment of bases and participation in military alliances. Young said it was "out of the question" that South Vietnam would be admitted to membership in SEATO in the present circumstances. It might be possible, he thought, to convince the Communists through diplomatic channels that there was no intention to use South Vietnam as a base of operations for offensive action. The United States objective was to bring South Vietnam in practice towards assuming responsibilities for the kind of armistice arrangements which were covered in the Geneva Agreement; it did not believe it could, or would want to, bring South Vietnam to de jure acceptance of the Geneva Agreement as such.

5. Young hinted at a second approach, the "root and branch" approach. He was speaking in such circuitous terms that we would not wish to place too great emphasis for the moment on this matter, but thought you should know of his hints. More specific information may come to us on this score. What he seemed to be saying was that if the line of approach outlined above failed because of absolute refusal of either the French or the South Vietnamese to agree to it, there would have to be a fall-back position. He left the impression that this might be an action taken by South Vietnam, declaring the Geneva Agreement a dead letter, stressing South Vietnamese peaceful intentions, not ruling out the possibility of eventual nationwide elections, promising to respect the current ceasefire which existed, and appealing for international (and possibly United Nations) interest. This is not a new idea, for we have reported similar thinking in the State Department before. We get the impression, however, that examination of some such second approach is included in State Department position papers which are being submitted to the Secretary.

6. Finally, mention was made of one further suggestion which had been made by United Kingdom and which, indeed, was included in our departmental paper on Vietnam. Young said that the United Kingdom idea of a unilateral declaration by Diem assuming limited responsibilities for the armistice could, in the State Department's view, be interpreted as a unilateral modification of the Geneva Agreement, and could lead to the necessity of re-examination of the whole subject by the Co-Chairmen, if not by a re-convening of the Geneva Conference. For these reasons, the State Department was not particularly enthusiastic about any formal unilateral declaration by Diem, even though the State Department did not rule out the possibility of Diem assuming in correspondence with the French certain definite undertakings.

7. Our conversation with Young was hasty and not at all points crystal clear. We should probably know more definitely of the fate of some of the ideas included above when the United States response is made to the United Kingdom aide mémoire dealt with in our telegram under reference.

VIETNAM — ENTRY OF UNITED STATES MILITARY PERSONNEL

I would be grateful if you would pass the following preliminary Canadian reactions to the United States proposals on this subject to the State Department, as a matter of urgency, if possible so that copies can be made available to Mr. Dulles and his party before their departure from Washington tomorrow.

2. We are sympathetic to the United States wish to take action to preserve and recover the large quantity of military equipment in Indochina. In our view, however, the methods which they propose to use in order to achieve these ends would have unfortunate consequences which would put a serious strain on the maintenance of the Cease Fire Agreement in Vietnam at a time when the question of its continuation is being discussed by the governments concerned.

3. We note that the State Department has already been in touch with the French Government on this subject. We hope that in subsequent discussions on this matter with the French Government, the United States Government might explore the possibility (as an alternative to the presently proposed scheme) of making arrangements under which French army personnel who might be retained in Vietnam (or rotated back in) could train Vietnamese army personnel in the maintenance and use of the MDAP equipment in collaboration with the existing US military mission at its present numerical level. If necessary these arrangements might be supplemented by the use of United States civilian technicians. We believe that some such alternative scheme should be fully canvassed before the course of action now proposed is embarked upon.

4. We appreciate the United States' view that the purpose of this operation, which will have the end result of reducing the military potential in South Vietnam, is in keeping with the spirit of the Vietnam armistice. In the interpretation of the Cease Fire Agreement, however, and in particular of Article 16 it is the Commission's ruling by majority vote which will count rather than the United States interpretation — a fact of considerable importance in connection with any reference of this matter to the Co-Chairmen, a step which is almost certain to follow if the Commission should find a violation and if its recommendations should be ignored. The United Kingdom in this circumstance would be placed in a most embarrassing and difficult position.

5. The fact that the United States does not regard itself as bound by the Cease Fire Agreement would not be regarded as relevant by the International Commission, since the French High Command is now responsible for the implementation of the Agreement in the South and would be charged with responsibility for any violation of Article 16 that might be found.

6. The United States proposals, if implemented, will certainly lead to Vietminh charges of violations of Article 16, even if US military personnel were to enter South Vietnam in civilian clothes. In the light of Commission precedents on the interpretation of Article 16, action along the lines proposed by the United States would almost certainly be regarded by the Commission as in violation of the Cease Fire Agreement. Whatever attitude the Canadian delegation might take (and it would be extremely difficult for it to reverse its previous approach to Article 16), it could not prevent the Commission from finding a violation and from making recommendations which would be the basis of any subsequent consideration of the question by the Co-Chairmen.

7. The emergence of this situation in the near future will in our opinion put great strain on the International Commission at a time when its future is precarious enough and on an issue (cooperation in the South) which is the chief cause of its present difficulties. This situation would militate against current efforts to prevent an early collapse of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam. Whether or not the action proposed by the United States would hasten an Indian decision to withdraw from the Commission, it would undoubtedly do much to exacerbate Indian-United States relations; if India were to remain on the Commission and the action proposed by the United States were carried out irrespective of the finding of the Commission, repeated indictments by the Commission of United States actions could be anticipated. It is not hard to imagine how this situation would be exploited by the Communists.

8. Even if the Commission could be persuaded to agree to the entry of US military personnel for the purposes indicated, failure of the legally responsible party in the South to comply with the required notification procedures concerning the arrival and departure of military personnel would be regarded as a violation, and in the absence of any convincing reason why this notification should not be carried out, might lend substance in neutralist eyes to Vietminh propaganda charges that the United States was endeavouring to establish bases in South Vietnam and to use the Southern zone for aggressive purposes.

9. I would be grateful if you would outline the foregoing considerations to the State Department and express our earnest desire that the United States will reconsider its proposals with a view to seeing if it would not be possible to use other methods to achieve their ends without raising the question of violation of the Cease Fire Agreement. We have mentioned one possible alternative in paragraph 3 above. From the point of view of the efficient handling of the equipment problem, we are aware that such an arrangement might leave much to be desired; but this disadvantage seems to us small in comparison with the serious and far reaching consequences which we think might flow from the course of action now contemplated.

10. In any event we hope that the State Department will not act hastily in this matter. We would particularly like to pass on to the State Department the comments of our Commissioner in Vietnam on the United States proposals to which we will attach particular importance in view of his closeness to the problem. We would think, furthermore, that there would be advantage in postponing a final decision until Mr. Dulles has had an opportunity to assess the consequences of the present proposals in the light of his forthcoming visit to Saigon next month.

11. We trust that the State Department will give careful consideration to the manner in which this matter is broached with the Indians. We do not think that advance information to the Indian Chairman of the Vietnam Commission will do much to reduce the likelihood that the Indians will regard the proposed entry into Vietnam of US military personnel as a violation of Article 16. On the other hand something might be gained (and nothing would be lost) by preliminary government-to-government consultations with the Indians in New Delhi before a firm decision on the present proposals is made.

12. Finally we think it most desirable that no final decision be made on the presently proposed course of action until the results of the current exploration of the assumption of responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice by the Diem Government can be better assessed.

13. I have no objection to your giving the full text of this telegram to the State Department.

VIETNAM — FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

We had a last opportunity today, February 29, to speak to Young before his departure for Karachi by reason of a hastily-arranged meeting of Old Commonwealth representatives with him.

2. What Young had to say to the group confirmed our understanding of the United States position as reported in our telegram under reference; we shall not therefore repeat the specific points made in that telegram. Young did make a few additional general comments. He said he thought the State Department was now very close in its thinking to the views of the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments. In particular the State Department would use its influence to attempt to provide for a continuation of a modified status quo and would seek to prevent an abrupt breakdown in the present arrangements underlying the armistice in Vietnam. To attempt to build any "new régime" would involve such a fundamental revision of the present framework of peace in Vietnam as to raise more problems than it would solve. It could not be ruled out, however, that some fundamental revisions might have to be made eventually.

3. Young said that, while United States suggestions could be made to both the French and the Vietnamese to work out some formula for continuing to share responsibilities for the cease-fire arrangements in Vietnam, the United States could not "work on" either of the parties until it knew more precisely what each of their positions were. (Young's comment struck us as somewhat odd in the light of our knowledge that he was already aware of the French response (our 346 of February 29†) to the United States note concerning the MDAP problem). It was reasonably clear from what Young had to say that we could expect the United States to do very little in the way of making direct representations to the South Vietnamese until after the March 4 elections or possibly until Dulles himself arrived in Saigon.

4. In answer to a number of questions Young said that in the State Department's view Diem should be doing something to seize the diplomatic initiative with respect to the issue of all-Vietnam elections. Perhaps it was true that a more forthcoming South Vietnamese attitude on this question, which would appear to be within the Geneva framework, might seem to Diem to be a sign of weakness on his part. The State Department was coming to the opinion, however, that Diem had not done enough. Young thought it not unlikely that Dulles while in Saigon would press Diem to take some more forthright stand at least on the principle if not the modalities of free elections throughout Vietnam.

5. Once again (bearing in mind the report in our telegram under reference) Young said that the views which he had given us could not be said as yet to have the full approval of the Secretary.

VIETNAM — FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

We are encouraged to note that the State Department now regards itself as "very close in its thinking to the views of the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments" but we are a little dismayed by the indications that they are not going to do very much in the immediate future to apply these views. We are also somewhat disturbed about some divergences in approach to this problem as between ourselves on the one hand and the United Kingdom and the United States on the other. While we recognize the unlikelihood that the State Department will do very much to move this matter ahead during Mr. Dulles' absence, we would suggest that you keep up the pressure by following up your previous approaches and in particular by drawing attention to an important discrepancy between our thinking and that of the United Kingdom and the United States.

2. This discrepancy relates to the manner in which the Diem Government might assume responsibilities for maintaining the armistice. We have observed from telegrams which Earnscliffe has shown us (particularly Foreign Office to Washington No. 822 of February 11 and UK Embassy Washington to Foreign Office No. 387 of February 15) that in discussing this problem with the State Department the United Kingdom has led off with the idea of Diem's making a unilateral declaration. It was not our idea that this is what should be done in the initial instance. As outlined in our memorandum on Vietnam enclosed with our despatch No. 148 of February 10, we suggested that the question of responsibilities for the maintenance of the armistice should be dealt with by means of a Franco-Vietnamese exchange of notes in which the French and the South Vietnamese would partition between them the remaining responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement with the South Vietnamese taking the lion's share. If this method of approach is not adopted, the French will be left in an impossible position, having abandoned the means of carrying out their responsibilities by withdrawing the remainder of their forces in accordance with Article 10 of the Final Declaration and the request of the South Vietnamese Government. Even if the French should agree to a request from the South Vietnamese Government to leave behind a mission to carry out certain functions relating to the Cease Fire Agreement as well as other unrelated tasks they would not be in a position to carry out all their obligations as a party to the Agreement. They are not now in that position, and this is precisely the source of some of the greatest difficulties which the International Commission is now facing and the real threat to the future existence of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam.

3. We had envisioned the negotiations starting from the point of a French request that the South Vietnamese assume full legal responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement, but recognized the probability that the French might have to bargain down from there. To take account of this probability, we suggested that the exchange of notes might be so drafted as to protect the Diem Government's refusal to accept responsibility for the whole Geneva settlement. If the Geneva framework is to be kept together it will, in our opinion, be necessary for the South Vietnamese to accept responsibility for most of the substance of the Agreement, even if they do not formally commit themselves to the full range of responsibilities which would otherwise rest upon them as legal successors to the French High Command.

4. Our hope was that with United Kingdom and United States assistance the French and the South Vietnamese would be able to work out an exchange of notes which would go far enough for the French to claim that they had handed over their responsibilities (or most of them) but which would not go so far as to suggest that the South Vietnamese were assuming any responsibility for the original division of the country or for the political settlement. An exchange of notes along these lines would in our opinion make it possible for us to argue in the Commission (and others elsewhere) that South Vietnam has assumed responsibilities for the essential provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement and that all parties would simply have to accept realistically the fact that the Diem Government was not assuming the full range of responsibilities as a legal successor.

5. Recognizing that it might be possible to maintain this arrangement for only a limited time, we also suggested that if the Geneva framework started to come apart, the Diem Government could derive advantage from a unilateral offer to continue to abide by the essential provisions of the Armistice (for which it had assumed responsibility in its exchange of notes with the French) provided the Viet Minh would undertake to observe similar provisions.

6. However, we believe that the idea of a unilateral declaration by the South Vietnamese Government is a poor angle from which to approach this problem in the initial instance. In our opinion there is a great danger that the idea may be progressively watered down to something of the nature outlined by Foreign Minister Mau as reported in Hanoi telegram under reference. This would not, we think, serve to keep the Geneva structure in being for long, and would leave entirely out of account the fact that the French would be left holding the legal bag and might soon feel compelled to hand the problem on to the Co-Chairmen. In any event it is clear that both the French and the South Vietnamese are approaching this problem in terms of their own bilateral negotiations (in this connection see Hanoi telegram No. 66 of February 28,† which is being repeated to you separately).

7. Our hope was (and still is) that the United States and the United Kingdom might see their way clear to back up the French position in the forthcoming Franco-Vietnamese negotiations by intervening with Diem and pointing out to him the advantages of his government's assuming responsibilities for the maintenance of the cease fire arrangements, making allowance for the fact that the Diem Government will not be prepared to accept full successor responsibilities. For the United Kingdom and the United States to explore the full possibilities of this approach to the problem it will be necessary for them to discuss with the French the sort of formula that might be devised to meet the French position without prejudicing the known policies and attitudes of the South Vietnamese towards the political settlement and the original partition of Vietnam.

8. We would be grateful if you would review this matter with the State Department, reiterating the points outlined above.

For London: We would be grateful if you would discuss this matter further with the Foreign Office and report their reactions.

For Paris: Please discuss this matter in general terms with the Quai d'Orsay, and enquire about any plans they may have developed with respect to the forthcoming negotiations on the problem of succession to the French High Command responsibilities.

VIETNAM — FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

We discussed with Kocher and Kattenburg of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs on March 6 the views contained in your telegram under reference and left with them a written summary of those views. A copy of the paper which we left will be sent to you by bag.

2. As you surmised in your telegram under reference, the centre of gravity in this matter has shifted from Washington to Mr. Dulles and his suite in Karachi and points east. Kocher did not, therefore, offer very much in the way of substantial comment on our views. He was, however, quick to recognize what you have termed the discrepancy between Canadian thinking and that of the United States (on the degree of responsibility for the Armistice which Diem should be urged to assume) and that of the United Kingdom (on the modalities of South Vietnamese acceptance of these responsibilities). He said the State Department had not been too enthusiastic about the United Kingdom proposal for a unilateral declaration by Diem assuming responsibilities for the Armistice. (We have reported this fact before, e.g., our 343 of February 28; we should not forget, however, that the State Department view in this respect is based on different reasons from those which have led us to the same view.) On the matter of how far Diem should be urged to go in assuming the more important continuing responsibilities under the Ceasefire Agreement, Kocher said he was unable for the moment to add anything to what we had been told of United States thinking. He expected that the Secretary's discussions in Karachi, New Delhi, and Saigon would greatly influence United States moves in the immediate future.

3. While in the discussion which ensued then we did not learn anything new about United States plans for the future, we did learn a little more about the examination of United States policy towards Vietnam which has gone on recently. Much of this information was not entirely new either but it tended to confirm what we had to offer as speculation over the past few weeks.

4. We were told that in looking at the problems presented in Vietnam the State Department had examined three courses of possible action. At one extreme was the course of doing nothing, either to hasten or to prevent the natural evolution of the situation, i.e., to allow the present (Geneva) arrangements to wither away as fast or as slowly as they might. At the other extreme was action by the South Vietnamese Government to declare even more forthrightly than had been the case its disavowal of the Geneva arrangements, offering in their stead its plan for the future which would include its peaceful intentions, its willingness to prolong satisfactory armistice arrangements consonant with its national sovereignty, its goal of eventual free all-Vietnam elections, and its appeal for continued international interest in the situation.

5. Between these two extremes was a compromise scheme which would involve continued sharing of responsibility for the Geneva arrangements, perhaps somewhat modified, by the French and the Vietnamese. It was to this middle course that the State Department decided to direct its efforts out of deference to the views of its friends and because the general situation did not seem to have reached a point of crisis, demanding a régime fundamentally different from that settled on at Geneva. (This idea is familiar from the United States aide mémoire of February 29 to the United Kingdom, our 358 of March 1,† which includes the statement "the Government of the United States believes that unless the Communists greatly increase their pressure over Vietnam, it is better to continue the present arrangements temporarily rather than try the delicate and complex task of formulating and seeking agreement on a new modus vivendi"). The attitude of the two parties on whom the success of this course of action depended, the French and the Vietnamese, had yet to be explored fully. Only when more was known on this score could United States plans for action be laid more certainly.

6. Nothing emerged from our discussion which would ease your justifiable concern that the United States "is not going to do very much in the immediate future to apply these (United Kingdom and Canadian) views." It must be recognized that the United States has accepted to a point Canadian and United Kingdom views that an attempt should be made to preserve the Geneva framework for a time. The State Department's acceptance of this course of action, however, could scarcely be called enthusiastic at the moment. The State Department still has in mind a fall-back position which may not recommend itself to us. It is possible that Mr. Dulles' discussions in the field may change the balance of United States thinking. We must, therefore, be wary of attempting any firm estimate of United States thinking until we hear more of the results of those discussions.

VIETNAM FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

We talked to Tomlinson yesterday afternoon and made the points contained in your telegram under reference. He did not seem to think that there was in fact such a great divergence in the UK Canadian approaches though he suspected that there was a considerable discrepancy between us (i.e. Canada and the UK) and the US.

2. The important objective was to provide for a set of conditions following the withdrawal of the French High Command which would so far as possible ensure the maintenance of the ceasefire arrangements and the effective operation of the Commission. This objective the UK shared with us.

3. As regards the idea of a unilateral declaration by the Diem Government, the Foreign Office view was that this need not, and probably should not, be translated into a separate and independent statement but could quite well form part of an exchange of notes between the French and the South Vietnamese.

4. There is perhaps some difference between us on the proper sequence of the steps to be taken to achieve the desired objective. While the British would be happy to see the French and Vietnamese work out a satisfactory solution between them, they remained convinced that the Diem Government was much more likely to cooperate to that end if encouraged to do so by the United States. It was for this reason that the UK, while keeping in touch with the French, had given first priority to trying to persuade the Americans to use their influence with the South Vietnamese Government. These efforts have so far been of little avail and the United States continues to talk in terms of the French retaining a large measure of legal responsibility for the implementation of the Ceasefire Agreement. The French have told the British that US suggestions have not been at all precise so far but the French position is clear. They will not contemplate any proposal whereby French forces having been withdrawn, the French High Command would nominally be transferred to the head of any remaining military training mission. If the South Vietnamese Government were to change its mind and withdraw its demand for the removal of the French Expeditionary Force, the Quai d'Orsay would not rule out the possibility of some joint arrangements being made taking into account the means at the disposal of each party.

5. You will by now probably have received a copy of Saigon telegram 84 of March 6† containing the text of a draft declaration which Stephenson suggests might be acceptable to Diem and could perhaps be contained in an exchange of notes. In addition to the political gesture in the first paragraph of the draft declaration the South Vietnam Government would, subject to Vietminh agreement to do likewise, respect the conditions of the ceasefire and in particular

(a) would cooperate loyally with the Commission and provide security

(b) would respect the Demarcation Line and the Demilitarized Zone

(c) sees no need to join any military alliance and has no intention of permitting the establishment of any foreign bases in its territory.

The obvious omission in this list of obligations relates of course to the provision of the Ceasefire Agreement prohibiting the entry of additional military personnel and equipment. This was deliberately omitted because of the present United States intentions, but the absence of any reference to this important provision would clearly be seized upon by the Vietminh.

6. Stephenson's draft declaration and his preceding telegram 83 with comments have been repeated to Karachi for the information of the Foreign Secretary. The Foreign Office hopes that discussions among the three Foreign Ministers will help iron out the present difficulties and differences. Tomlinson felt that there was little to be done pending these exchanges in Karachi.

IMPORT OF ARMS

Whether or not the United States decides to send their TERM mission into South Vietnam, the fact that the French have not been complying with the proper notification procedures with respect to the entry of personnel and the export of war materials makes it highly probable that the Commission will shortly have a rash of violation charges to deal with alleging breaches of Articles 16 and 17 and perhaps 18 and 19 as well. While it is difficult at this stage to estimate the long range consequences of this situation, it seems possible that persistent failure of the French to comply with Commission recommendations — whatever the reason for such failure — may be a factor of crucial importance to the continued operation of the Commission or at least of its fixed teams. In any event the situation which is shaping up is sure to put the South in a very disadvantageous propaganda position.

2. The situation is likely to be aggravated if the French withdraw from South Vietnam and the Diem Government is left with the responsibility for complying with Article 17. The Diem Government is not likely to be much worried by Commission insistence on notification procedures, particularly if it is being counselled by the United States to ignore them. We do not think it likely that the United States (whose attitude is undoubtedly affected by their experience in Korea) will become any more inclined that they are now to accept the restrictions imposed by Article 16 and Commission procedural requirements on this subject.

3. So far as the public record goes the import of arms position in the North is a little too good to be true. We are aware that this is because no proven violations of the arms import regulations have come to light and because the Viet Minh have been very subtle in the kind of obstruction to team operations that they have employed. We are afraid, however, that a situation may arise which will enable the South Vietnamese or the United States Government to make public charges about Viet Minh violation of the ban on arms imports, and we may find ourselves in the uncomfortable position of having to go along with a Commission whitewash of the Viet Minh performance.

4. To avoid this situation we believe that it is desirable for your delegation to make a careful study of fixed team procedures for supervising the implementation of Article 17 in the North and to document cases of Viet Minh obstruction techniques such as those employed in connection with Phuc Hoa team and water transport for the Haiphong team. You will recall that in the Fourth Interim Report we made excellent use of circumstantial evidence which while not actually proving Viet Minh obstruction in the working of Article 14(d) nevertheless pointed the finger pretty unmistakably and in a manner that squared our position on the Commission with the allegations in South Vietnam and in the United States concerning Viet Minh obstruction of freedom of movement. This evidence was largely culled from a considerable number of team reports and when put together in the Fourth Interim Report added up to a fairly impressive case.

5. In the same way we would suggest that you continue your present practice of having delegation members — both on fixed teams and on Commission committees — call attention on every available occasion to Viet Minh practices which constitute in fact obstruction to the Commission's inspection procedures. (In this connection we were particularly impressed with the record of Viet Minh obstruction in connection with water transport for the Haiphong team as reported in your despatch No. 78 of February 22†). Preparatory work of this kind now will make it possible later for this kind of evidence to be brought out in Commission reports in such a way as to show that while no cases of direct violation can be proved the Viet Minh has nevertheless acted in such a way as to render nugatory the inspection machinery and procedures for ensuring that Article 17 is properly implemented. Also by laying the foundation now it will not appear when the next Commission report is written that we are merely trying to trump up charges to offset Viet Minh accusations against the South.

VIETNAM — ASSUMPTION OF RESPONSIBILITIES IN THE SOUTH

We would be grateful if you would draw to the attention of the Foreign Office the contents of telegrams 53† and 54† of March 19 and 57† of March 20 (paragraphs 1 to 5) from Saigon (all being repeated to you separately). These telegrams set forth very clearly the very awkward situation which is developing with the French denying any intention of retaining legal responsibilities for the Cease Fire Agreement and the South Vietnamese refusing to consider taking on these responsibilities, and both parties refusing to take the initiative in negotiating some compromise. Since the Indians and Poles are seized of this situation now in the Commission, we may expect that there may be some initiative in the Commission in the very near future to do something about this impossible state of affairs if other developments do not occur to resolve it.

2. Information which we have received from the State Department and from Earnscliffe indicates that the South Vietnamese are now working on a draft declaration along the lines which have been suggested by Stephenson in Saigon. We have already indicated our concern about this approach to the problem in our telegram Y-344 of March 2. We would be interested in knowing whether the United Kingdom still see some prospect for Diem's declaration forming part of an exchange of notes between the French and the Vietnamese, as suggested in paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference. We have not seen any recent indication of this possibility. We note that the United Kingdom sees as the primary objective the provision for a set of conditions which would so far as possible ensure the maintenance of the cease fire arrangements and the effective operation of the Commission. It seems to us that an essential condition in this connection is the existence of a legally responsible party in the South. Any light which the United Kingdom can throw on how such a condition can be met on the basis of the kind of declaration which it is now contemplated that Diem might make would be much appreciated.

3. If we can continue to have some legally responsible party in the South — or at least a convincing appearance of one — the possibility of maintaining the armistice in Vietnam on the basis of the existing Cease Fire Agreement may be reasonably good. We understand that this is an objective of United Kingdom policy as indicated in the United Kingdom note to the India in early February. The disappearance of a legally responsible party, however, seems likely to us to render the maintenance of the Cease Fire Agreement for any length of time an almost impossible task.

4. We appreciate the reluctance of South Vietnam to assume legal responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement, and the United States' reasons for counselling the South Vietnamese against assuming commitments in this connection which are too specific in nature or too long in point of time. On the other hand we can understand the desire of the French to take advantage of the present opportunity to shed the unenviable task which they have been performing in Vietnam. We have not examined the legal aspects of the situation, but would be interested in knowing the United Kingdom view as to whether the French can dispose of all their legal responsibilities simply by dissolving the French High Command. We appreciate, of course, that in this situation greater weight will be attached to political than to legal considerations.

5. You might tell the Foreign Office that we are rather uneasy about the possibility that pursuit of the unilateral declaration idea may lead to serious consideration of the "third alternative" mentioned in New Delhi telegram No. 202 of March 19,† which we assume would mean the lapsing of the Cease Fire Agreement and its replacement by some loose arrangement based on declarations made by the South Vietnamese and the Viet Minh. This suggestion appears to contemplate a fresh mandate to the Commission powers to supervise an "agreement" based on these declarations. We would not wish it to be assumed that we would be prepared to accept without very careful prior scrutiny supervisory responsibilities in Vietnam based on any such loose arrangement. With a detailed and firm agreement to supervise, we have, by insisting on a fairly narrow and legalistic interpretation both of the Commission's role and of the Cease Fire Agreement, been able to ensure that the International Commission has not become internationally meddlesome (e.g. our success in keeping the Commission out of discussion of the political settlement and in preventing the Commission from becoming involved with General Giap's broad propaganda charges). We would not be confident that this would continue to be possible if the Commission were asked to supervise the carrying out of two unilateral declarations.

For Washington: Please convey the substance of the foregoing to the State Department as well as Saigon telegrams 53 and 54 and paragraphs 1 to 5 of 57.

VIETNAM — PROPOSED TERM MISSION

For your own information, we learned of the Indian reply from the United Kingdom both here and through our office in Saigon. We are therefore repeating your telegram and this reply to interested missions to whom Saigon telegram No. 46 of March 15† has already been referred.

2. We too have been amazed at the Indian reaction to the proposed TERM mission.[17] We are, however, disturbed about the possibility that misunderstanding on this matter, as between the United States and India, could lead to nasty trouble between them. You may mention our misgivings on this score to the State Department and perhaps suggest that a very careful check be made on the information which has been given to the Indians.

3. From Kattenburg's account we received the impression that the Indians understand the main task of the TERM mission to be the removal of military equipment. It is therefore possible that this might be a source of misunderstanding if the Indians were later to discover that the TERM mission was spending most of its time reconditioning military equipment rather than removing it.

4. You might also mention to the State Department that the conditions for the entry of the TERM mission, as suggested by the Indians, should carefully be noted i.e. operations under the supervision or with the cognizance of the Commission and notification of entry and departure of personnel.

5. With respect to the precedents which Desai mentioned, in August 1955, the PAVN notified the Commission that a Korean army group of 60 entertainers and 3 military delegates were entering North Vietnam at Lang Son. To deal with pertinent questions of notification and control, the Commission adopted certain principles which were later also applied to a similar visit by a Communist Chinese "cultural" group. On the basis of their correct procedures in these instances, the PAVN have made numerous complaints of French violations in respect of a number of movements including the visit of a Philippines military mission to South Vietnam in January 1955, the visit of a South Korean military mission in August 1955, and the visits on various occasions of Admiral Stump, General Pipes, and other United States military personnel. Complaints have also been made concerning visits of South Vietnamese military personnel to the Philippines, to the United States, and to South Korea.

REDUCTION OF TEAM PERSONNEL

Ignoring for the moment the difficulty of forecasting the situation which will follow the withdrawal of the FEC and the outcome of the tangled problem concerning the assumption of responsibilities in the South, we would like to direct your attention to the question of the future scale of our activities in Vietnam. If we assume that the Diem Government will accept sufficient responsibilities to keep the armistice working for the time being on the basis of the Cease Fire Agreement, it would seem that there is not likely to be any substantial change in the nature of the Commission's supervisory responsibilities. At the same time it appears probable that increasing difficulties over logistic problems, a less cooperative attitude on the part of the DR (arising from the fact that they may calculate that their good behaviour is not yielding much in the way of bringing forward the political settlement) and only a limited measure of cooperation from the South Vietnamese will all combine to render the Commission even more ineffective than it now is. Under these circumstances both the symbolic and practical value of the Commission as an agency for the preservation of the peace will decline and we may find that a large proportion of our delegation (particularly officers on the fixed and mobile teams) may either be unemployed or engaged in insignificant tasks. To carry on in futility would do Canada's reputation no good, it would do the reputation of the Commission no good and would be a disservice to the idea of international supervision. Furthermore we can ill afford to continue fielding so large and expensive a team if it can accomplish so little.

2. We are therefore wondering whether we have not passed the point where we should continue trying to make the Commission do an effective job in those spheres where it has not clearly succeeded up to the present, and whether we should not now begin to seek ways and means of promoting the curtailment of those Commission activities which are not contributing directly to the maintenance of the peace.

3. With the future of the armistice now in the balance we would do our friends little service if we were to come forward now with proposals or schemes for the redefining of the Commission's tasks in more realistic terms. We would like, however, to have your views about the prospects of our aiding and abetting the reduction of the Commission's activities and of our reducing the number of people required to keep up the Commission's activities.

4. Active responsibilities of fixed and mobile teams appear now in descending order of importance to relate to:

(a) supervision of the demilitarized zone;

(b) supervision of the entry of military personnel and war materials;

(c) Article 14(c);

(d) residual problems under 14(d) and 21.

We would not wish to encourage any scaling down of task (a) which could make an important contribution to the maintenance of the armistice.

5. Task (b) is the principal raison d'être of the fixed teams and is therefore indirectly the most demanding in terms of manpower. We have doubts as to the usefulness of the teams in this connection, and wonder whether the value of the teams as deterrents to the import of war materials is not overweighed by the false sense of security which their existence gives. We would appreciate your comments on this point. In our telegram No. Y66 of March 17† we have suggested that note be taken of all indications of Viet Minh obstructions to the teams in this connection, so that if trouble brews up later in connection with arms or personnel entries in the South, we might be in a position to make countercharges against the Vietminh and then perhaps propose a withdrawal of the teams on the grounds that neither side really wishes useful supervision to be carried out. We would also welcome your comments on this idea. Finally, we wonder whether there would be any merit in considering forthright action in connection with the Phuc Hoa team if the DR refuse to permit continuous supervision after the mandate of the present team runs out. We have in mind your proposing in the Commission the withdrawal of the team on the grounds that the gap in control recommended by the Commission defeats the purpose of the team. We might get more value out of withdrawing the team and making the reasons public than from continuing its existence under conditions that render its control functions almost valueless. We might even consider refusing to send in a Canadian member if the Indians and Poles wished to maintain the team in existence. While we recognize that since this team is a mobile team it might be difficult to capitalize fully on its withdrawal, nevertheless it might be a useful preparatory move for the later withdrawal of fixed teams on the grounds that they could not exercise useful control either in the North or the South. Is there any corresponding team in the South which could be withdrawn at the same time as the Phuc Hoa team?

6. Task (c) contributes only to the propaganda advantage of the DR, and neither it nor task (d) (which may have some limited humanitarian value) contributes in any substantial way to the maintenance of the cease fire. We find it a little difficult from our records to work out the extent to which mobile team personnel have been actively employed on these tasks in the last few months or how many of them have spent their time waiting around for permission to begin investigations. We have been wondering whether there would be any possibility of reducing the officer strength available for mobile team work, even if this were to slow down 14(c) investigations. Is there any possibility that more of this work might be done by mobile elements of some of the less active fixed teams in the South?

7. Finally we would be interested in your views as to the possibility of withdrawing at least one pair of the fixed teams — say the Con Cuong team in the North and either Nha Trang or Ba Ngoi in the South on the grounds that they simply do not have enough useful business to warrant their continued existence. Spot checks might be made from time to time by the nearest fixed teams.

8. Generally speaking we do not believe that the time is ripe for us to initiate any moves to reduce the functions of the Commission. We would like to see all possible steps taken to prepare for such initiatives at a later date, and meanwhile would appreciate your comments and suggestions on ways of trimming on personnel. We do not wish to promote a situation in which an impossible burden would be thrown on those who remain; on the other hand we would not be upset if shortage of Canadian personnel were to contribute to the curtailment of some of the Commission's less useful activities.

VIETNAM — LETTER TO THE CO-CHAIRMEN

You will recall that last December 21 the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference addressed a circular letter to members of the Conference and to the supervisory powers calling attention to the unsatisfactory implementation of certain provisions of the Geneva settlement in Vietnam and inviting comments and suggestions.[18] (Sir Archibald Nye's letter of December 21 is attached). All governments consulted have now replied with the exception of South Vietnam, Cambodia and Canada. Although there is not much we can add to the exchange of correspondence that has taken place; I think we should send in a reply.

2. In brief, the replies of the other governments were along the following lines:

CHINA: An attack upon the Diem Government and a call for a reconvening of the Geneva Conference.

FRANCE: A clarification of French responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement and the Final Declaration.

VIETMINH: A vigorous attack upon the Diem Government and a call for the reconvening of the Geneva Conference.

POLAND: A comparatively mild note, reflecting adversely upon the attitude of South Vietnam and supporting the idea of a new Conference.

LAOS: A complaint about Vietminh interference in Laos, and an expression of a wish to avoid intervention in the affairs of Vietnam.

INDIA: A lengthy dissertation on the Geneva Agreement and the interdependence of the Cease Fire Agreement and the provisions in the Final Declaration for a political settlement, together with an urgent request for a meeting of the Co-Chairmen to consider some new initiative to save the Geneva settlement from collapse.

3. The United Kingdom and the Soviet Union have not, of course, made separate replies, but in a note dated February 18 and addressed to the United Kingdom the USSR supported the Chinese and Vietminh proposals for the reconvening of the Geneva Conference, with the supervisory powers attending. The United Kingdom replied to this note on March 9 (after consulting with the Americans in Karachi), turning aside the idea of a reconvened Geneva Conference and proposing instead that the Co-Chairmen might meet and discuss the situation when the Soviet ministers visit the United Kingdom in April.

4. The Indians expressed the hope that we would take account of their message in our reply. We would prefer not to take detailed account of it, however, as we would have to disagree with them on a number of points, and there would be little advantage to be gained from engaging in public debate with them. Mr. Reid thought that the Indians particularly wanted us to support the Indian request that the Co-Chairmen meet to discuss the problem, and we see no objection to meeting this point.

5. Attached for your signature if you agree is a letter to Sir Archibald Nye conveying our reply. We asked Canada House to check a draft of this letter with the Foreign Office, and we have revised the letter to take into account one point which they raised.

6. You may recall having seen telegrams from our missions in London and Washington suggesting that since we were taking the line that Canada, as a supervisory power, has no responsibility for the political settlement, we should make no mention of it whatever in our reply, even indirectly. We do not agree with this view and believe that if we were to omit any reference to the political settlement we might give rise to speculation that we had reservations about it. The fact that we are not responsible for the political settlement does not mean that we have to ignore the existence of the problem or that we cannot express the hope that those who have responsibility will give attention to it. Accordingly we have left in a reference to the Geneva settlement in the last sentence of the letter. This point will be explained to London and Washington in a separate telegram.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 23, 1956

Dear Sir Archibald [Nye]:

I should like to refer to your letter of December 21, 1955, transmitting a communication from Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Molotov in their then capacity of Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference and the governments participating in the International Supervisory Commission in Vietnam concerning the implementation in Vietnam of the agreements reached by the Geneva Conference of 1954. I would be grateful if you would transmit to Mr. Selwyn Lloyd (Mr. Macmillan's successor as Co-Chairman) the following reply.

The documents referred to in the Co-Chairman's communication of December 21, 1955 deal for the most part with the question of the political settlement in Vietnam. Since the International Supervisory Commission in which Canada was invited to participate was set up for the sole purpose of supervising the implementation of the Cease Fire Agreement, the Canadian Government has always regarded its responsibilities with respect to the Geneva settlement as confined to the Cease Fire Agreement. Accordingly it does not wish to express views with respect to the manner in which the programme for a political settlement for Vietnam as outlined in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference should be carried out.

Canadian views on the unsatisfactory implementation of certain clauses of the Cease Fire Agreement have been set forth in the Fourth Interim Report of the International Commission, and particularly in the two minority Canadian amendments which are included in the report. The Canadian Government has no additional observations to add at this time.

The Canadian Government expresses the hope that the Co-Chairmen will keep the situation in Vietnam under review, that in the light of the comments of the Geneva Conference powers and the Commission powers they will consult together at their discretion as to what measures might best be taken to ensure that the Cease Fire Agreement is maintained and the Geneva settlement carried out.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Commissioner, International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 23, 1956

Dear David [Johnson],

Your telegram No. 92 of March 13†, concerning the transfer of headquarters from Hanoi to the South and indicating the difficulties you are now having with the PAVN has brought to a boil in my mind some of the conclusions which I think we may have to reach soon about the continuing work of the Commission. We have threshed over these matters here quite a bit but have not yet put any clear issues to the Minister. What I would like to do is give you some idea of our trends of thought and have your comments. In this letter I shall be thinking out loud and not interpreting what could be called settled Canadian policy.

2. As you know, we have from the beginning foreseen a time when the Commission, in spite of all our efforts, would be pretty well incapable of doing anything like a conscientious job of carrying out most of its remaining functions. The reason for this frustration would be the devious methods of the Communists, the incapacity of the French to act, and the refusal of the South to cooperate. Efforts are being made of course to secure some kind of cooperation from the South Vietnamese, but these negotiations may involve a long stalemate during which the Commission will have to carry on somehow. If the French depart without any agreement on cooperation by the South, it is hard to see how the Commission can operate at all, but even if some grudging agreement is achieved we are wondering how successfully the Commission can function.

3. We have, of course, taken the view and still do that the Commission has a symbolic value and should be retained in Vietnam as long as possible because to remove it would threaten the Geneva framework on which peace rests. The symbolic function would undoubtedly best be achieved by continuing the Commission at full force, by improving our procedures, and thereby making sure that the Geneva Agreements are observed. On the other hand, it is conceivable that it could be achieved simply by having a Commission waving an international flag in Hanoi or Saigon or both. What I am worried about is that we may find ourselves drifting into a situation in which we have the worst of both worlds. In other words, we would maintain the full staff and framework and endeavour to carry on all the prescribed functions, but for an increasing number of reasons we would be incapable of performing any of these functions satisfactorily. Such a situation would be hard on our morale and on our pride; it would also be very hard on the prestige of the Commission. If the Commission becomes a farce, can it have any value as a symbol?

4. Under these circumstances we are naturally rather tempted by any scheme for lopping off those functions of the Commission which cannot be carried out to our satisfaction or the satisfaction of the parties. These could be lopped off, as the Poles have suggested to you, by drawing up a new Geneva Agreement at a new Geneva Conference. Such a conference, we have agreed, is not a practical proposal — although we might bear in mind that, for the reasons mentioned in the above paragraph, it may some day soon be in our Canadian interest to seek new Geneva terms even if some of the Great Powers are thereby embarrassed. As an alternative to seeking a formal agreement we might encourage and promote any withering away of Commission functions which sets in as a result of declining cooperation from the parties and any mutual tacit recognition on their part that nothing can be done about certain provisions of the agreement.

5. There must be some functions of the Commissions which have already withered away. Among these one might include 14(d). Of the other functions that we would have most interest in withering, I should think 14(c) would be the most important. It serves no useful purpose, as far as I can see, to continue any actions under 14(c) and it would be best if we forgot the whole thing. The most questionable provisions for consideration are the functions under Chapter III preventing the importation of arms and armed forces.

6. Of the continuing supervisory responsibilities of the Commission, it would seem on the face of it that the control of arms imports is one of the most important continuing functions. However, one must be practical. Is it possible for these provisions to be enforced to an extent which gives reasonable grounds for confidence? It looks to us as if the situation in this respect may be approaching the situation which has existed for some time in Korea. In spite of the charges often made by the Americans we are not persuaded that large quantities of materials have been pouring into Vietnam because we have no evidence to this effect. Nevertheless, from what we have learned from the Commission and the teams, we assume that, whether or not the Viet Minh have taken advantage of the situation, the provisions the Commission has been able to establish to prevent arms shipments across the northern border and along the northern coast would not be adequate to prevent importations on a considerable scale at any time the Communists wished. Perhaps, given the terrain and the length of the coastline, this kind of control is inherently impossible without the use of enormous manpower. Whether it is or not the Poles and the Viet Minh have by their treatment of the fixed and mobile teams in the North done their best to prevent what has been established from being effective. It cannot be said that the controls have worked very well in the South either, but the reasons for this seem to be to a large extent negligence and reluctance on the part of all parties concerned.

7. We may be faced shortly with the determination on the part of the Americans and the South Vietnamese to defy the Geneva Agreement in respect to arms importation. If they do so, they are almost certain to point out that the Commission has been unable to control importation in North Vietnam and therefore it cannot expect the South to accept these limitations. We might have to decide whether we should attempt the impossible task of establishing a really effective control around the whole country or give up trying.

8. One function which probably ought not to be withered away, and which should in fact be strengthened, is that of controlling the border between the two parts of Vietnam. This, I gather, is not as easy as it seems, partly because of the topography and partly because of the local obstructions. Nevertheless, it would seem to be a job in which both sides have some mutual interest and which could conceivably be accomplished with a limited degree of satisfaction.

9. It may well be that I have exaggerated the futility of the Commission. If so, I hope that you will put us straight quickly in our estimates. (I hope I do not need to explain that there is no implication whatsoever of criticism of the Canadian Commissioner or his staff in these derogatory references to the work of the Commission.) If this state of frustration has been reached or may well be reached in the near future, should we oppose or resist the withering away of most of the Commission's activities — or should we perhaps consciously guide it to make clear where the blame lies? It would be hard for our self-respect to sit back and let this process go on without protest. At the same time, there is a good deal to be said for our being relieved of duties which we cannot decently perform. To carry on in futility would do Canada's reputation no good, it would do the reputation of the Commission no good, and we cannot afford to continue fielding so large and expensive a team if it can accomplish so little.

10. There may be something to be said for a two-faced policy, constantly protesting against frustrations but allowing our activities to be curtailed without trying very hard to fight against the inevitable. If we get no relief from our burdens either from the withering process or from some other eventuality such as a redefinition of Commission tasks, we may ultimately have to resort to more forthright action. If all else fails we might, at the appropriate moment, say quite frankly in the Commission that for reasons clear to all it is impossible for the Commission to carry out equitably and in fairness to both parties certain of its functions and that as this is the case the Canadian team cannot conscientiously participate in such activities. In this way, we might get rid of 14(c). We might have to place a good deal of the blame on South Vietnam, but we could also put on record our views about civil liberties in the North. To refuse to participate in control of the border would be a more serious affair and, it might be argued, contrary to the interests of the Western Powers. The fact may well be, however, that we should be getting rid merely of a pretence which in reality is working to no one's advantage except possibly the Communists'. Our excuse for refusing to continue the arms control would be the frustrations put in our way by the Communists. I realize, of course, that we have never been able to work up a good case to prove Viet Minh violations on the Commission, but if we publish the story of our efforts to establish fixed teams and the difficulties these teams have met with, I should think they would look like convincing evidence to the outsider that the Communists have prevented our control from being effective. It is to be hoped, of course, that the Americans will not precipitately provide us with reasons for doing away with arms control for which the South must be blamed.

11. There are clearly many objections to such a policy. It would mean that we would be talking a good deal more frankly and publicly about the problems of the Commission than we have ever done before, and this might make it difficult for the Commission to take any effective action. On the other hand, it may be that the days have ended when unanimity and an effective Commission are of any value. It is the Geneva Armistice rather than the Commission that we are interested in preserving, and the former may be preserved even though the Commission is a broken reed. It must be borne in mind that the alternative to a rump Commission is perhaps even worse. This alternative, as I see it, would be the continuance indefinitely of all the fixed teams and mobile teams in spite of the fact that they are accomplishing little or nothing. With the departure of the French, we will, I presume, be faced with critical logistic problems. It may not simply be a question of the teams not being able to operate but of the teams having to be withdrawn as they cannot be supplied. Heretofore, we have worried about the logistic difficulties which the South would be responsible for. If, however, as is suggested in your telegram No. 92, the PAVN are creating difficulties in order to drive you out of Hanoi, it may be that we will have a more balanced excuse for cutting down some of our functions on that score.

12. If the time is not yet right for the more extreme measures which I have suggested as a way to reduce the Commission, I think we should do what we can now to "shape the record" so that we will have good grounds — relating to both north and south — for our decision to refuse further participation in the Commission's less useful functions. Meanwhile I presume we can expect a long period of wrangling before the position became clear. During this period of wrangling, in which the teams might become pretty well ineffective, would it be legitimate for us to reduce our military strength in Vietnam? Hitherto, we have been inclined to think that some time this spring great decisions would be taken by the Geneva Powers or the French or the South Vietnamese which would suddenly make our future role clear. Given the fact, however, that none of the parties concerned, the Communists, the Western Powers or the Indians, is showing any anxiety to raise issues violently, I think we may well be faced with some months of stalemate. The only decisive event which could take place in the near future would be the complete withdrawal of the French. I have a feeling, however, that even this will be confused in some temporising formula, and in a few months' time the situation with regard to the work of the Commission will remain pretty much the same as it is now. It may be that we are now in a period when the future of the Commission is in the balance. Tempting as it is to turn this situation to advantage by taking drastic action now to rationalize the work of the Commission, I think we will have to hold our hand for the moment in the interests of not rocking the boat in the midst of a difficult passage. On the other hand we will have to beware of getting into the dreary situation of complete frustration such as has overtaken our friends the Swiss and Swedes in Korea.

13. These things may look very different to you on the spot. It is very difficult for us here to estimate the difficulties with which the teams have to cope. We would certainly not want to make any firm recommendations without getting your views. It is because our ideas remain so inchoate that I am sending them to you in this tentative way. If possible, you might let me have the gist of your preliminary views by telegram as we should not delay our decisions too long. As the fate of the Vietnam Commission will inevitably affect the Commissions in Laos and if it still remains Cambodia, I am sending copies to Paul [Bridle] and Arnold [Smith] as well.

Yours sincerely,
J.W. HOLMES

REPORT OF MINISTER'S DISCUSSION WITH KRISHNA MENON IN NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1956

Krishna Menon called on the Minister in New York on March 29. He had arranged to do so at the request of Mr. Nehru, in order to discuss the position of the Commissions in Indo-China. Mr. Holmes was also present.

On Indo-Chinese matters Mr. Menon talked, on the whole, with sense and balance. On several other subjects which were raised, however, he indulged in hyperbolic generalization of the kind which is probably not intended to be taken literally. He began, for example, by announcing the assumption that disarmament had become a dead issue. The basis of his pessimism was the limited nature of both the United States and the Soviet proposals, neither of which he seemed to understand very accurately, and in particular the fact that they ignored nuclear disarmament. He did not seem prepared to accept the argument that the limited nature of both American and Soviet proposals was evidence of a more serious intention than previously to get started on preliminary but concrete steps toward disarmament.

Mr. Menon flitted over the Middle East situation, implying sympathetic disapproval of British policy. He was worried over India's position if Cyprus came before the U.N. Assembly. He condemned the Baghdad Pact and S.E.A.T.O., spoke of Pakistani provocation, but said that India would have been prepared to say nothing about the Baghdad Pact if Selwyn Lloyd had not, after the Karachi meeting, promoted it so loudly. He agreed with Mr. Pearson that it was mistaken to attempt to extend the Pact to countries away from the Soviet border as it would be merely interpreted as an effort to split the Arab world. The Templer intervention in Jordan had been an unhappy illustration of this. He professed to believe that the Americans were in the last few months relying more and more on S.E.A.T.O. in South East Asia, but he was told that our impression was exactly the reverse. Mr. Pearson told him that Mr. Dulles, in his review of his trip at White Sulphur Springs, had never once mentioned S.E.A.T.O. but had talked almost exclusively of the need to understand and encourage the new countries of Asia.

There was some discussion of the opening date of the U.N. Assembly in which Mr. Menon voiced objection in principle to postponing the Assembly because of the U.S. elections and complained of the expense involved. Mr. Pearson said it need not cost more, as there was no need for more than a very brief holiday over Christmas. He did not think that Canada should in the first place support the postponing of the opening date although he recognized that we should probably have to accept the change. Mr. Menon said that if India and Canada took a stand against it, some others would agree. He and Mr. Pearson discussed the possibility of accepting the convention that every four years the Assembly should meet away from the United States and that the year to be absent might well be the year of the presidential elections but not necessarily tied to this.

When the sending of arms to Pakistan was mentioned, Mr. Pearson said he understood India had been looking into the purchase of CF-100's from Canada. Mr. Menon claimed credit for putting up this idea to his government. He said it was a question of choosing between the British Hawker-Hunter, the French Mystère, or the CF-100. They did not want to go outside the "Commonwealth system" for supplies. He made no other mention of possible purchase from the U.S.S.R. When Mr. Pearson said that we would be glad to consider enquiries but were not anxious to solicit orders in competition with the British, Mr. Menon said that the Hawker-Siddeley people already had a man in India seeking business.

Mr. Menon spoke rather bitterly about the negotiations in Washington on the Atomic Agency. He made cynical remarks about the American announcement about making material available on the eve of the meeting, talked of the Western powers settling everything to their own satisfaction in caucus, and expressed doubt that India would participate. He said India could not accept the special position of the major powers and went on to say that although the insistence on control was ostensibly for reasons of security, it was really intended to prevent the economic development of countries like India. When he was vigorously challenged in this assumption by Mr. Pearson, who expressed his full understanding of the apparent inequitable position, he said that of course Canada naturally saw things from the same point of view as the major powers because we had not the experience of being on the other side economically as "hewers of wood and drawers of water": in rebuttal he was given some contemporary information to put him straight on Canadian economic history.

On the problems facing the Commission in Vietnam, Mr. Menon spoke in terms quite similar to those we have used. He did not insist on formal assumption by Diem of the French role, but he emphasized the importance to both of us of adequate responsibility being accepted. He seemed to realize that there were limitations to what Diem would accept, but he was inclined to insist on Diem going farther than we have reason to believe he would. He was not very precise on what exactly he wanted from Diem, but he indicated that the kind of unilateral declaration the British Ambassador was pressing him to issue would not be good enough. It would lead to a permanent division of this country. Any arrangement made must be acceptable to both sides. "It must have two legs". It must provide for continuance of the cease-fire arrangements, and it must also include some promise concerning discussions leading to elections. This latter could be the setting of a date for elections one or two years hence or at least for further consideration of elections at that time. He spoke of possible agreement on contact between the two sides, but didn't seem to insist on this. It was not clear just what he had in mind precisely except that the continuance of the Commission must be related to some provision for eventual fulfilment of the provision for elections. He did not see how India or Canada could agree to go on otherwise, as we would be committed to a task without any foreseeable conclusion.

Mr. Pearson agreed that there must be a firm assumption of responsibility for the cease-fire arrangements by the South, in agreement with the French. He was sure that the Americans and British were putting steady pressure on Diem to accept some sensible provision. He agreed that we could not accept an indefinite commitment to carry on in a divided country in a situation in which the political provisions of the Geneva Agreement are abandoned. Mr. Holmes said that it would be proper for the Co-Chairmen to make stipulations concerning the electoral provisions; it would be inconsistent, however, for Canada, in its role as a member of the Commission, to give the impression that we were insisting that Diem should take action with regard to elections, as we had always maintained that the fulfilment of the provisions of the Final Declarations were not the responsibility of the Commission. Mr. Pearson indicated that we might, however, legitimately take into account the relation of the political provisions to the scope and length of the Commission's task.

Mr. Menon was firm in his view that the Commission should remain, as it was the only thing which could prevent the situation from deteriorating. He spoke of the danger of collapse in the South because of Viet Minh sympathizers, the sects, and warlords, emphasizing divisive influence which were not necessarily based on ideology. He spoke of persons like Tran Van Hu, who were opposed to Diem but not pro-Viet Minh, although they were in favour of negotiating with the North. He did not say whether he approved of such people. He did say, however, there had been proposals that they visit India but India would have nothing to do with them. His estimate of the security position in the South seemed a few months out of date. He spoke of Diem with no enthusiasm, but it could not be said that he showed any indication of writing off either him or South Vietnam. As for the North, he said little either for or against. He implied that the Northern region was more widely accepted than the Southern, but he did not argue strongly when he was told with some vehemence the Canadian impression of the state of freedom in the North.

Mr. Holmes said that those on our side who were very directly concerned with the work of the Commission were worried over the fact that the Commission was frustrated in its efforts to carry out virtually all its remaining functions. It was all very well to talk about the importance of the Commission carrying on, but it was not operating very successfully at the present time. One of the reasons was certainly the lack of co-operation from the South, but we had also had continuous frustration from the Viet Minh, to be seen most clearly in their behaviour towards the teams on the Northern border. Mr. Menon said he had got the impression from Mr. Desai that the Commission was working all right, but he seemed to have very little knowledge of the realities of 14 (c), for instance. He was given a firm statement of our views on the inequity of 14(c) as between North and South.

One aspect of the subject on which there was complete agreement was that we should have nothing to do with any suggestions that the I.S.C. should take over the role of the Joint Commissions. This would make the I.S.C. a functional rather than a supervisory body, and Vietnam would have the status of an occupied country. Neither India nor Canada was prepared to consider sending the forces required for this purpose.

On Cambodia, Mr. Pearson said that we were getting out and had no intention of staying beyond this Spring. There was nothing further for the Commission to do, and we must leave. He was not pleased with the recent behaviour of Sihanouk and we did not want to become involved in his unstable policies. Mr. Menon agreed that there was nothing to do but said we could not abruptly pull out because of the connexion established between the tenure of the Cambodian Commission and the settlement in Vietnam. He thought there was a good chance that the Communists would agree to the withdrawal of this Commission but if they didn't we should at least maintain a token Commission in order not to break the structure of Geneva. This token might be represented by a diplomatic mission or even by someone in the Vietnam Commission, if necessary. Mr. Pearson said we might consider a token arrangement but only if it did not involve the maintenance of bodies in Cambodia.

Nothing at all was said about Laos.

Mr. Menon said that he would be talking to Mr. Lloyd in London at the beginning of next week and agreed to report to Mr. Robertson on the conversations.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 9, 1956

VIETNAM — WITHDRAWAL OF THE FRENCH EXPEDITIONARY CORPS

On April 3 the South Vietnamese Government sent to the United Kingdom a note on this subject, the text of which we have received from Earnscliffe in CRO telegram No. 654 of April 3 (copy attached). The substance of this note was made public in Saigon on April 6.[19]

The United Kingdom has been trying for some time to get from the Diem Government a statement to the effect that it would carry out the terms of the Cease Fire Agreement after the dissolution of the French High Command. While it was expected that the Diem Government would probably not agree to accept responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement as legal successors to the French High Command, it was hoped that the Diem Government would accept de facto responsibilities in a manner which might obscure or gloss over their refusal to accept full legal responsibilities. You will note, however, that the statement falls short even of this, and the Diem Government has undertaken only to "uphold existing conditions of the present state of peace".

While the nature of the declaration was under discussion between the British and the South Vietnamese we informed the British that a declaration along the lines contemplated

[19] La note du Vietnam du Sud est reproduite dans Documents relating to British Involvement in the Indo-China Conflict, 1945-1965, Document 49, pp. 95-96.
The South Vietnamese note is reprinted in Documents relating to British Involvement in the Indo-China Conflict, 1945-1965, Document 49, pp. 95-96.

would probably not serve to meet the requirements of the situation, since it would involve, with the dissolution of the French High Command, the disappearance of a legally responsible party to the Cease Fire Agreement in the South. After receiving the text of the declaration late last week, we sent off comments on the Diem declaration to London for transmission to the Foreign Office indicating our view that the declaration was unsatisfactory (see our telegram No. Y538 of April 6, Copy attached).

The United Kingdom recognized that the declaration would probably not be satisfactory to us or the Indians, and have instructed their ambassador in Saigon to try to obtain from Diem a confidential letter which would state his declaration really meant that he was prepared to carry out the remaining obligations under the Cease Fire Agreement. While it has been the intention that the contents of this letter might be made known to Mr. Gromyko if necessary, it now appears unlikely that the Vietnamese would permit its use in this way. The letter, therefore, would be merely for the reassurance of ourselves and the Indians.

On Wednesday, April 11, Lord Reading will begin consultations with Mr. Gromyko concerning Vietnam, and is faced with the rather difficult task of persuading him that the Diem declaration is an adequate basis for maintaining the Cease Fire Agreement in Vietnam. To assist him in this the United Kingdom are seeking from us and from the Indians some statement which will indicate that we are satisfied that the declaration will do for this purpose and will enable the International Commission to carry on its functions. We have no precise information as to how an opinion from us is likely to be used in the Reading-Gromyko conversations.

We have informed Earnscliffe that we cannot baldly state that the Diem declaration "provides an adequate basis for maintaining the Cease Fire Agreement" but that we would try to devise some formula that might be of assistance to Lord Reading in his talks. We have also suggested that in the opening phases of his discussions with Gromyko, he might propose that the Co-Chairmen send a message to the Commission (in response to their request for directions in view of the forthcoming dissolution of the French High Command) requesting it to continue its supervisory task pending the outcome of the discussions. This temporary mandate to the Commission should serve to avoid difficulties arising from that quarter for the time being and might enable it to carry on an ad hoc basis for some time.

Attached for your approval if you agree is a telegram to London[20] giving the formula which Lord Reading might use in his conversations with Mr. Gromyko in referring to our view of the Diem declaration. If this is to reach Lord Reading prior to his conversations with Mr. Gromyko, the telegram should be despatched from Ottawa by noon April 10.

VIETNAM — PROPOSED DECLARATION BY DIEM

We have seen the proposed Diem declaration and do not find it satisfactory, since it does not provide for de jure or de facto acceptance of responsibilities under the Cease Fire Agreement, and points inevitably to the conclusion that with the dissolution of the French High Command there will no longer be a legally responsible party in the South. We would be surprised if the Indians should find it acceptable, and even more surprised if the Russians and the Viet Minh should do so.

2. The assurances in the supplementary confidential letter would go a long way towards meeting our own preoccupations. The party who really requires written assurances, however, is the Viet Minh, and we find it hard to believe that they or the Russians would be satisfied with the sort of verbal assurances contemplated, even if they were informed of the existence and content of the confidential letter.

3. Following what we would expect to be an initial refusal by the USSR and the Viet Minh to accept the Diem declaration and supplementary verbal assurances as a satisfactory basis for continuation of the armistice, there may be a period — possibly quite lengthy and almost certainly extending well beyond the dissolution of the French High Command — during which further UK-USSR discussions and possibly consultations with the Geneva Conference Powers will take place. For the duration of this period the Commission will presumably be expected to carry on its work on an ad hoc basis. We are willing to attempt this provided the Poles and Indians will do likewise, though it may be necessary in this connection for the Co-Chairmen formally to request the Commission to do so. This could be done in response to the communication which the Commission is planning to send to the Co-Chairmen advising them of the notification it receives concerning the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps and requesting directions.

4. If during this ad hoc period, while negotiations are nursed along for the achievement of a more permanent armistice régime, the South Vietnamese put on a convincing display of practical cooperation it may be possible to avoid serious trouble for some little time. Nothing would contribute more to the possibility of a comparatively stable ad hoc period than a convincing demonstration now of South Vietnamese cooperation. If as an earnest of their good intentions the Diem Government could be persuaded to clear up a number of outstanding cases and to permit some of the many stalled investigations to get under way within the next two or three weeks it would, in conjunction with the public declaration, undoubtedly go a long way towards convincing our colleagues on the Commission that it may be possible to make the armistice work in spite of the obduracy of the South Vietnamese on the question of legal responsibilities. Solid evidence of cooperation would be particularly valuable in connection with the Indians, who have recently shown themselves prepared to forgive a good deal on the legal side provided there is practical cooperation.

5. It will also be most important that during the ad hoc period the South Vietnamese avoid at all costs raising objections of principles i.e. that they should never refuse to take action required of them by the Commission on the grounds that they are not party to the Cease Fire Agreement and are not bound by its terms. If the South Vietnamese were ever to adopt this line, attention would inevitably focus on the impossibility of operating an armistice without a legally responsible and committed party in the South, and the Commission would have no alternative but to pass the problems on to the Co-Chairmen. The theme of the final paragraphs of the Fourth Interim Report — that the Commission cannot continue on this unsatisfactory basis — would quickly be revived.
Please pass the foregoing views to the Foreign Office.

For Washington: You may relay the foregoing to the State Department, pointing out that the United States advice to the South Vietnamese could be particularly helpful in connection with paragraphs 4 and 5.

INTRODUCTION OF MILITARY PERSONNEL AND EQUIPMENT INTO SOUTH VIETNAM

1. At the request of Mr. Kenneth Young of the United States State Department, our Saigon representative had a conversation with him on April 6 about this subject.

2. With respect to the PAVN letter of February 29, it seems clear from this discussion that the United States (despite our reiterated plea that all possible cooperation was necessary if we wished to be in a position to counter PAVN allegations of violation of Articles 16 and 17) did not intend to offer any comments on the letter nor would they provide any information which might be of assistance.

3. Gauvin remarked to Young that it was essential we obtain all cooperation possible from the United States if we were to be able to properly counteract the PAVN allegations of violations by the South of Article 16 and 17. Otherwise the French might be cited for violation in the next interim report and, Gauvin added, that everyone would know that it was not really the French who were responsible but South Vietnam and that the United States might be mentioned as an accessory to the violation.

4. Apparently this did not move Young who made the obvious but not very helpful reply that neither the South nor the United States had signed the Geneva Agreement and that at any rate the North had violated and would continue to violate Articles 16 and 17. Gauvin then pointed out:

(a) that whatever one may suspect, the Commission had at no time been able to find the North guilty of violations of these articles,

(b) most allegations of violations had been and undoubtedly would continue to be directed against the South,

(c) many of the PAVN allegations had been possible solely because there existed no satisfactory procedure in the South for informing the Commission concerning the entry of military personnel and equipment.

5. Young then stated that the United States had no objection to the Commission being notified by either the South Vietnamese or by the French: but our representative pointed out that no information had been forthcoming from the Vietnamese. Perhaps this was caused by the fact that they were holding up this information since the French had not furnished them with details on the material which had gone out of Indochina in the past. In the result this left the way open for the PAVN to press extravagant charges as they had in the past. In concluding the interview, Young said, he was glad to know our views but made no promise that they would impress on the Vietnamese the necessity of furnishing the Commission with the necessary information.

VIETNAM — DIEM DECLARATION

In telegram No. 689 of April 7 CRO has requested Earnscliffe to obtain from us an indication of our views that the Diem declaration of April 3 provides an adequate basis for maintaining the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam after the dissolution of the French Union High Command on April 28 and that it will enable International Supervisory Commission to continue its task of supervising the provisions of this Agreement — this to assist Lord Reading in his talks with Mr. Gromyko on April 11.

2. We have told Earnscliffe that for the reasons set out in our telegram under reference we could not go that far, but that we would endeavour to devise a formula that might be of help on the assumption that the South Vietnamese produce the confidential letter of assurances along the lines now being sought by the UK Embassy in Saigon. Provided these assurances are received, we would have no objection to Lord Reading describing Canadian views to Mr. Gromyko in the following terms:

We assume that pending consideration of the French notice of the withdrawal of the French Expeditionary Corps (copy of which has been referred to the Co-Chairmen) the Co-Chairmen will wish the Commission to carry on its supervisory task, and will be notifying the Commission to this effect. In the present circumstances we think that the Diem declaration can provide a basis for maintaining the Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam after the dissolution of the French Union High Command on April 28, and on the assumption that the effective cooperation promised by the Vietnamese Government enables the Commission to carry out its functions and if similar cooperation is extended by the Democratic Republic, we are hopeful that the International Commission will be able to continue its tasks of supervising the carrying out of the provisions of the Armistice Agreement.

VIETNAM — DECLARATION BY DIEM

Kattenburg at the Vietnam desk in the State Department told us on April 11 that a US response had been made to the second UK démarche concerning Diem's declaration which was dealt with in our telegram under reference.

2. Kattenburg explained that it had not been possible for the US Government to give the kind of affirmative statement which the UK démarche had requested. The US wished to be as cooperative as it could but did not feel it could in this instance go too far beyond the position which the Diem Government itself was prepared to take in the matter of the assumption of responsibilities for the Cease Fire Agreement.

3. The US response therefore had been along the following lines. The State Department indicated that the US Government regarded the Vietnamese declaration as a great step forward and as evidence of the Vietnamese Government's intention to cooperate with the free world in the maintenance of peace in the area. It was further the view of the US that the Vietnamese Government's expression of willingness to continue effective cooperation with the ICC, its willingness to assure the security of the Commission members, and its willingness to facilitate the activities of the Commission should enable the Commission to continue its task of supervising the armistice in Vietnam.

3. Kattenburg went on to say that the State Department had been particularly impressed with the Canadian views contained in your telegram Y635 of April 6, a copy of which we had left with the State Department on April 9. The State Department wished you to know it was seriously considering an approach to Diem on the basis of the ideas contained in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your telegram Y635. The main purpose of such an approach, if it were made, would be to recommend to the Vietnamese "a convincing display of practical cooperation" towards the Commission. Kattenburg said that he had already "hinted" to the UK Embassy that the State Department might find it possible to take an action on the basis of Canadian views which it had not been possible to agree to on the basis of the UK démarche. Kattenburg said he would let us know if and when a decision in this respect were taken.

4. The latest development in this complicated subject, according to Kattenburg, was that the South Vietnamese had given the UK Ambassador in Saigon on April 10 a confidential "letter of clarification" which went some way towards meeting UK desires. Kattenburg read the text of this further letter to us quickly and, since we assume that you will be getting its full text from the UK, we shall not attempt to summarize what may be our imperfect understanding of it. We noted, however, that it did contain two difficult points in that,

(a) it said once again that the South Vietnamese Government did not recognize the Geneva Agreement and

(b) it contained a flat statement that in the South Vietnamese view the Joint Commission "ceases to exist of its own accord because of the dissolution of the French High Command".

5. We are inclined to believe that the State Department showed particular interest in Canadian views because they provide an easier basis for US representations to Diem than did the UK démarches. We did not fail to remind Kattenburg that Canadian thinking on this matter is tied to the gaining of further assurances from Diem than those contained in his letter of April 3 to the UK Ambassador.

6. We took the opportunity presented by our discussion to let the State Department know of your response to the UK contained in telegram Y659 of April 10.

VIETNAM: INTRODUCTION OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT AND PERSONNEL

We are very pleased indeed to note that the State Department is actively interested in the idea of promoting a convincing display of practical cooperation towards the Commission on the part of the South Vietnamese. The problem of notification of movements of term and MAAG personnel is particularly relevant in this connection, and to encourage the State Department to come further along the road towards cooperation on this subject, we think it would be a good idea to leave with them a memorandum on this subject, along the following lines:

(1) If maximum advantage is to be gained from the willingness of the South Vietnamese to extend effective cooperation to the Commission to the end of keeping the armistice operating in a practical way, action will be required by the Vietnamese on outstanding cases where satisfactory answers to Commission entries have not been forthcoming or full performance of the provisions of the Agreement has been lacking as well as on new business which may develop in the future. In the Commission the cooperation of the South is likely to be judged as much on their handling of the existing backlog and making amends for past omissions as on their disposal of new cases. It will be difficult, of course, to explain away the absence of notification of movements of MAAG personnel in the past, but on the other hand if this is done now by the Vietnamese at a time when they are taking over practical responsibility for the implementation of Article 16(f) it will demonstrate very readily their willingness to give effect in a practical way to their promise of cooperation. In connection with this issue particularly it will be important for the South Vietnamese not to question their legal obligation to provide such information or to suggest that the fact that they are not signatories to the agreement explains the absence of notifications in the past.

(2) In the past we have been successful in frustrating PAVN attempts to get Commission support for broad propaganda charges against the South. The PAVN letter of February 29, however, which purports to adduce specific evidence of the violation of Article 16 in the South through the introduction of United States military personnel, cannot be dealt with in the same summary fashion as the earlier PAVN charges. It will be difficult to dispose of it in the Commission if the Commission is not provided with accurate information on the basis of which the PAVN charges can be refuted.

(3) We are sympathetic to United States misgivings arising out of the fact that it is easier for violations of Articles 16 and 17 to go undetected in the North than in the South. We are, of course, watching for any evidence of violations in the North, but up to the present it has not been possible to detect any actual outright violations. If the State Department has any new information we would be interested to hear of it. We are aware of the evidence that does exist of Viet Minh imports of arms during the period July-November 1954, and also know that French estimates of the existence of lightly armoured Viet Minh regiments and British deductions based on the size and nature of existing Viet Minh formations point to the presumptive conclusion that further illegal imports have taken place. We are hopeful that negative evidence arising out of Viet Minh obstruction of inspection team operations may some time enable us to suggest some of these presumptive conclusions in the Commission in the same sort of way as we were able to exploit negative evidence of this kind concerning Viet Minh frustration of freedom of movement in the Fourth Interim Report. The possibility of achieving any success on this line however will be ruled out entirely if there is much better presumptive evidence of evasion of the provisions of Articles 16 and 17 in the South, which will be the case if MAAG movements continue to take place without notification to the Commission by the authorities in the South.

(4) We welcome the United States decision in connection with TERM to comply with the notification procedures required by the Commission, and hope that they will see their way clear towards dealing with MAAG on the same basis. So far as the Commission is concerned, there is little doubt that the two cases will be regarded as the same in principle. It would not be understood if the procedures applied in the case of TERM were not also applied with respect to MAAG, and the advantage gained through the correct handling of the TERM personnel might be cancelled out if the PAVN were able to continue exploiting the MAAG situation.

15. DEVELOPMENTS IN THE VIETNAMESE SITUATION

Far Eastern Division: The two representatives of the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference, Lord Reading and Mr. Gromyko, who have been meeting in London, have concluded their discussions on the current difficulties in Vietnam arising from the withdrawal at the end of April of the French High Command. Before the conclusion of the discussions, they agreed upon the texts of messages to be sent to the International Supervisory Commission, the governments of North and South Vietnam and the French government. These letters, which were published May 10,[21] may well form the basis for some time to come for the continued implementation of the Cease-Fire Agreement.

The Co-Chairmen in their letter to the French government requested the continued good offices of the French in South Vietnam and asked that the French government negotiate with the South Vietnamese to reach an arrangement that will "facilitate the tasks" of the Commission itself and of the Joint Commission. (The Joint Commission consists of representatives of the two parties to the Cease-Fire Agreement and is responsible for facilitating the implementation of certain provisions of the Agreement. The South has so far refused to take over the French responsibilities on the Joint Commission.)

In their letter to the governments of North and South Vietnam the Co-Chairmen asked that "all possible assistance" be given the Commission in surmounting the difficulties arising from the French withdrawal. They also invited the views of each government on a time-schedule for consultations on, and the organization of, nation-wide elections for Vietnam.

In writing to the Commission the Co-Chairmen simply urged that the Commission persevere in its efforts to maintain and strengthen the peace in Vietnam on the basis of the Geneva Agreements and with a view to the reunification of the country through free, nation-wide elections. It further expressed the hope that many difficulties will in practice be removed, and suggested that those which cannot be resolved on the spot might be referred to the Co-Chairmen for further consideration.

The Commission itself has been wrestling with the problem of continuing its normal activities with no legally responsible party in the South and amid a disagreement within the Commission as to how many of its normal activities can be carried on without a functioning Joint Commission. As a result, two separate letters were sent to the Co-Chairmen on May 2, one from the Canadian Delegation supporting a flexible approach by the Commission to the technical and legal difficulties confronting it, and a majority message (Indians and Poles) pointing out specific difficulties arising from the lack of a working Joint Commission and asking the Co-Chairmen to find a solution.[22]

[22] Ces deux lettres n'ont pas été publiées. La lettre canadienne était basée sur les vues exprimées dans le document 634.
These two letters have not been published. The Canadian letter was based on the views expressed in Document 634.

The Co-Chairmen had received these two messages while the texts of their own letters were still under consideration but because of basic differences their reply did not give specific instructions for the solution of the problems cited in the Commission's letter. The deliberate vagueness of the instructions to the Commission (which ignore the legal and technical issues involved) implies, however, a request that the Commission take the initiative in finding practical solutions which would form a workable basis for the continued implementation of the Cease-Fire Agreement.

During the course of the discussions the United Kingdom representative persuaded the Soviet Co-Chairman to abandon the general communist demand for the calling of a new Geneva Conference on Indochina; an idea that has been steadily opposed by all the non-communist countries. To achieve this the British Co-Chairman was forced to compromise on the election issue and to allow the reference to North-South consultations on nation-wide elections in the letter to the two Vietnamese governments. The messages from the Co-Chairmen also implied the recognition by the Russians of the Diem government as spokesman for the South and gave evidence of Russian support for the emphasis on the continued maintenance of the Cease-Fire in Vietnam. VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

The three Commissioners met privately today for a preliminary exchange of views about the three messages received from the Co-Chairmen. The Chairman received these messages from Delhi this morning. We had advance information about them yesterday from the United Kingdom Ambassador in Saigon.

2. Parthasarathi opened the discussion by asking me what action I thought the Commission should take. I spoke along the following lines:

(a) It is clear from the Co-Chairmen's messages that they expect the Commission to continue its normal activities during this interim period;

(b) From the penultimate paragraph of the message to the Commission it seems clear that the Co-Chairmen expect the Commission to make practical decisions to deal with difficulties as they arise and only refer to the Co-Chairmen difficulties which cannot be settled on the spot;

(c) Hence the Commission should at once resume its normal activities and deal with all pending items on the agenda. No message from the Commission to the Co-Chairmen was required at this time. If the Commission found that in practice it could not resolve some issue then that issue should be referred to the Co-Chairmen for consideration.

3. Parthasarathi said that he would require instructions from his government. His tentative views were that the Commission should send a message to the Co-Chairmen giving its interpretation of the Co-Chairmen's directions. This message might be along the following lines:

(a) The Commission would note that the Co-Chairman had requested it to carry on its activities on the basis of the Geneva Agreements;

(b) The Commission would also note that the Co-Chairmen have requested the authorities in the North and the South to carry out the provisions of both the Cease Fire Agreement and the political settlement and to give effective cooperation to the Commission;

(c) Some reference would have to be made to the fact that the Joint Commission was not functioning and that steps should be taken to make it operative;

(d) The note would refer to the last paragraph of the message to the French Government and conclude by saying that the Commission interpreted the Co-Chairmen's messages as a directive to proceed during the interim period on the basis of the status quo which existed before April 28, i.e. that the Commission could continue to deal with the French after April 28 as the "responsible party in the South".

4. Parthasarathi went some way to meeting expected French objections by saying that he would not insist upon the French formally acknowledging that they continue to be the legal party in the South. We would be satisfied with some phrase in the note which would indicate that the Commission would continue to address its communications to the French on the assumption that they were the responsible party in the South during the interim period.

5. I then asked Parthasarathi if he would agree that the Commission should, as from today, deal with the items on our agenda, pending the drafting of a message to the Co-Chairmen and pending any reply from them. You will see from my telegram 133 May 8† that the Commission has not since April 28 dealt with routine items on its agenda. There is now a backlog of about 65 items. Parthasarathi said that he would have to await instructions before he could deal with this point. He thought that the Commission, before dealing with routine items, should at least have agreed on a message to the Co-Chairmen giving the Commission interpretation of the Co-Chairmen's instructions. It might even be necessary to await a reply from the Co-Chairmen confirming the Commission's interpretation.

6. The Pole thought that the Commission should at once send a message to the Co-Chairmen along the lines sketched by Parthasarathi. He would, however, agree that once the Commissioners had settled on the text of a message to the Co-Chairmen the Commission should resume its normal activities without waiting for a reply. Michalowski thought that the Commission's message should make it clear that during the interim period the Commission considers the French to be the responsible party and that after the interim period the Commission considers that it can continue only on the basis that the South is the responsible party.

7. A meeting of the Commission has been agreed for tomorrow. Parthasarathi would hope to make a short statement saying that the Commission had taken note of the Co-Chairmen's communications and that the Commissioners were considering what action should be taken.

8. I added that I might wish to make a short statement to the effect that the Canadian delegation thinks that the Commission, on the basis of the Co-Chairmen's communications, should now deal with standing items on the agenda.

9. We should be grateful to have your instructions as a matter of urgency. Because of the views of my two colleagues, it seems inevitable that the Commission will send another note to the Co-Chairmen and that at least until this message is sent the Commission will deal only with urgent matters. Hence the sooner a message is drafted to the Co-Chairmen the quicker the Commission will resume normal activities. My objection to Parthasarathi's suggested message to the Co-Chairmen is that if the French reply to the Co-Chairmen's message by saying that they will offer their "bons offices" but accept no legal responsibility, then the arrangements for the interim period would break down. However I am not quite sure what the Co-Chairmen meant by asking the French Government during the interim period to preserve the status quo. If the Co-Chairmen meant that the French should continue to be legally responsible for the execution of the Cease Fire Agreement, including representation on the Joint Commission, and if the French agree, then of course there is no difficulty.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

You are entirely correct in continuing to press the view that the Commission should get on with its routine tasks. We are disturbed that your colleagues should be insisting on a further message to the Co-Chairmen, which in our view is unnecessary and may prove harmful. The present messages from the Co-Chairmen represent the maximum agreement attainable at present, and it might take weeks to get anything further from them: it would be dangerous for the Commission to discontinue its normal work whilst awaiting a further reply. If your colleagues insist that a message must be agreed upon before normal activities are resumed, you may go along with them provided you are satisfied that it is quite innocuous, but you should not hesitate to hold matters up for reference to Ottawa if you think the message might cause difficulties.

2. The trouble with such a message is that the Poles and Indians may continue their attempt to use the Joint Commission problem as a means of seeking to force a clear definition of the identity of the "responsible" party, whereas the success of the present venture probably lies in keeping this point obscure. Accordingly we suggest that you resist attempts to have this matter clearly set out in any message which your colleagues insist upon sending. The Commission should simply proceed on the assumption that communications sent to the authorities in the South will be acted on in a responsible manner. By empirical means the Commission will (we hope) thereby find out that there is in fact a responsible party in the South, even if it refuses to identify itself as such.

3. The Foreign Office has indicated in a message to Stephenson that in paragraph 4 of the message from the Co-Chairmen to the French Government, the reference to preserving the status quo should be interpreted to mean preserving the status quo on the date of the message until the French and Vietnamese have reached agreement on arrangements acceptable to the International Commission, and that it is hoped that this might only be a matter of days. It is important that the Commission should be as cooperative as possible on this score and that it should not insist on arrangements so precise on their legality as to force a breakdown. It is most important that the Poles should not be enabled to exploit differences between the French and the Vietnamese and that the Indians be induced to take a practical rather than a legalistic approach, keeping in mind the necessity of making the new arrangements work, or at least of giving them a fair trial.

4. We have instructed London to pass your telegram under reference to the Foreign Office, in the hope that their representations in New Delhi will succeed in inducing the Indians to take a more forthcoming and practical approach to the situation.

For London: You may inform the Foreign Office of the foregoing.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

Parthasarathi's draft message appears to represent no advance over the majority Commission note of May 2 to the Co-Chairmen and is in effect a further attempt to secure recognition of the Indian-Polish conditions for the resumption of Commission activities. As the Co-Chairmen are unlikely to take any action on this note it will in effect be a communication to the French, as indicated in paragraph 2 of your 142. In view of this we are concerned about the last sentence of Parthasarathi's paragraph 4, which seems to imply continuing French responsibility in so clear a manner as to invite a French disclaimer and hence a further delay in the resumption of the Commission's normal activities. We would have no objection to your delaying agreement to any message drafted in these terms in the hope that UK representations in New Delhi will result in instructions to Parthasarathi to adopt a more forthcoming attitude.

2. Parthasarathi's draft makes no reference to the arrangements which the Co-Chairmen have invited the French to work out with the Vietnamese, and the reference to the status quo implies that this is the only basis on which the Commission is prepared to continue functioning. There is no justification in the Co-Chairmen's message to the Commission for such an attitude, since the Co-Chairmen merely expressed the hope that the Commission would persevere in its efforts to maintain and strengthen peace in Vietnam, without attaching any conditions or provisos of this kind.

3. We would not wish the Commission to plunge itself into another crisis like the present one when the French and Vietnamese have worked out their arrangements for facilitating the work of the International Commission and the Joint Commission. Accordingly we think the message should indicate that both during the interim period of the status quo and subsequently under such new arrangements as the French and Vietnamese may work out the Commission will persevere in its efforts to maintain and strengthen peace. If the arrangements prove in practice to be unsatisfactory the Commission will still be in a position to refer its troubles to the Co-Chairmen in accordance with the their standing invitation.

4. We agree with your support for a short message (if a message is unavoidable) and regard paragraphs 2 and 3 as unnecessary. We would like to see paragraph 4 amended along the lines suggested above and agree to your suggested change in paragraph 5. We see no strong objection to the language employed in the introductory sentences of paragraphs 3 and 4.

5. We suggest you keep in close touch with UK offices in Hanoi or Saigon to keep posted on success of UK representations in New Delhi.

For London: Please inform Foreign Office of telegrams under reference and this reply.

For New Delhi: You may inform UK High Commissioner's Office of telegrams under reference and this reply. If you think it might be helpful you may at your discretion support UK representations to the Indians.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

My immediately following telegram contains the text of a revised Indian draft message which Parthasarathi would like to send to the Co-Chairmen. This text has been approved by New Delhi. The Acting Polish Commissioner has not indicated whether he will be able to support the revised text.

2. Parthasarathi is anxious to deal with this message on Thursday, May 17th.

3. As you will note, the new text is a considerable improvement on the text which we sent you in our telegram 141 of May 11th.† The operative sections of the message follow more closely the language of the message from the Co-Chairmen to the Commission.

4. The final paragraph of the revised text informs the Co-Chairmen that the Commission has forwarded a copy of this message to the French authorities in South Vietnam informing them that the Commission will continue to deal with them as hitherto. Parthasarathi asked me to explain to you that since the Co-Chairmen asked the French to preserve the status quo pending the working out of solutions to the practical problems, the Commission, in telling the Co-Chairmen that it will continue to deal with the French, is only following the instructions of the Co-Chairmen.

5. In paragraph 3 of your telegram Y159 of May 12 you gave us the interpretation which the Foreign Office has placed on the term status quo. Parthasarathi seems to be under the impression that the status quo refers to the situation as at April 28. I have not (repeat not) disabused him of this. I infer from what he has said that from his point of view, when the Commission deals with the French during this interim period, it is doing so on the understanding that the French are the responsible party. This point, however, is not made clear in the revised Indian note and from our point of view there may be something to be said for leaving it vague. It seems to me that the important consideration is to get the Commission to resume its normal activities. Once the Commission has sent a message to the Co-Chairmen, Parthasarathi is prepared to have the Commission resume its normal work.

6. I would recommend that we go along with the revised Indian text. As long as the French did not inform the Commission that they are not dealing with the Commission on the basis of the status quo as at April 28, we should encounter no major difficulties. It would, I think, be difficult for Parthasarathi to have the Commission reverse gears once it had embarked on its normal activities.

7. I should appreciate as a matter of urgency and preferably before May 17th your instructions.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

Herewith text of new draft message to the Co-Chairmen which Parthasarathi has received from New Delhi.

"The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the communication dated May 9/56, from the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference and the copies of the messages sent by the Co-Chairmen of the Government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, Republic of Vietnam and to the French Government.

2. The International Commission notes that the Co-Chairmen have received the Commission's message dated May 2/56, and also the separate note of the same date from the Canadian member of the Commission.

3. The International Commission is grateful to the Co-Chairmen for their appreciation of the work performed by the Commission.

5. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam notes and places on record that the Co-Chairmen have communicated to the Commission that:

"(a) Reference to the holding of free general election for reunification of Vietnam, the two Co-Chairmen attach great importance to the maintenance of the cease-fire under the continued supervision of the International Commission for Vietnam;

"(b) they recognise that the dissolution of the French Union High Command has increased the difficulties of the International Truce Supervisory Commission in Vietnam in carrying out the functions specified in the Geneva Agreements which are the basis for the Commission's activities;

"(c) these difficulties must be overcome; and

"(d) the Co-Chairmen are confident that the authorities in both parts of Vietnam will show effective cooperation and that these difficulties in practice will be removed."

5. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam notes and records that "prompted by the desire to strengthen peace in Indochina on the basis of the principles and provisions of the Geneva Agreements, the Co-Chairmen have strongly urged that the authorities of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and those of the Republic of Vietnam

(i) to make every effort to implement the Geneva Agreements of Vietnam;

(ii) to prevent any future violation of military provisions of these agreements;

(iii) and also to ensure the implementation of the political provisions and principles embodied in the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference".

6. The International Commission further notes and records that "to this end the authorities of both parts of Vietnam are invited to transmit to the Co-Chairmen as soon as possible either jointly or separately their views about the time required for the opening of consultations on the organization of nation-wide elections in Vietnam, and the time required for holding of election as a means of achieving the unification of Vietnam".

7. The Commission further notes with appreciation that "the Co-Chairmen strongly urged the authorities in both parts of Vietnam to give the Commission all possible assistance in future in the exercise of their functions as defined by the Geneva Agreements on Vietnam".

8. The International Commission hopes that the authorities in both parts of Vietnam will respond fully to the urgent appeal of the Co-Chairmen and will undertake the obligations under the provisions of the Geneva Agreements and discharge them fully.

9. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam notes that the Co-Chairmen have informed the French Government that "they recognize that the dissolution of the French Union High Command has created problems for International Truce Supervisory Commission that requires serious attention" and have invited the French Government "to discuss this question with the authorities in South Vietnam with a view to reaching an arrangement that will facilitate the work of the International Truce Supervisory Commission and of the Joint Commission in Vietnam" and that the two Co-Chairmen have asked that "till arrangements envisaged above are put into effect the French Government should preserve the status quo."

10. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam will, as requested by the Co-Chairmen, "persevere in an effort to maintain and strengthen peace in Vietnam on the basis of the fulfilment of the Geneva Agreements on Vietnam with a view to the reunification of the countries through the holding of free nation-wide election in Vietnam under the supervision of an International Commission".

11. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam notes with appreciation the decision of the Co-Chairmen that they are to be informed "if the Commission encounters any obstacle or difficulty in their activities that cannot be resolved on the spot, the Co-Chairmen would be grateful to be informed so that they may consider whether any further measures are required to facilitate the work of the Commission".

12. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam has forwarded a copy of this message to the French authorities in South Vietnam informing them that the Commission will continue to deal with them as hitherto. A copy each has also been forwarded to the Government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and to the Government of the Republic of Vietnam". Text Ends.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

London's reply† to our telegram under reference indicates that Foreign Office do not know whether their representations in New Delhi are likely to result in any further modification of Indian draft message as reported in your 148. The UK agrees that some modification of paragraph 12 of the draft message is desirable, and have suggested the insertion of a phrase such as "for the time being" after the word "continue" in the first sentence of paragraph 12.

2. You might inform Parthasarathi that we continue to be of the view that the Commission's activities should be resumed without delay, but that we are willing to go along with the Indian proposal for message to the Co-Chairmen subject to some amendments to present draft. You might point out that we believe Co-Chairmen's message should enable Commission to carry on, dealing with the French for the present and dealing with the South Vietnamese as soon as the latter work out with the French arrangements for taking over direct contacts with Commission, — arrangements which the Co-Chairmen have urged the French to work out with the Vietnamese. The message must, in our view, at least leave open the prospect that Commission will carry on its functions in both circumstances. We recognize of course that Commission need not bind itself in advance to accept any arrangements worked out, and this is not what we are seeking; but we cannot accept a message which will cover only present interim period, which after all could be quite short.

3. Accordingly we suggest that last phrase of first sentence of paragraph 12 be amended to read "informing them that the Commission will continue to perform its supervisory functions, dealing with them for the time being until other arrangements are worked out for facilitating the work of the International Commission." Alternatively if the Indians decline this wording, we would be prepared to see phrase dropped entirely, so that last paragraph would read "the International Commission has forwarded a copy of this message to the French authorities in South Vietnam, to the Government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and to the Government of the Republic of Vietnam". As a minimum, if Indians insist on keeping present phrase in, we would be prepared to accept "informing them that the Commission will continue to deal with them for the time being".

4. It is not possible at this stage to envisage what sort of arrangements French and Vietnamese are likely to work out, but we doubt that there will be any clear cut shift of responsibilities. The most promising arrangements would be ad hoc ones introduced gradually, reaching a point where the Vietnamese are in fact doing all business direct with Commission. If this is what occurs, we would wish Commission's relations with representatives of Southern zone to continue unbroken, whether they are French or Vietnamese. We do not — and we are sure Co-Chairmen do not — want another crisis when the French drop entirely out of the picture.

5. You might tell Parthasarathi that we do not like any more than the Indians the rather muddled way things are working out, but as we see it Commission can make its best contribution to maintenance of peace by working towards practical solutions and avoiding trying to pin legal responsibility on governments that will not own it publicly. If Co-Chairmen are prepared to accept empirical solutions at this stage the Commission should at least be prepared to give them a fair trial.

6. Another amendment we would like to see made — though you need not insist on it — is to paragraph 8, last clause of which does not reflect any language in Co-Chairmen's messages and may provoke South Vietnamese into reiterating their well-known views, which at this stage might be unfortunate. We would like to see this amended to read "will respond fully to the urgent appeal of the Co-Chairmen and will make every effort to implement the Geneva Agreements on Vietnam".

7. We have just seen text of telegram 772 from UK High Commissioner in New Delhi to CRO (repeated to Saigon and Hanoi) which indicates that Desai thinks Commission before resuming normal activities should make clear to all parties basis on which it is prepared to continue and that he appreciates that interim period referred to in Co-Chairmen's message to French Government is intended to be short. There is nothing that suggests that he would object to amendments we have recommended above or that Indians want another agonizing reappraisal when the French and Vietnamese have worked out their arrangements. Accordingly you should press hard for the amendments: if Parthasarathi will not accept them or will not refer to New Delhi for further instructions you might tell him that we will be compelled to resort to a minority note again.

8. As procedure suggested in paragraph 12 of Parthasarathi's note will involve a note to the French, you will have to take care that it is drafted in such a way as to meet our position as outlined above.

For London: You may inform Foreign Office of the foregoing.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

1. Your telegram under reference was of great assistance to me. At a series of meetings yesterday with Parthasarathi I got him to agree to a revision of paragraph 12 of the revised Indian note (our telegram 148 of May 15) along the lines of the last sentence of your paragraph 3. I had told Parthasarathi that I would go along with a letter to Hoppenot, the substantive part of which would read "The International Commission will continue to deal with the French authorities in South Vietnam for the time being on the basis of the message from the Co-Chairmen to the French Government". Parthasarathi undertook to sell these to the Pole.

2. When I saw Parthasarathi at a social gathering last evening he told me that he was thinking of eliminating paragraph 12 in its entirety from the revised draft message.

3. This morning Parthasarathi asked me to see him and, when did, he gave me what he claimed to be proposals from Delhi for the revision of paragraphs 8 and 12 of the draft message. Delhi has amended paragraphs 8 and 12 as follows:

(a) Paragraph 8 delete all words following "Co-Chairmen"

(b) Paragraph 12 to read "The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam is forwarding a copy of this message to the French authorities in South Vietnam and also the authorities of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the Republic of Vietnam and will continue to deal with the parties concerned on the basis of the status quo 'until arrangements that will facilitate the work of the International Supervisory Commission and of the Joint Commission in Vietnam' envisaged in the Co-Chairmen's message to French Government 'are put into effect'".

4. Paragraph 8 satisfactory to us. Delhi's suggested redraft of paragraph 12 seems to me to be considerably less so.

5. As I see it, the phraseology "continue to deal with the parties concerned on the basis of the status quo" contains serious implications for the French. If there were general agreement on the phrase status quo this paragraph might not create too much trouble although the use of "continue" and "the parties" implies more than the French would swallow. From what I can make out, however, from Parthasarathi, while the Indians are no longer insisting on a legal party in the South, they are anxious to have a responsible party. Status quo to them means, I think, not only the maintenance of the entire machinery for the implementation of the Cease Fire Agreement, but also the identification in some fashion of a "responsible party".

6. It may be that you will consider Delhi's redraft of paragraph 12 satisfactory, particularly if the French did not consider it necessary to reply. However, in the absence of further instructions from you by noon hour tomorrow, Wednesday May 23, I will tell Parthasarathi that I cannot go along with the message and that we will submit a minority note to the Co-Chairmen.

7. You are probably getting a little fed up with the time limits with which India has been facing you. Parthasarathi now wants to have the revised draft message dealt with by the Commission tomorrow afternoon so that it can go down to Saigon by courier on Thursday morning, May 24.

8. Parthasarathi does not now plan to send any separate letter to the French authorities.

VIETNAM — CO-CHAIRMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

Parthasarathi telephoned afternoon today to tell me that Delhi had told him to proceed with the message to the Co-Chairmen (my telegram 148 May 15 as amended by paragraph 3 of my telegram 159 May 22).

2. Parthasarathi said further that the Polish Acting Commissioner had been authorized by Warsaw to support the message "even though they did not like it". The Pole apparently was also instructed not to have the Commission take note of (a) the letter from the French Government to the Co-Chairmen and (b) Mau's letter to Selwyn Lloyd of May 22.[24] Parthasarathi asked me whether I was prepared to agree to the message. I replied in the affirmative.

3. At a meeting of the Commission this afternoon the message to the Co-Chairmen was approved. The Commission has now resumed its normal activities and a regular meeting of the Commission will be held on Tuesday May 29.

4. My decision to agree to the message was based on your approval of paragraph 12 in your telegram YY19 May 23.† I also reasoned that if on May 25 my two colleagues had been prepared to approve the message it would have been approved [without] our support.

5. I spoke briefly at our meeting this afternoon. I congratulated the Chairman on achieving unanimity in the method by which the Commission should resume its normal activities. I added that I had nothing further to say beyond that which Mr. Johnson had placed on the record at the 301st meeting on May 11 when he said "The Canadian delegation did not consider it necessary to have an interruption in the activities of the Commission after April 28". I concluded by expressing the hopes that the parties will respond to the appeal of the Chairmen and "show effective cooperation".

6. I will send you copies of the message to the Co-Chairmen by bag on Wednesday.[25]

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 31, 1956

VIETNAM: ENTRY OF UNITED STATES "TERM" MISSION

Attached for your information is an Aide Mémoire on this subject which was left at the Department on May 30 by Mr. Tyler Thompson, the United States Minister, indicating that the first contingent of TERM personnel has been sent to Vietnam, before the Commission in Hanoi had dealt with the problem or given its approval.

Mr. Holmes recalled to Mr. Thompson that when this project was first mooted we gave it as our opinion that the entry of the TERM mission would not be in legal conformity with the provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement for Vietnam; but that when we discovered that the Indians were prepared to acquiesce in the mission, you had informed Mr. Dulles that we would not oppose the project in the International Commission. We were very glad indeed that the United States had negotiated directly with the Indians on this problem, and were sure that they appreciated that Indian support for the mission in the International Commission was essential if trouble was to be avoided. We would, of course, do what we could to ensure smooth sailing, but if the Indians were to raise difficulties now little could be gained by our taking a minority position. It was unfortunate that this problem should land on the Commission now, when it had just resumed normal activities and had not really found its feet in the new ad hoc arrangements for its operation.

You will note that the first sentence of the penultimate paragraph has been deleted. Mr. Thompson called us this afternoon to advise us that this deletion had been made at the request of the United States Ambassador in Saigon, who had pointed out that the deleted statement was a misinterpretation by the State Department of one of his telegrams.

We have some reservations about the statement in paragraph 4 of the Aide Mémoire that "The United States Government had early in April obtained the approval of the Canadian and Indian Governments for this operation ... ." This is perhaps a rather broad interpretation of our attitude, but we can see little advantage in taking exception to the statement.

J. L[ÉGER]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Aide-Mémoire de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Aide-Mémoire by Embassy of United States

Ottawa, May 30, 1956

The following is a statement for the information of the Canadian Government of the United States position with respect to the sending of personnel of the Temporary Equipment Recovery Mission (TERM) to Vietnam.

The United States Government has just been informed that in a note dated May 26 addressed to the French Liaison Mission in Hanoi, the International Commission in Vietnam informs the Vietnamese Government that the entry of an initial contingent of TERM personnel into Vietnam should be further delayed so that the Commission may complete its consideration of the matter prior to the arrival of this personnel.

The initial contingent of TERM personnel, consisting of 86 United States Army personnel now in flight between the United States west coast and Saigon, is due to arrive in Saigon on May 30. Unfortunately, it is now practically impossible to stop the movement of this initial increment into Saigon.

The United States believes the history of this matter attests that it has given full consideration to the wishes of the Commission's representatives regarding this question and has given ample time for the Commission to act. The United States Government had early in April obtained the approval of the Canadian and Indian Governments for this operation which, as the Secretary of State explained personally to Mr. Nehru and Mr. Pearson, involves very large United States interests. On April 8 the United States Ambassador to Vietnam informed the Indian Chairman of the Commission that the United States would delay the dispatch of TERM personnel to Vietnam for 30 days in order to obtain the approval of the International Commission itself. At the request of the United States the Government of Vietnam prepared a note on TERM, which was presented to the Commission by the French Liaison Mission, expressing the hope that TERM could enter Vietnam in the first part of May.

The Commission Chairman, however, advised the United States Ambassador on May 3 that, in view of continuing doubts concerning its own existence, the Commission could not act immediately on TERM and requested another month's delay in the arrival of personnel. Accordingly, the United States Government maintained a temporary ban on the departure of its personnel, which had already been assembled on the west coast in expectation of an early departure and which were immobilized at a not inconsiderable expense to the United States, pending early Commission approval of the project. The Indian representatives of the Commission in Saigon subsequently requested the United States to ask the Vietnamese Government to withdraw its note on TERM and submit a new note along lines they suggested. On instructions of the United States Government, the United States Embassy in Saigon informed the Indian and Canadian representatives of the Commission in Saigon on May 11 that the United States would ask the Vietnamese Government to submit a new note on TERM to the Commission, additional to the note originally submitted and incorporating substantially the language desired by the Indian representatives. The United States Embassy in Saigon also told the Indian and Canadian representatives on the same date that in view of the fact that the Geneva Co-Chairmen in London had by then reached agreement on the continuation of the Commission in Vietnam, the United States assumed the Commission would now be able to act immediately on TERM. The United States Embassy then informed the Indian and Canadian representatives that, in view of the urgency of this matter for the United States and the United States national interest involved, United States personnel would in any case begin arriving in Vietnam before the end of May.

In response, the Indian representative of the Commission in Saigon informed our Saigon Embassy on May 11 that he saw no reason to postpone the arrival of TERM personnel beyond the end of May, even though the ICC had not yet reached a decision on TERM.[26] The Indian Chairman of the Commission subsequently informed the United States that a further delay in arrivals of TERM personnel until mid-June would be desirable. The Vietnamese Government, responsive to United States wishes not to delay the arrivals beyond the end of May, dispatched a new note to the Commission via the French Liaison Mission on May 15 stating that the "Government of Vietnam is giving its consent to the arrival of the first contingent of this personnel before the end of May 1956".

The United States Government has been obliged to send the first contingent of TERM personnel to Vietnam before Commission consideration of the matter has been completed. In proceeding with the dispatch of this initial personnel at this time the United States feels that it is acting in full accord with the policy concerning which the Indian and Canadian representatives in Saigon were informed in early May. The United States Government continues to hope that it will receive the approval of the International Commission in Vietnam for this operation and that the Indian and Canadian Governments will recognize the sincere wish of the United States to cooperate with the Commission.

Le commissaire par intérim de la Commission internationale de surveillance pour le Vietnam au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Commissioner, International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET. PERSONAL. Saigon, June 14, 1956

Dear John [Holmes],

In a very real sense, events have outstripped our thinking about the questions raised in your letter of March 23 to David Johnson. The French have departed without any real agreement on co-operation by the South being reached. The South, on the other hand, have given us assurances of a somewhat equivocal nature which our Indian and Polish colleagues find unsatisfactory. In the meantime, we have adopted the attitude that in this "as if" period we should carry on as before.

It is all very confusing. It probably will be even more frustrating. Against this background, it appears at most unrealistic, and at least, extremely difficult, to plot out the long-term course of action of the Canadian Delegation. After all, there is a possibility that the Commission may not exist much longer, and then we'd be left with a brand-new, never-used, long-range plan. Because of this, we've tried to answer your letter by two separate memoranda. The first deals with our plans for the immediate future. In summary, it asks simply, Do we want the Commission to continue? and, If we do, how do we act to ensure its continuance? When Parthasarathi starts being difficult, I'd feel much more comfortable if I knew exactly what our aims were. I hope your comments on the first memorandum will solve all our problems.

The second paper[27] deals with the possibilities of reducing the number of teams, assuming the Commission remains in existence. I do not think this is the time for reduction, but if the Commission remains on an even keel after July 20, you may wish to consider our suggestions for gradual reduction.

[27] Non retrouvé./Not located.

You will, I hope, appreciate that in sending you these memoranda the Delegation as such is thinking out loud. You will probably find them much too long but I hope not lacking in decisiveness. The memorandum entitled "The Future of the Commission" may in places be too stark. This may be explained by our closeness to the problems.

Although I have signed these papers, you will quickly realize that Williams could not possibly have written these masterpieces. You are quite right. I am deeply indebted to my colleagues Bill Bauer and Si Taylor, whose knowledge about the Commission is so tremendous that it frightens me when I think that they will in time leave the Delegation.

If these memoranda annoy you and you consider them impertinent — then fire me. I take full responsibility for them.

Why not come out and visit us? I am more than ready to roll out a "red" carpet for you.

All the best.

Yours sincerely,

BRUCE WILLIAMS

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

SECRET Hanoi, June 14, 1956

Note du commissaire par intérim de la Commission internationale de surveillance pour le Vietnam

Memorandum by Acting Commissioner, International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam

THE FUTURE OF THE COMMISSION

Since we received Mr. Holmes' letter of March 23 the situation in Vietnam has become so fluid as to make any firm recommendations very difficult. The withdrawal of the French High Command, the rather vague instructions handed to the Commission by the Co-Chairmen, the less than explicit assurances of co-operation given by the authorities in South Vietnam, along with the Indians' apparent desire and the Poles' very clear wish to find a clearly responsible party in the South — all these have left us up in the air. Now the Chairman, Mr. G. Parthasarathi, speaks in terms of another Commission crisis as July 20 approaches.[28] If we are to meet new Indian and Polish arguments concerning the continued existence of the Commission, we shall need concrete guidance, not only about the Canadian interpretation of the Geneva Agreements, but also about Canadian aims in Southeast Asia.

2. We have given a great deal of thought to the question of whether to press for a reduction of the Commission's activities in Vietnam and to the methods by which this reduction could be carried out. We are of the opinion that the time is not ripe for a reduction, but if you think that the Commission should continue, and that its activities should be progressively reduced, then you may be interested in the memorandum on this subject which accompanies this one.

[28] Le 20 juillet constituait la date butoir fixée par les Accords de Genève pour une élection dans tout le Vietnam.
July 20 was the deadline set by the Geneva Accords for an all-Vietnam election.

Do We Want the Commission to Continue After July 20?

3. It seems to us, however, that our basic problem is not so much whether we want the activities of the Commission to be reduced, but whether we want the Commission to exist at all after July 20.

4. Our decisions about the life of the Vietnam Commission presumably must be made within the context of Canadian aims in this part of the world. Our basic guidance on the subject of Canadian policy in Southeast Asia is contained in the letter of instructions which was sent to Mr. Lett by despatch No. Y-6 of August 27, 1954.[29] The memorandum of July 20, 1955 which provided further instructions for Mr. Johnson, did not amend paragraphs 13-16 of the original letter of instructions, and therefore we assume that these policy objectives still stand. The common denominator of the four policy objectives outlined in the letter of instructions seems to be holding the line against Communism. Canada wishes to maintain peace in Indochina to provide "the time and opportunity for a fresh effort to encourage the development of stronger independent and non-Communist states on the mainland of Asia". Canada wishes to encourage the development of SEADO, "as a safeguard against, and a deterrent to, overt Chinese Communist aggression in Southeast Asia". Canada wishes to contribute to the economic and social strengthening of Southeast Asian countries; such development would "help to eliminate conditions which foster the growth of Communism". Finally, Canadian policy aims at encouraging by sympathetic interest "the development of strong, independent, non-Communist régimes on the Asian mainland outside present Communist areas". Canadian hopes are that "the progressive achievement of full independence under the protection which the Cease Fire Agreements should afford, will enable Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam to resist effectively Communist attempts to take them over by means of infiltration and subversion".

"Judicial Impartiality" and Canadian Aims.

5. One can infer from these four policy objectives that Canada's main concern in Vietnam is not the fulfilment of the Geneva Agreements per se, but the maintenance of peace in Southeast Asia as a method of thwarting Communist ascendancy in the area.

6. Mr. Lett was instructed to maintain "an attitude of judicial impartiality", and Mr. Johnson's instructions were not amended in this respect. If the Canadian Delegation in Vietnam were to act strictly on these instructions, then it would have no alternative to letting the chips fall where they might. In fact, we have not been completely impartial, since in various interim Commission reports we have inevitably attempted to soften sections, particularly on 14(c), critical of the South and to emphasize the misdemeanours of the North. If, however, on the larger question of the Commission's future, the Indians were of the opinion that the co-operation given by the South was not great enough to ensure adequate fulfilment of the provisions of the Geneva Agreements, and if, by applying our standard of judicial impartiality we were impelled to agree with them, then we would have no choice but to go along with them if they recommended that the Commission terminate its functions.

7. On the other hand, if we believe our interests are best served by giving South Vietnam as much time as possible to build up its powers of resistance against both subversion and armed attack on the part of the Communists, and if we believe that maintenance of the Commission will provide the needed time, then we must do our utmost to keep the Commission alive, whether or not it is effective in administering the Cease Fire Agreements and the final declaration. Strict implementation of the Geneva Agreements thus becomes a goal secondary to the protection of South Vietnam. And by the same token, "judicial impartiality" becomes an attitude acceptable only so long as it does not conflict with our policy of thwarting Communist expansion.

The Practical Work of the Commission After July 20.

8. This approach, of course, seems to emphasize what you described as the symbolic function of the Commission, and plays down the need for any high level of efficiency in making sure the various provisions of the Geneva Agreements are implemented. However, it does not mean the Commission would ignore its own shortcomings and wink at violations of the Agreements; it simply would amount to the Commission's limping along as it has during the past year and accepting many unsatisfactory situations, rather than packing it up simply because it was not efficient enough. In our despatch No. 64 of February 10, 1956,† we discussed at some length the effectiveness of the inspection system in Vietnam. I think this assessment indicates that, if complete effectiveness is the standard of prestige, then the Commission has not accumulated as many laurels as we should like. It could be argued that if Canada lingered on another year in a semi-effective Commission, we would lose prestige, but I am inclined to disagree. I wonder how much prestige Switzerland and Sweden have lost because of their participation in the NNSC, whose performance certainly has been unhappier than the Vietnam Commission's?

9. I do not think the Commission would be completely ineffective in enforcing specific provisions of the Agreements, but continuation of the general frustration and demoralization inherent in such work would be at least open to question if some real purpose were not being served. It is, however, fairly certain that maintenance of the Commission would serve a purpose in both practical and symbolic terms.

10. In the practical field, it could continue to supervise the demilitarized zone and the demarcation line; to potter about with matters having humanitarian overtones (such as cases of civilian internees and prisoners of war); and to investigate some 14(c) and 14(d) cases. It would also continue to supervise the implementation of Articles 16 and 17; its effectiveness would not increase, but does this matter to us? The North presumably has obtained all the war material it needs for the moment (if only through Phuc Hoa), and in the event of hostilities could draw on supplies in South China. If the South succeeded in importing some material without detection, we probably would not feel too indignant.

11. However, in addition to these specific functions which the Commission could perform with a degree of effectiveness, there is the heart of the Cease-fire Agreement itself: the cease-fire. Probably the Commission by itself could not maintain peace in Vietnam, unless Peking and Moscow saw peace here as part of their global policy. However, the Commission does have some deterrent effect. Its presence makes it reasonably certain that armed aggression would be judged as such by Canada and, we would hope, by India. In addition, its very existence implies that the hope of an eventual unification of Vietnam (as provided for in Article 14 of the Cease-fire Agreement and Article 7 of the Final Declaration) is not dead.

The Commission as a Stabilizing Influence.

12. The surety symbolized by the Commission could be enough to stay any Northern inclinations to try to overthrow the Diem Government by internal revolt and-or armed attack across the 17th Parallel.

13. Thus, the Commission, both as substance and symbol, could add stability to the peace in Vietnam for at least a limited period of time. We could hope that after a year, South Vietnam would be in a position to protect itself against the North.

14. A summary of our argument to this point, therefore, would include the fact that Canadian policy involves a contribution to holding the line against communism and efforts to ensure that the provisions of the Cease-fire Agreement are carried out. Both these objectives can best be achieved by continued Canadian participation in the Vietnam Commission and by maintenance of that Commission past July 20. The Commission, if continued past July 20, would be neither, completely effective nor completely ineffective in its practical functions, but probably would maintain level of effectiveness at least acceptable to us. As a symbol of world opinion and of the Geneva Powers, it would act as some deterrent against violent action on the part of North Vietnam. Although participation in the Commission probably would be frustrating and demoralizing, it is questionable whether Canada would lose any prestige.

Attitudes of the Other Delegations

15. We assume, therefore, that if a decision is made about the future of the Commission, Canada will decide, in principle at least, that the Commission should be kept alive for at least six months or a year. In practice, this decision cannot be taken by Canada alone, and the support of at least one of the other two Delegations is required. It is difficult to assess the aims of the Soviet bloc, and of the Polish Delegation in this respect, but our conditioning leads us to assume that we can expect no support from the Poles. We were interested in the various United States' ideas about Soviet motives, which were contained in Washington Telegram Inchin 815 of May 2, 1956,† and particularly in the suggestion that the Soviet Union, by doing nothing, may be seeking to cause the Commission to render itself inoperative, through the agency of the Indians. During the London talks the Soviets retreated a considerable distance from their original drafts, and the Co-Chairmen's messages certainly did not seem to fit in with Vietminh or Chinese wishes. The thought has occurred to us that the Soviet Union did not want to cause a breakdown of the London talks, and therefore did not press too hard for a new Geneva Conference or for the identification of a legal successor to the French. They either gave up these ideas entirely for the time being (which seems unlikely) or compromised in London on the assumption that the issue could be forced in Hanoi. During May the Polish Delegation did little more than go along with the Indians in tactics which at times made us wonder whether Delhi had decided to force a new Geneva Conference, new terms of reference for the Commission or a permanent end of the Commission. However, speculation of this sort is rather fruitless, and in the absence of any sure knowledge of Soviet objectives, we must assume simply that we cannot rely on the Poles for support of our proposition that the Commission should be kept in being without any substantial changes in its terms of reference.

16. That leaves us relying on the Indians for support, and I think it is fairly easy to predict the conditions which will be laid down by them for a continuance of the Commission's life. During the past six months we have heard a variety of arguments expressed by Mr. Nehru, Mr. Desai, Mr. Menon and Mr. Parthasarathi. The emphasis and the tone of these arguments have varied from person to person and from time to time, but there is a hard core which can be abstracted. The four points enumerated to Mr. Reid by Menon on May 30 (New Delhi telegram No. Inchin 353 of June 1st†) probably can be accepted as the Indian conditions. In our Telegram Inchin 189 we discussed the extent to which these conditions have been, or may be, met by South Vietnam. The South Vietnamese have indicated their willingness to respect the armistice and the demilitarized zone and this condition therefore does not present any apparent problem. Reports on the Franco-Vietnamese talks in Saigon indicate that difficulties are being encountered in the transfer from the French to the South Vietnamese of the responsibility for logistic support and financing, but I suspect that eventually this problem will be solved satisfactorily. The South Vietnamese, however, remained adamant in their refusal to participate in the Joint Commission and it will undoubtedly take strong medicine to get them to change their minds. (See our tel. Inchin 157 of June 11, 1956†). The Indians also place a great deal of emphasis on the need for the South to set a date on which it would start consultations about national elections. The Indians take a very serious view on this question of a political settlement and I think the South will have to make some gesture in this field before very long.

Difficulties in Meeting Indian Conditions.

17. I intend, later in this memorandum, to outline the action we could take in order to bring the Indians closer to our position, and at that point I shall refer again to the matter of the Joint Commission and the political settlement. First of all, however, I should like to discuss the day-to-day and long-range problems which confront us as we try to meet the general Indian condition which permeates their whole approach to the Commission and which inevitably must affect their policy about the life of the Commission after July 20. I refer to their insistence on greater practical cooperation from both sides, and particularly from South Vietnam.

17. [sic] As a control agency, the Commission has only the Cease Fire Agreement as its terms of reference. The Co-Chairmen have not produced any substitute for this Agreement, and until new terms of reference are given the Commission, it will be forced to continue operating in much the same way it has in the past. In these circumstances, it has appeared to us that the most attractive line we could take would be one in which we agree with the Indians on the need for more effective co-operation from both sides. This line keeps us and the Indians on the same track, but it is loaded with unpleasant possibilities.

18. Our first commitment to this position is in our minority note to the Co-Chairmen. You will have noticed the important stipulation with which paragraph 7 of the Note begins, that is only "on condition that the appropriate authorities on each side of the demarcation line co-operate effectively with the International Commission" that we believe the Commission can carry on. Since the Commission has resumed its normal activities, we have followed this line and seized appropriate opportunities during Commission meetings to stress for the record that in our opinion the Commission has entered on a period in which it must have better cooperation both from the North and the South than it has had in the past. I think that the Indians are finding this line fairly attractive.

19. When the Commission first resumed its normal activities, we had some reason to fear that the Indians were going to load the agenda with items designed to put pressure on the South to prove its good faith while ignoring the North's bad record. Because the North were already tied to the Agreement as a legal party, the Indians at first did not seem too anxious to press any of the issues pending against the North in which the North had failed to co-operate. However by emphasizing our impartiality, we seem to have got the Indians around to a point where on their own initiative they are putting items on the agenda which will force the North as well as the South to show its good faith. In the latest crisis over Phuc Hoa, for example, the Indians drafted an extremely stiff letter to the PAVN which far exceeded our expectations.

The Price of Indian Support.

20. If we are having a degree of success with the Indians however, it may well be that this success will prove in the long run to have been bought at the price of damaging the South more than the North. So far as 14(c) investigations are concerned, for example, we have made it quite plain that we are interested in seeing a number of investigations conducted in the South and that we are interested in having effective investigations, not investigations which will be stalled, as a number have been in the past ten months, or obstructed as teams were during the regrouping. We kept in mind, in adopting this policy, that you have always insisted that the South should do something to clear up the backlog of 14(c) cases, and that we had committed ourselves in the Fifth Interim Report to an expression of "serious concern" at the Commission's inability to deploy mobile teams on 14(c) investigations. Another factor which influenced us is that we have had some indications from the South that they will be prepared in the next few months to let a few teams go out. We still do not know just how many, and we are still not too optimistic about how much success they will have. However, the Indians are telling us in private that they realise as well as we do that there is a tremendous practical problem involved in attempting at this stage to investigate the vast number of complaints the PAVN has made since last August. They say that they would be prepared to consider some form of reduction if one or two successful investigations were carried out, and if it were proved as a result of these investigations that the PAVN's charges are largely propaganda.

21. What I am afraid of is that the PAVN's charges may very well not be propaganda. We have to remember that the South's record under Article 14(c) during the regrouping was extremely bad, and that the Diem Government has been conducting all along a vigorous anti-communist campaign. We may therefore find that, if we send teams out, their investigations will only show that violations of Article 14(c) have been taking place in the South and that the PAVN's charges are by no means all propaganda. If this happens, then it will be practically impossible to argue that 14(c) investigations should be dropped or reduced; the logic of such a situation would be rather that the Commission's activities under 14(c) should be increased.

22. I am also extremely worried that there will be trouble in the next three or four months about the various United States missions in South Vietnam. So far as MAAG is concerned, we have no reason to believe that there is anything sinister about their activities. However, the comings and goings of their personnel continue to cause us trouble because we have still not been able to get the United States, the French and the South Vietnamese to work out effective notification procedures despite the fact that we have been trying to do so since last November. With the approval of the TERM project, this problem will be seriously magnified. While it can be argued that MAAG comes within the terms of the cease-fire because it was here before the war ended, TERM can only be admitted to Vietnam as an exception to the provisions of the cease-fire. Therefore from the very beginning it has been more important for TERM to be on its best behaviour than it ever was for MAAG. In the face of this situation it is disturbing to have evidence that TERM will undertake activities of which the Commission does not approve. If the United States is as casual about fulfilling the Commission's conditions for the entry of TERM as they have been about smoothing out the notification problem, then it will be practically impossible for the Indians and ourselves, no matter how much we might wish to, to avoid finding violations of the Agreement or sending mobile teams out to find out what TERM is doing. To a certain extent, the Pole is already making difficulties, and I have a feeling that the next few months will see as much trouble over Articles 16 and 17 on account of U.S. activities in the South as we have had in the past over Article 14.

The Difficulty of "Shaping the Record".

23. If I am right in these gloomy predictions, then after a number of months the South's record will look very black indeed. It is true that in the meantime, we may have had some success in persuading the Indians to take a lead in forcing the North as well as the South to prove its good faith but I think I should warn you that the number of issues pending against the North is very small and that in "shaping the record" we have very little to go on. If we are to adhere strictly to the terms of the cease-fire and are inhibited from conducting what could be called frankly a propaganda campaign to balance the record then we are going to have considerable difficulty. For example, if we said what we really wanted to say about the import of war materials, we would want to pursue the line of argument the British used in their reply to the Soviet note which preceded the Co-Chairman's talks. And yet, as you know, on a strict interpretation of Articles 16 and 17 and Protocol 23, there is no reason why the Commission should take cognizance of the fact that a large army has been built up in North Vietnam while a large army has departed from South Vietnam. Again, if we are to talk in the strictest terms about the implementation of Articles 16 and 17, we could say that controls are virtually non-existent in the North. We could also point out that it is contrary to common sense to accept the North's bland assertion that they have not imported a single round of ammunition since the cease-fire. But all we could say would be that we suspect that they have been violating the Agreement. We could not prove it.

24. Another example is Article 14(c). You have mentioned the possibility of getting on the record our views about civil liberties in the North. If we were directed to undertake a propaganda campaign to balance the record, then we could talk in general terms about the state of civil liberties in North Vietnam. However, as you know, the guarantee of "democratic liberties" in Article 14(c) is not a general guarantee of western-style freedoms to the entire population of North Vietnam. On the Commission's interpretation, it means no more than that a former supporter of the French who is still living in the North is entitled to no less liberty than his fellow citizens. The fact that his fellow citizens themselves have very little liberty is irrelevant, so long as he has no less than they. If we were instructed to indulge in strictures about the tyrannical nature of this régime we would have to depart sharply from a careful interpretation of the Agreement. We would almost certainly lose Indian support by doing so, because so far as the Indians are concerned, when it comes to democratic liberties, there is not much to choose between North and South. It might even be that I would be declared out of order in the Commission on the ground that I was talking about things outside the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement.

25. I conclude from this that in the next few months we can by strict impartiality gain a measure of Indian support. On some important questions, for example on the admission of TERM, the Indians are even in the unusual position of having to take the initiative on an issue which involves a defence of the South. However, even if we and the Indians were entirely agreed that over the next few months what was required was better co-operation from both sides, on a strictly numerical calculus of issues pending before the Commission, the record might very well go against the South; and it might go very seriously against the South if TERM is not handled much more carefully than similar issues have been in the past. At the end of a period of this sort while we might be able to say that we wished to see the activities of the Commission reduced because of the lack of co-operation from both sides, we might have to say that this was especially because of lack of co-operation from the South. The circumstances in which this stand would be taken might result in a blackening of the reputation of South Vietnam and of the United States.

The Effect of Improved Cooperation from the South.

26. This problem can be avoided if the South does give a considerably improved measure of co-operation. In its Telegram Y-140 of April 20† the Department said that "if the Diem declaration of April 6 means anything it means that the South Vietnamese authorities, while unwilling to accept French responsibility under the Cease-Fire Agreement, are prepared to do those things to maintain the cease-fire which they would be legally obliged to do if they were to accept the responsibility of the French High Command ... It would appear that the Commission must proceed on the assumption that the whole framework of the Cease Fire Agreement remains in force as if the South Vietnamese had in fact agreed to take over the French responsibility". To us this amounts to saying that South Vietnam will act as if it had signed the Geneva Agreements and was bound by them even though it didn't and says it isn't. As you have seen in preceding paragraphs this is the basis on which we have been acting in the Commission since it resumed its normal activities, and this is the approach which could blacken the record against South Vietnam.

27. South Vietnam could protect its reputation to a certain extent, and at the same time meet the general Indian requirement for continuing the Commission, by providing real cooperation. Before the Diem declaration we worked in private to get the South Vietnamese to cooperate with the Commission. In the Commission itself we defended the South, albeit with occasional stirring of conscience, because a defence of the South quite frequently involved a departure from "judicial impartiality". I believe that to the extent that we become partisan it was chiefly because we wished to moderate the tough line which the Indians and the Poles have adopted since last summer. I think that if the South Vietnamese had been legally bound to the agreement we would have been prepared on many occasions to have been much harder on them than in fact we were, but so long as they were not bound in any fashion to the Agreement we believed that it was a mistake to censure them too often or too harshly. We counselled patience in the hope of getting the South, as Mr. Pearson said to Mr. Krishna Menon, to enter into "a firm assumption of responsibility for the cease-fire arrangements ... in agreement with the French".

Will the South Give Cooperation?

28. The result of all this patience was the Diem Declaration. It was not very satisfactory but we were told that it was all we could get. So said the British who had had the task of extracting the declaration from Diem. Canadian experience of attempting to get the South Vietnamese to be more forthcoming in their attitude towards the Commission led us to agree with the British. We therefore accepted the declaration, hoping that "practical cooperation" by the South would result in the South looking like a "responsible party". Now it appears that the South's interpretation of "practical cooperation" is very limited.

29. Obviously however in a crisis in which the Commission threatened to break down it would have been dangerous to have expressed our misgivings. We therefore acted as if the Diem declaration was entirely satisfactory to us and repeated again and again that we saw no reason for any interruption in the normal work of the Commission. As I have kept saying to Parthasarathi since, the only difference between the Indian and Canadian approach on this point was that the Indians want the South to admit that it is a party to the Agreement, while we are prepared to assume that they are and see if our assumption is borne out in practice.

30. Unfortunately, because the South has for almost a year now failed to give any adequate measure of cooperation to the Commission, there is an accumulation of pending issues like notification, deployment of mobile teams, 24- and 48-hour notice and the move to Saigon, on which Southern good faith is bound to be put to the test within the next few weeks. However much we might like to defer a test of Southern good faith on these issues, they have been pending so long that it is simply impossible to do so. Furthermore, we are trapped by our own thesis that legal obscurities do not matter and that the important thing is to see whether the Commission can work in practice. For, from the moment the Commission resumed its operation, these thorny issues were raised. The only thing we can do to help balance the record is to ask for equal pressure on the North to cooperate on issues on which they have been delinquent.

31. Our experience leads us to believe that the South will not act "as if they had signed the Agreement". Our guess is that cooperation will still be too little and too late. I think it is a possibility at least worth considering that there will be no convincing demonstration of good faith such as you were hoping for following the resolution of the April 28 crisis. The North, by refusing to budge about Phuc Noa and Xa Doai, for their part, have already given indication that they do not intend to mend their ways. If these trends continue, then in several months we will face a situation in which the basis for the Commission's operation will still be uncertain in law, and the Commission itself will be working no better in practice then it did before. We have said that we were prepared to ignore legal obscurities. To what extent are we prepared to ignore practical ineffectiveness as well? Are we so anxious to see the Geneva structure maintained that we will be prepared to say several months from now that Canadians are ready to stay in Vietnam no matter what happens and that if the Commission breaks down, it is the fault of other?

The Possibilities Open to US.

32. Assuming that the South Vietnamese do not provide the necessary cooperation, then we have two courses open to us in the Commission. On the one hand, we can continue with our present attitude of reasonable impartiality, or what I would describe as "judicious impartiality". This would convince the Indians, to a certain extent, of our honest intentions, but this would neither save the reputation of the South, nor dissuade the Indians from pushing for an end of the Commission because of insufficient cooperation. Alternatively, we could use a "modified Polish gambit" and try to whitewash the South by using delays, obstructions and downright lies in the Commission. This would not gain us any credit with the Indians, nor would it make it very easy for us to live with ourselves. And of course, such a policy could not prevent the Indians from calling for an end of the Commission, for it would not hide from them the fact that cooperation was lacking.

33. Therefore, in the prevailing circumstances, both approaches might have little effect in prolonging the life of the Commission. Perhaps we could read a little anti-Communist propaganda into the record, but as I have pointed out already, this would be difficult.

The Uncomfortable Canadian Position.

34. Therefore, if we wish to keep the Commission functioning even for six months, we probably will find ourselves caught between two opposing forces. On the one hand there will be the Indians, who lay down certain conditions which must be fulfilled before they will consider as worthwhile their continued participation in the Commission. On the other hand are the South Vietnamese (and in the background the United States) who, while paying lip-service to the idea of cooperation, do not in practice give enough of it to meet the Indian conditions. If we are to achieve our goal, we must change the attitude of either the Indians or the South Vietnamese.

35. During the past six months the Indians have been fairly consistent in the conditions they have laid down, and I doubt very much if we can shake them from their position. Our difficulties in this field are aggravated by the fact that our position essentially is very close to that of the Indians, and nowhere is that more apparent than in Mr. Pearson's discussion with Krishna Menon on March 29 (External Telegram Y-110 of April 4†). Our conditions are different from those of the Indians in only one major respect: We are willing to modify our position in order to promote our long range objective of halting communism at the 17th parallel. The Indians do not seem to be motivated by this goal and therefore are less willing than we are to compromise in their demands.

A Possible Solution to the Problem.

36. This leaves us with the South Vietnamese and the United States, and I would suggest that, if you decide that it is in our interest to keep the Commission functioning after July 20 it will be necessary to approach the Government of South Vietnam and the State Department with an argument running along the following lines:

"Canada now finds itself in the position where it can not prevent a breakup of the Commission unless greatly increased cooperation is forthcoming from the authorities in South Vietnam. To keep the Commission in operation we need the support of the Indians, and the Indians demand that before they will continue to serve on the Commission, the South must give real cooperation to the Commission, must set some date for the beginning of consultations about a political settlement, and must do something about the Joint Commission. Mr. Menon himself has said that all the South has to do about elections is say that they will start consultations in July 1957, and this would seem to be a fairly easy condition to meet. South Vietnam is reluctant to serve on the Joint Commission because this would mean high level Southern officers' meeting and talking with Vietminh officers. I think this would be preferable to armed South Vietnamese troops facing armed North Vietnamese troops across the Ben Hai river. Cooperation with the Commission would not be so difficult if the will to cooperate actually exists to the extent that public declarations by Mr. Diem and Mr. Mau would seem to indicate."

37. We must emphasize that vague assurances of practical cooperation will not suffice. If South Vietnam feels secure enough to dispense with the stabilizing presence of the Commission then we suppose there would be no point in its making these concessions. However, if it needs another six months or a year to build itself up, then it has no alternative but to go along with these suggestions and thus help ensure the continued presence of the Commission.

Le commissaire par intérim de la Commission internationale de surveillance pour le Vietnam au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Commissioner, International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH 293 Hanoi, June 29, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Our Despatch of October 19, and our Despatch No. 586 of October 31, 1955.[30]

ARTICLE 14(C)

Of all the depressing prospects from the windows of the Commission, the view towards Article 14(c) is one of the dreariest. It is a nightmare landscape, where the shrill wind of PAVN accusations whistles endlessly, whirling trash towards the Commission's doors. From time to time, the Commission sends out a few groundkeepers with pointed sticks, to try to clear up the mess, but this only seems to make the wind blow stronger. People who live long enough in the Commission's house become very discouraged from listening to the wind rattle the windows, and watching the drifts of paper accumulate in corners. They often wish the Commission would sell the property and move out.

2. The prospect has changed hardly at all since Mr. Johnson described it for you in two despatches dated October 19 and October 31, 1955 and in telegram No. 622 of December 14, 1955.[31] The only difference between the situation now and the situation as it was ten months ago is that more paper has accumulated. The nature of the problem and the Commission's ways of dealing with it remain unchanged. Between one quarter and one third of the routine work of the commission still has to do with Article 14(c).

3. In view of this situation, it is only reasonable to ask how the Commission ever allowed itself to be manoeuvered into a position where it is spending so much effort to achieve so little. The answer is that the Commission could not help itself. The fundamental difficulty is that there is no way of shutting off the complaints at the source. Since they are a party to the Cease Fire Agreement, the PAVN have rights under the Agreement. One of these rights is the right to have their complaints investigated. Under the provisions of Article 37, "The International Commission shall, through the medium of the inspection teams mentioned above (in Article 35), and as soon as possible either on its own initiative, or at the request of the Joint Commission, or of one of the parties, undertake the necessary investigations both documentary and on the ground". This is very strict phrasing: not "the International Commission may investigate", but "the International Commission shall investigate", and furthermore, it shall investigate "as soon as possible". The only softening of the provisions of Article 37 is that investigations must be "necessary" and may be "documentary". This means that if an investigation can be shown to be unnecessary, it need not be undertaken; and that even if it is shown to be necessary, it need not automatically be assigned to a mobile team.

4. The procedures evolved by the Commission to deal with cases under Article 14(c) are still those proposed originally by M.J. Desai, which are described in para. 2 of telegram No. 563 of October 20 and in paras 1 to 3 of despatch No. 586 of October 31. To decide whether an investigation of any kind is necessary, the Commission has to determine in the first place whether a prima facie case under the Article has been made out. In practice, it takes only a simple assertion by the PAVN that the Article has been violated, supported by a stereotyped pattern of circumstantial detail, to convince the Commission that a prima facie case has been made out and that an investigation is therefore necessary.

5. The PAVN have to establish that an alleged act of reprisal took place on account of some person's activities during the hostilities. The standard formula for this is

> "X was a former member of the Resistance. After the ceasefire, he returned to his home, where he has been living as a peaceful farmer. On ___, police came to his village, arrested him, tortured him, and are still holding him in jail."

The phrase "a former member of the Resistance" in the PAVN's complaint satisfies Article 14(c)'s requirement of "activities during the hostilities". The phrase "living as a peaceful farmer", by removing all other possible causes for the man's arrest from the date of the ceasefire to the date of his arrest, satisfies the Article's requirement that the act of reprisal must be "on account of (his) activities during the hostilities". A general air of plausibility is added to the PAVN's complaints by the inclusion of precise details of names, places and events. On this basis, the Commission invariably decides that, since the possibility of a violation of Article 14(c) exists, some sort of investigation under Article 37 is necessary.

6. The PAVN never slip in framing a charge. The prima facie case is always made out. Therefore, if they make, say, thirty complaints in one month, the Commission has to decide to begin thirty new investigations. Thirty new files are opened, and the Commission sinks a little deeper under the weight of its own paper.

7. A frequent criticism of the procedures which have permitted this situation to develop is that the PAVN never offer any proof of what they assert. To this, the answer is of course that they do not have to. All they have to do is to make certain charges which if they were proved to be true would amount to a violation, of Article 14(c). Proof is required to find a violation; assertion is enough to open an investigation.

8. The Commission might be more strict with the PAVN if it appeared from a number of completed investigations that the PAVN were making wild and unsubstantiated charges. Even if the will to moderate the Commission's activities existed in all three Delegations — and it does not — it would be hard to justify a reduction in activities under Article 14(c) on the grounds that the PAVN were abusing their rights under the Agreement. By and large, the PAVN's complaints have proven on investigation to contain a core of truth. During the regrouping, team after team investigating PAVN complaints found that Article 14(c) was being violated in the South. (See Appendices III and VI of the Fourth Interim Report).

9. Since July of 1955, there have as you know been no mobile team investigations under Article 14(c). Therefore, the Commission for close to a year now has had no way of knowing directly whether the PAVN's charges are true or not. The only sort of investigation which has been possible in this period has been the documentary investigation. The great majority of these investigations have so far been inconclusive, partly because the South takes months to supply information in individual cases, and partly because the Commission has to wait months until an arrested person is tried and sentenced before it can say for certain whether or not Article 14(c) has been violated in his case. The proportion of cases in which the Commission has been able to say "this case is closed" is probably not more than one in fifty of cases pending.
